The government said it needed the information to prepare its case defending the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. The law prohibited Internet companies from knowingly making available obscene or pornographic material to minors.

The Justice Department has said that America Online, Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp. had all complied with similar requests for the information. America Online is owned by Time Warner Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0011898

Mountain View, California-based Google, the world's No. 1 Internet search engine, advertises its informal code of conduct as "Don't be evil."

Leahy said the collection and use by government law enforcement agencies of such data posed unique concerns.

He said it raised "the specter of excessive government surveillance that may intrude upon important privacy interests and chill the exercise of" constitutionally protected free-speech rights under the First Amendment.

Leahy asked how the department is addressing the privacy and civil liberties concerns raised by the collection, storage and use of such data.

He also asked whether the department requested or obtained any personally identifiable information.

Gonzales has defended the subpoena and has rejected concerns that individual privacy rights might be violated. The department's request to force Google to comply with the subpoena is pending before a federal judge in California.

Google on Tuesday said it would voluntarily block politically sensitive terms on its new China site, bowing to conditions set by Beijing in return for access to the world's second largest Internet market.

Senator Demands Info On Search Engine Subpoena (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 25, 2006

A top Senate Democrat is demanding details about the Bush administration's motives for sending subpoenas to Google, America Online, Microsoft's MSN and Yahoo.

In a two-page letter (click here for PDF) sent Tuesday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont asked the department to outline the type of information it has requested, its reasons for the requests, the steps it is taking to safeguard any data obtained, and any plans to issue additional subpoenas in the future.

Late last week, it was reported that federal prosecutors had subpoenaed the companies for millions of search records for use in preparing their upcoming defense of the constitutionality of a controversial Internet pornography law.

That 1998 pornography law, called the Child Online Protection Act, or COPA, restricts sexually explicit material deemed "harmful to minors" on commercial Web sites. The Supreme Court raised questions about its constitutionality in 2004 and sent the law back to a Philadelphia-based federal appeals court for further review.

"I am interested in learning more about the extent to which the Department of Justice is relying upon data mining of the Internet search queries made by law-abiding American citizens to support its efforts under COPA and how the department is addressing the privacy and civil liberties concerns raised by the collection, storage and use of that data," wrote Leahy, the Senate Judiciary Committee's top-ranking Democrat.

Google vowed last week to fight a renewed request from the agency, calling the subpoena overbroad. Yahoo, Microsoft and AOL all conceded that they have turned over some records, noting that they did so in a limited fashion involving only aggregated data and no personally identifiable information.

Leahy said in his letter that his concerns came "against the backdrop of strong public concern over the government's monitoring of Internet communications and warrantless eavesdropping on the telephone conversations of American citizens."

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the department planned to respond accordingly, though he was not sure what the response would entail.

As for the privacy concerns raised by Leahy, "We've addressed that in our subpoenas and to the search engines," Miller said. "We weren't seeking information about the individuals, we were only seeking the search terms....We don't even want to know the names of the people."

Davis Takes Issue With Google Over Records Request (GCN)

By Brad Grimes, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, January 25, 2006

REDMOND, Wash.— House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) said today that search giant Google Inc. has “bent over backward” to comply with the Chinese government’s demand that it block certain search results in order to operate in that country. So why, he wondered, won't the company cooperate with the U.S. Justice Department in its efforts to fight online pornography?

Google has refused a Justice Department subpoena for search results, saying it violated users' privacy. The government has said it needs the data to prepare a case regarding the 1998 Child Online Protection Act.

Other search companies have complied with the subpoena.

The company today also launched a Chinese version of its search site after agreeing to censor topics such as Falun Gong and Tibet.

"Google gave the Chinese everything they wanted. They're not going to put data on there about human rights," Davis said.

Davis spoke to public-sector CIOs today at a summit hosted by Micrsosoft Corp. Microsoft's MSN service also censors search results in China, as do Yahoo and others. Microsoft, Yahoo and America Online have also reportedly given the Justice Department information it was seeking.

"What does it mean to be a corporate citizen, working to bring terrorists or child pornographers to bear? What are the boundaries?" Davis said. "These are new areas for a lot of us that we've got to work our way through."

Davis did not expect there to be a standoff over the issue, but he clearly hoped an agreement could be reached between Google and the Justice Department.

"Google has shown an ability to be flexible when it's in their business interests," Davis said. "And I'm hoping the government will show the appropriate flexibility in trying to get what we need without everybody feeling that every time you Google something, the government's going to be looking over your shoulder."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) today released a letter he'd sent to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez asking for more information about the subpoenaed information and how the Justice Department was protecting personal privacy in its efforts.

UPDATE: Google Stands Up To US, Accedes To China (DOWJONES)

By Riva Richmond, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, January 25, 2006

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- In the last week, Google Inc. (GOOG) (GOOG) stood up to one government and acquiesced to another.

The moves show the kind of treacherous terrain the Internet giant, whose corporate philosophy is "Don't Be Evil," must traverse as it weighs its ideals and its business interests. It also spotlights how important Google (GOOG) has become as a key waypoint on the global Internet, where individual and government interests around access to information can and do collide.

Google (GOOG) said late Tuesday it plans to launch a Chinese search service this week, Google.cn, that will censor query results to comply with Chinese government restrictions on information about such sensitive political subjects as Taiwan and Tibet independence and the Tiananmen Square massacre. The company, which is determined to expand its presence in China's huge and fast-growing Internet market, said the move was necessary to provide Chinese users with better site performance.

Last week, the company said it would "vigorously" oppose a U.S. Department of Justice motion to compel Google (GOOG) to provide data about consumer Web searches. The request didn't seek personal information about consumers' online activities, but Google (GOOG) argued in an October letter to the DOJ that turning over the information would create an unacceptable perception it's amenable to turning over private information about it's customers. It also made a number of other arguments, including concerns key trade secrets could be revealed.

"Google (GOOG) is at the cutting edge in terms of trying to figure out what is acceptable and what is not acceptable in this century," when the Internet is making information more accessible than ever before, says Lauren Gelman, associate director of Stanford Law School's Center for Internet and Society. " What happens to information Google (GOOG) collects? I think this is a big question for society as new technologies evolve and we have to rethink privacy and censorship."

Criticism came swiftly from Reporters Without Borders, a press freedom group that has spoken out aggressively recently about Internet-company practices in repressive countries. "The launch of Google.cn is a black day for freedom of expression in China," the group said in a statement. "The firm defends the rights of US Internet users before the US government but fails to defend its Chinese users against theirs."

"These are two different issues," a Google (GOOG) spokesman said in an email. "We judge requests for information on a case by case basis - just as we do in America and all the countries in which we operate. Whenever we deal with these requests, we will respond - as we do in all markets - in the manner we feel best balances key Google (GOOG) values: our users' interests, expanding access to information and responding to local conditions."

In the two cases, Google's (GOOG) divergent approaches appear to be a matter of where it has legal recourse to fight perceived wrongs. Google (GOOG) can fight the U.S. government in court and get a fair hearing, but its options in China are far more limited.

In China, the question, says Gelman, is: "Do I say 'no thank you' and walk away, or do I engage and operate by the rules China sets out?"

That was apparently an agonizing question for Google (GOOG). But after months of internal debate, executives concluded they could not say 'no' to China, which has the world's second largest Internet population at more than 100 million and rising fast.

"As an emerging economic powerhouse, China is developing rapidly, thanks in no small measure to the Internet. We firmly believe, with our culture of innovation, Google (GOOG) can make meaningful and positive contributions to the already impressive pace of development in China," said Google Senior Policy Counsel Andrew McLaughlin in a statement.

Still, with Google.cn, the company tried to balance its mission to make information universally accessible with its competitive need to expand its foothold in China. The service will exclude links to sites offensive to the Chinese government in exchange for permission to use computer servers located in China. But Google (GOOG) plans to alert users when material has been censored by placing a short notice at the bottom of the Web page, as it has done in Germany and France when excluding sites with Nazi paraphernalia.

Google's (GOOG) current Chinese-language search service, which uses servers in the U.S., will remain in operation. That site has suffered service slowdowns because of Beijing's own efforts to filter content.

"While removing search results is inconsistent with Google's (GOOG) mission, providing no information (or a heavily degraded user experience that amounts to no information) is more inconsistent with our mission," McLaughlin said.

The company also said it will not host blogs or email on computer servers in China to avoid the possibility of requests for users' personal information, a minefield rival Yahoo Inc. (YHOO) (YHOO) stepped into last year in a case that sent a Chinese journalist to jail.

In the Justice Department situation, the government served Google (GOOG) with a subpoena in late August that requested Google (GOOG) provide all Web addresses that could be found through its search engine and a list of all search queries handled between June 1 and July 31. The request was part of the DOJ's efforts to defend the Child Online Protection Act, a 1998 law designed to shield minors from online pornography.

While Google (GOOG) objected, rivals Yahoo (YHOO), Microsoft Corp. (MSFT)'s (MSFT) MSN unit and Time Warner Inc. (TWX)'s (TWX) America Online (TWX) complied with the requests for search data.

In its October letter, Google (GOOG) called the agency's request "overbroad, unduly burdensome, vague and intended to harass." It also argued compliance could endanger its "crown-jewel trade secrets." Observers have also speculated that Google (GOOG) may be concerned about drawing attention to its role in steering Web surfers to pornographic sites and revenue it derives from porn-industry ads.

Google's (GOOG) resistance to the request, until the China news hit, made the company a hero with privacy advocates, who have worried about how much personal data Google (GOOG) collects about Web users and how it might use that information.

-By Riva Richmond, Dow Jones Newswires; 201-938-5670; riva.richmond@ dowjones.com

Google's Dilemma: Privacy Vs. Police (CSM)

By G. Jeffrey Macdonald

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

It's an age-old business dilemma caught up in the new age of globalization: When governments demand something that compromises the interests of customers, what's a company to do?

That's the question now before American telecommunications and Internet companies.

This week, for example, Internet giant Google is launching a new search service in China that, because of government sensitivities there, will limit what users there can access. They already couldn't see links to objectionable sites. Now, they won't be able to use Google for e-mail messaging or writing blogs.

But at the same time as Google is acceding to some Chinese government demands, it is vigorously fighting US government efforts to obtain data on its users' search habits.

Some observers see a double standard. Others call it a careful balancing act. What's clear is that controversies over the electronic intrusiveness of government don't disappear in a data-glutted age. In fact, they're heating up.

Last week in a spirited speech, former Vice President Al Gore called on telecommunications companies to stop helping US federal agents hunt for terrorists by listening in on international calls without a warrant.

Some observers say Google needs to stand up to the US. "I would make absolutely no distinction between what's happening in China and what's happening in this country," says Geoffrey Bowker, director of the Center for Science, Technology and Society at Santa Clara University in California. "The US government has [entered] the overreaching state that governments naturally fall into. They know the data's there. They want to use it.... I'm happy to see Google fighting it."

Others are appalled by the lack of cooperation, especially in time of war.

"I would like to think that there remains a reservoir - call it patriotism, if you will, or call it civic duty - within the private sector that does not require companies to be leaned on in order to cooperate," says Frank Gaffney, president of the Center for Security Policy in Washington. "I have to ask the question: Are these companies, and Google comes to mind, putting up more of a fight to provide assistance to our government in protecting Americans than they are to [resist] Communist China? ... My guess is the answer is yes."

The US government claims to need the data to help reinstate a law aimed at blocking access to child pornography.

So far, Google seems to be winning points for its tough stand against the US Department of Justice. According to one survey released this week, 56 percent of American users of the Internet believe Google should not release information about Web searches to the government.

"Google is not a party to this lawsuit, and [the government's] demand for information overreaches," says Nicole Wong, associate general counsel at Google. "We had lengthy discussions with them to try to resolve this, but were not able to and we intend to resist their motion vigorously."

But overseas, Google has endured criticism, as has Microsoft's MSN search service, for limiting what Chinese users can find. Yahoo! China faced especially sharp rebuke last year for supplying data about Shi Tao, a dissident Chinese journalist and Yahoo! user now serving a 10-year jail term. Yahoo! China said it was simply abiding by local laws.

Unlike Google, Yahoo! and Microsoft complied with the US government's request because they say they weren't supplying personally identifiable data.

Such acquiescence is normal, industry insiders say. "I don't know if a lot of companies are in the business of civil disobedience," says Bruce Bernstein, president of the New York Software Industry Association. "In most cases, they would ask counsel, and in most cases, the lawyers would tell them to follow the path of least resistance. And they'll comply."

Still, companies are wary of the risks of being seen as negligent on privacy. Such concerns got a high-profile showcase on Martin Luther King Jr. Day when Mr. Gore addressed the issue in a widely reported speech. "Any telecommunications company that has provided the government with access to private information concerning the communications of Americans without a proper warrant should immediately cease and desist their complicity in this apparently illegal invasion of the privacy of American citizens."

In the meantime, high-tech companies with membership in Business for Social Responsibility are scrambling to tighten and clarify their privacy policies for customers before the government comes knocking again, says a spokesperson for the San Francisco-based group. Its advice: be forthright with the public if you do supply the government with information, and don't forget you have rights.

In Case About Google's Secrets, Yours Are Safe (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google, by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web.

But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure.

The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants.

But "this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues," said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. "These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words."

In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. "Google objects," the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote, "because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets."

Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality.

"Google's acceding to the request would suggest that it is willing to reveal information about those who use its services," he wrote. "This is not a perception that Google can accept."

Even Google's allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google. But not on privacy grounds. "We will probably not be making that argument," said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union.

The issues raised by the new subpoena, while substantial, are fairly technical, according to Professor Wu. "The legal point here is what is the relevancy standard for subpoenas?" he said. "That is interesting to procedure scholars but to no one else."

Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved.

A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. "We specifically stated in our requests," he said, "that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google."

None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not.

The problem with the subpoena, Mr. Fine said, is more general. "This is another instance of government overreaching," he said.

The government says it needs Google's information to defend a challenge from the civil liberties union to a 1998 law, the Child Online Protection Act, which makes it a crime to make "material that is harmful to minors" commercially available on the Web. The law was enjoined by a federal court in Philadelphia before it became effective, and it has never been enforced.

In 2004, the United States Supreme Court affirmed the injunction, ruling that filtering devices may work as well or better than criminal prosecutions in achieving the law's aims of keeping some offensive materials away from children, and it sent the case back for a trial to explore that question.

At a trial scheduled to start in October, the government will try to prove that filters are ineffective. Philip B. Stark, an expert retained by the government and a statistics professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said in a court filing that the Web addresses and search terms sought from Google and other Internet companies would help him "to measure the effectiveness of content filters."

DOJ_NMG_0011903

The government apparently wants to show that real-world searches will pull up offensive materials that filters will not catch. Why it needs Google to do that is unclear, and Professor Stark declined a request for an interview, citing the pending litigation.

Google has not yet filed a response in court, and it has not discussed the case publicly beyond a brief statement citing government overreaching. Its fullest explanation of its position was in Mr. Ramani's letter in October.

Google objected, Mr. Ramani said, because the fit between what the government seeks and what it seeks to prove is poor. He also said that collecting and providing the information was burdensome and that the government could find it elsewhere.

Mr. Ramani did say that "one could envision scenarios" where Internet searches alone could reveal private information, but he provided no examples. But Google's main argument was that its "highly proprietary" trade secrets could be jeopardized.

Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a civil liberties group that has frequently been critical of Google, said the trade-secrets argument was a serious one.

In other contexts, Google and other Internet companies say they are serious about protecting privacy. But their privacy policies acknowledge that they will comply with valid requests from the government and private litigants. Google's policy, for instance, says it may share users' personal information if it has "a good faith belief" that disclosure "is reasonably necessary to satisfy any applicable law, regulation, legal process or enforceable government request." Nicole Wong, Google's associate general counsel, said in an interview that the company "complies with valid legal process."

According to a 2004 decision of a federal court in Virginia, America Online alone responds to about 1,000 criminal warrants each month. AOL, Google and other Internet companies also receive subpoenas in divorce, libel, fraud and other types of civil cases. With limited exceptions, they are required by law to comply.

Ms. Wong said Google tried to notify users so they could object in court before the company turned over information about them. But the law forbids such notification in some criminal cases.

Even notification can be small comfort. It means a user must quickly and often at considerable expense find a lawyer and try to persuade a court to quash the subpoena. But the law often offers very limited protection for personal information held by third parties.

That approach no longer makes sense, said Daniel J. Solove, a law professor at George Washington University. "In the information age," he said, "so much of our information is in the hands of third parties."

Mr. Rotenberg said Internet search records, if collected and linked to individuals, could give rise to a particularly profound invasion of privacy. "It's kind of the shadow of the thoughts within your head — your interests, your desires, your hobbies, your fears," he said.

The situation is more complicated outside the United States. Internet companies have complied with local laws, as they must to do business abroad. Yahoo, for instance, provided information that helped China send a journalist there to prison for 10 years on charges of leaking state secrets to a foreign Web site.

Still, the current subpoena to Google, legal experts said, has given rise to an important debate, whether the facts of the case are apt or not.

"It allows us to have a national dialogue about whether current privacy protections are adequate," said Susan P. Crawford, a specialist in Internet law at the Cardozo Law School. Even if the Justice Department is not seeking private information now, she said, "the next subpoena could ask for that kind of data."

`Key Player' Pleads Guilty To Morial-era City Hall Corruption (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A businessman described by federal prosecutors as a key player pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiring in a kickback scheme for the biggest contract signed while Marc Morial was New Orleans mayor.

Advertisement

Terry Songy oversaw a $65 million, 20-year contract to upgrade chillers, boilers, lights and other energy-related fixtures in city buildings for Johnson Controls Inc.

He admitted taking kickbacks from subcontractors, participating in a larger kickback conspiracy with the city's director of property management, and failing to file federal income tax returns for 2001, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

According to an indictment handed up in June, the kickbacks allegedly enriched some of the closest associates of Morial, who served two terms as mayor and now is president of the National Urban League. He has not been charged, and has refused to comment about the investigation.

Federal officials have said the contract cost New Orleans tens of thousands of unnecessary dollars, while benefiting the Morial associates handsomely.

Songy's sentencing was set April 19. He could get up to five years for conspiracy and three on the income tax charge, with a $250,000 fine for each — though first offenders rarely get the maximum sentence.

Five subcontractors pleaded guilty earlier to paying kickbacks.

When the six entered not guilty pleas in mid-August, prosecutors said they all were cooperating with the government and were likely to make plea agreements.

An affidavit filed with the guilty plea states that, after FBI agents approached him, Songy "admitted his involvement in a much larger scheme than the government was aware" of.

The indictment described Songy as sharing hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks with the three major defendants: Morial associates Stan "Pampy" Barre, a restaurant owner and Morial confidant, city property manager Kerry De Cay, and construction company owner Reginald Walker.

Barre, who also owned a Johnson Controls subcontractor called Commmon Street Ventures, allegedly shared $546,000 with co-conspirators. Walker's company received a large subcontract from Johnson Controls, prosecutors said.

All three have denied wrongdoing.

Their trial is scheduled Sept. 5 before U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier.

Six Indicted In Driver's License Fraud (TENN)

By CLAY CAREY, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, January 26, 2006

A widespread bribery scheme funneled hundreds of illegal aliens into a Winchester, Tenn.-based driving school, netting them fraudulent licenses. And six people, including one current and one former state employee, got more than $146,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday.

The U.S. attorney's office yesterday unsealed a six-count indictment of the six people who are accused of helping hundreds of people since May 2004 obtain driver's licenses they didn't earn. They have been charged with bribing state employees, accepting bribes and conspiracy.

About 100 people who got the fake licenses have been deported or are in the deportation process as a result of the investigation, federal authorities said.

"Just as in previous investigations, you had those who thought that what they did in secret would never come to light," said My Harrison, FBI special agent in charge for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee. The FBI was one of several agencies involved in the probe.

U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said the people who fraudulently received licenses weren't eligible for "a variety of reasons."

Officials also said most of those getting the licenses were in the country illegally.

The investigation, dubbed Operation Crooked Highway, has been under way by federal and state agencies for 18 months, Vines said yesterday.

Federal officials say two immigrants directed people, many immigrants themselves, to Winchester Driving School in Franklin County and paid for fraudulent third-party certification. In turn, the driving school allegedly paid two Department of Motor Vehicle clerks to provide licenses to those certificate holders.

Those named in the indictment are:

• Bryan Guess, 61, the owner and operator of Winchester Driving School, accused of accepting more than $46,000 to issue fraudulent third-party certificates on behalf of the driving school.

• Shelia Robertson, a former employee of the driving school, accused of paying bribes to state DMV worker Teresa Jones to help students get licenses and driving certificates.

• Teresa Jones, 48, a former DMV worker in the Mufreesboro office, accused of accepting $20 per person for about 1,000 Winchester Driving School students who obtained driver's licenses or driving certificates between March 2004 and May 2005. She worked for the state for a little more than a year and then was hired at Winchester Driving School in May 2005, federal officials said.

• Shun Gao, 24, an employee at a Murfreesboro Chinese restaurant, accused of funneling people to Winchester and paying the school, through an unidentified employee, $32,510 in exchange third-party certificates.

• Syed Abbas Parvez, 33, an alleged illegal immigrant accused of paying the driving school $1,100 in exchange for a third-party certificate, fake proof-of-residency documents and a regular driver's license for a Pakistani citizen whom Parvez had allegedly transported to Tennessee from Georgia.

• Bruce Conklin, 38, a DMV employee, accused of accepting $9,200 in cash from an employee at Winchester during the investigation and issuing about 50 driver's licenses to Shun Gao's clients between August and December 2005. State Department of Safety officials said Conklin is on paid administrative leave while the case is pending.

Several driving schools in the state can issue third-party certificates. They administer the state's written and road driving tests and, if students pass, they get a certificate. From there, the DMV will issue a license or driving certificate if they pass a vision test, residency check and other routine measures.

All six face conspiracy charges that carry up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Charges of accepting bribes or bribing state employees carry maximum sentences of 10 years and fines up to $250,000.

News of the indictments prompted state Sen. Bill Ketron of Murfreesboro to again call for tighter regulations on the license requirements. Last year, Ketron pushed a bill that requires applicants to provide a valid Social Security number or documentation from the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, but it didn't get out of the transportation committee.

"At the risk of sounding really bad, it's a good start," said Theresa Harmon, co-founder of Tennesseans for Responsible Immigration Polices, a group that has called for stricter standards.

The indictments "may help deter some state workers who may take money under the table," Harmon said. "But the ones who come here to get those driver's certificates, they're crossing the desert to get here. There just isn't that much of a deterrent for those people."

Revoking immigrants' abilities to get driving certificates won't make roads any safer, according to Stephen Fotopulos, policy coordinator for the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Council. Most immigrants and refugees who attain those documents do so through legal means, he said.

The council has pushed for measures making it easier for immigrants to get driver's licenses in Tennessee and has spoken out against racial profiling and other practices that it believes violate the civil rights of immigrants.

"The immigration system is broken, and there are many symptoms of it being broken in Tennessee," he said. "But the more we, as a society, try to alienate immigrants and refugees, the more they are open to exploitation." •

The FBI's My Harrison, right, discusses a conspiracy to obtain driver's licenses for people who were not eligible. U.S. Attorney Jim Vines, left, said most of those getting fake licenses were in the country illegally. (AP)

FBI Arrests License Examiner (MDN)

Murfreesboro Daily News, January 26, 2006

Federal agents indicted three people Wednesday in a conspiracy to take payments for providing driver's licenses to illegal immigrants at the Murfreesboro driver testing center.

The FBI charged driver's license examiner Bruce Conklin with taking about $9,200 in cash from July 2005 to January. Agents also charged Bryan Guess, owner of the Winchester Driving School next to the testing center on Samsonite Boulevard, with paying bribes to Conklin and a former examiner, Teresa Jones.

Operation Crooked Highway: Federal Prosecutors Charge Six With Driver's License Fraud (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) - Federal prosecutors charged six people, including two state driver's license examiners, Wednesday with a conspiracy to issue possibly thousands of fraudulent driving licenses and certificates to illegal immigrants.

A federal indictment lists charges ranging from paying bribes, taking bribes and transporting illegal workers into the state to get the fraudulent driving documents. Authorities said they won't know how many illegal documents were issued until all evidence is studied and declined to speculate on the total.

They did say that one state worker accepted $20 per student in bribes for about 1,000 licenses or certificates. "We come to you with another sad chapter in the book of public corruption in Tennessee," FBI agent in charge My Harrison said at an afternoon news conference. Two of those charged worked at the driver's license examining station in Murfreesboro, a Nashville suburb.

Tennessee began licensing illegal immigrants in early 2001 but in response to terrorism concerns switched in 2004 to issuing driving certificates that are labeled not to be used for identification. The indictment unsealed Wednesday says that Safety Department employee Bruce Conklin and former employee Teresa Jones took bribes from a driving school. Conklin is accused of taking $9,200 in cash payments from July through January while Jones allegedly got $20,000 from May 2004 through March. Bryan Guess, who owns the Winchester Driving School, was charged along with former school worker Sheila Robertson with paying bribes between May 2004 and March 2005.

Jones went to work for the driving school after she left state government. Prosecutors said Winchester Driving School had a contract with the state to issue "third-party certificates" after providing six hours of driving instruction and administering written and road driving tests to students.

According to the indictment, the school was accepting money to issue the third-party certificate without any training or tests. Shun Gao was charged with paying cash to the school in exchange for the certificates.

Syed Abbas Parvez, an illegal immigrant living in Georgia, was charged with transporting another illegal immigrant from Pakistan to Tennessee to get a fraudulent license through the driving school.

The joint federal-state investigation was dubbed Operation Crooked Highway. About 100 illegal immigrants are being deported as a result of the investigation, federal immigration agent Rick Crocker said.

U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said three people, including a former state worker at a driver's license station in the Nashville suburb of Gallatin, had already pleaded guilty in the case. Vines credited the Safety Department with starting the investigation. "They did a fantastic job of cleaning their own house," he said. Interim Safety Commissioner Gerald Nicely said the department is studying an overhaul of licensing procedures, including how to prevent fraud. "Obviously what we're doing here today will be a big deterrent," he said.

The Safety Department has been at the center of a series of scandals, including Highway Patrol officers with criminal backgrounds, ticket-fixing and an atmosphere of political favoritism. Nicely has been assigned there temporarily to help develop a reform plan.

Wednesday's indictment follows arrests last July in East Tennessee of an illegal immigrant from Argentina and her boyfriend on charges they shuttled other illegal immigrants from New Jersey to Tennessee to get fraudulent licenses and certificates.

Citing a number of recent public corruption investigations in Tennessee, Harrison said agents were getting better with practice. "If you can hear me and are involved in public corruption, the eyes of law enforcement are upon you," she said.

Six Indicted In Alleged License Scheme (NASHCP)

By CHRIS LEWIS

Nashville City Paper, January 26, 2006

Two workers at a state driver's license station in Murfreesboro allegedly received thousands of dollars in bribes from a driving school to issue at least 1,000 fraudulent driver's licenses and certificates, authorities said Wednesday.

Flanked by a host of state and federal officials, U.S. Attorney for Middle Tennessee Jim Vines announced that a total of six people, including two from the Winchester Driving School, were indicted by a grand jury Jan. 18 on federal charges involving conspiracy to commit bribery.

It's the latest "sad chapter" in a string of Tennessee public corruption cases, said My Harrison, special agent in charge of the FBI for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee.

"You've heard of Operation Tennessee Waltz, Operation Tarnish Blue and Operation Tarnish Shield," she said. "What can I say? Same game, only the names have changed. The title of this new chapter is, Operation Crooked Highway."

The 18-month investigation was a cooperative effort by the Tennessee Highway Patrol, state Department of Safety, FBI, Immigrations and Customs Enforcement and IRS.

As a result, customs officials took into custody 50 undocumented immigrants and began deportation proceedings against 50 other immigrants who were uncovered in the investigation, said Rick Crocker, assistant special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"It runs the gamut of countries," he said. "It's not just Mexico."

The Winchester Driving School – which lists offices in Columbia, Murfreesboro, Nashville and Winchester – is one of several institutions that contract with the state to train and test drivers. It issues third-party certificates as documented proof that a student has passed all necessary requirements.

Those certificates can be exchanged for a driver's license or driver's certificate (for non-U.S. citizens) at a state driver's license station, provided the applicants pass other state checks.

The attorney's office alleges that the school, for a fee, would provide students with certificates without the required 36 hours of instruction and arranged to have them meet with "friendly" state license examiners.

Bryan Guess, owner and operator of Winchester Driving School, and his former employee, Sheila Robertson, are accused of paying off two examiners at the Murfreesboro station.

Calls placed to an answering service for the school were not returned by deadline Wednesday.

Bruce Conklin, an examiner who was arrested at the Murfreesboro station Wednesday, is accused of accepting $9,200 in bribes. Teresa Jones, a former temporary worker at the station who now works for Winchester, is accused of accepting $20,000 in cash for issuing licenses to 1,000 driving school students in exchange for $20 each.

Also indicted is Shun Gao, a Chinese restaurant worker in Murfreesboro who officials say brought numerous clients to the school to help them obtain the fraudulent licenses. Authorities say Gao paid the unidentified Winchester employee about $32,500 to get the third-party certificates.

Syed Abbas Parvez, an undocumented resident of Georgia, is charged with transporting an undocumented Pakistan citizen to Tennessee and arranging for him to get a fraudulent license.

If convicted, the defendants face up to 10 years in jail and fines of up to $250,000, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In addition to the latest indictments, three other people pleaded guilty last year in connection with the alleged driver's license scheme, officials said.

The multi-agency investigation is part of a nation-wide effort called "Operation Broken Wheel" that has been in effect since 2003 to uncover incidents of fraudulent driver's license issuance, said George Bolds, supervisory special agent for the FBI.

IRS Agent Grilled About Ryan Campaign Fund Expenses (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2006

A government agent on Wednesday downplayed that former Gov. George Ryan filed corrected tax returns for 1995, 1996 and 1997 several years later because Ryan knew by then of the federal investigation into his finances.

Shari Schindler, an Internal Revenue Service agent, said that by the time Ryan filed the amended returns in late 2002, each of his six children had testified before the grand jury and there had been press coverage of the nature of the probe.

During three days on the witness stand, Schindler said her review of Ryan's records indicated he intentionally omitted from tax returns for 1995 through 1998 a combined $80,000 in campaign funds that had been spent on personal expenses and should have been declared as income.

At issue were payments of $55,000 to a son-in-law in financial trouble because of a gambling addiction and $9,675 in payments that Ryan allegedly concealed from former U.S. Sen. Phil Gramm's failed 1996 presidential campaign.

On cross-examination Wednesday, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, focused on campaign expenditures Ryan made on nearly a dozen personal vacations between 1995 and 1997.

Webb contended that records showed Ryan had paid taxes on most of the travel expenses, but that certain charges hadn't been itemized in campaign disclosure reports, fell through the cracks and mistakenly weren't reported on Ryan's returns.

On Tuesday, Webb hauled eight volumes of tax laws and regulations to the witness stand to question Schindler about how Ryan was supposed to know about complicated, arcane IRS rules.

Through her questioning of Schindler on Wednesday, Assistant U.S. Atty. Laurie Barsella pointed out that Roger Bickel, Ryan's former chief lawyer, had spelled out for Ryan "in plain English" that personal use of campaign funds had to be reported on his tax returns.

Yet Ryan failed to tell his accountants about the $55,000 in campaign funds spent on Michael Fairman, the son-in-law whose gambling led to his bankruptcy, Schindler said.

On cross-examination, Webb also pressed the point that Ryan's campaign records were so incomplete that many expense reimbursement checks cashed by Ryan were missing. The defense has suggested that could have been Ryan's source of cash, not bribes from co-defendant Lawrence Warner and other friends to whom he steered lucrative state business.

Meanwhile, Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins said he still hopes to rest the prosecution case on Thursday after four months of testimony. The FBI's case agent is scheduled to be the government's last witness.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer, who is presiding over the trial, ruled Wednesday that prosecutors can play a portion of a videotape of Ryan from November when he made a statement to reporters outside the court defending his receipt of $9,675 from the Gramm campaign.

In his only public statement during the trial, Ryan lashed out after Gramm testified he never knew or approved of the payments to Ryan and wouldn't pay an officeholder for an endorsement. "It is basically that it's a difference between love and prostitution," Gramm said.

Since that comment came outside the jury's presence, Pallmeyer barred a defense request to play the portion of the videotape in which Ryan angrily reacted to Gramm's testimony and blasted his former political ally's character.

Pallmeyer ruled, though, that prosecutors could air Ryan's remarks at the time about how he worked hard for Gramm's campaign, saying, "I earned every penny" of the consulting fee.

Ryan passed the money on to four daughters, who did little or no work for the campaign, according to testimony. He is charged with failing to pay taxes on the income.

Also Wednesday, an agreed-upon statement from the lawyers was read to jurors that a reporter for a Springfield newspaper wrote a story in 2001 quoting Ryan as saying a family caretaker had been paid with campaign funds for political work she did.

Nancy Smith of Kankakee, who cared for the elderly mother of Ryan's wife, Lura Lynn, before her death, testified earlier in the trial that she hadn't done any campaign work for Ryan. She was paid $6,000 from Ryan campaign funds in 1998, a personal expense that Ryan failed to report on his tax return, prosecutors charge.

mo'connor@tribune.com

Federal Prosecutors Hoping To Wrap Up Case Against Ryan By The Weekend (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 26, 2006

CHICAGO - Prosecutors are hoping to rest the government's case against George Ryan before the weekend but admit it might be a tight squeeze to cram all the remaining evidence in without spilling into Monday - the 18th week of the marathon racketeering and fraud trial.

Prosecutors indicated Wednesday night that just one more prosecution witness remains - Raymond Ruebenson, the veteran FBI man who has long been the case agent for the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road investigation that led to the former governor's indictment.

But Ruebenson was absent with a case of the flu Wednesday. Even if he is well enough to take the witness stand Thursday, prosecutors are hoping to shoehorn videos of Ryan talking with reporters into the trial record before they sit down and let defense attorneys take over.

And U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer plans to recess early for the weekend Thursday, giving them less time to wrap things up. So there is no guarantee the prosecution will rest.

On Wednesday, a verbal fencing match between Ryan's lawyer, Dan K. Webb, and Internal Revenue Service agent Shari Schindler came to an end with no one sure who emerged the victor.

Webb repeatedly tried to get her to agree that Ryan couldn't be blamed if he failed to report thousands of dollars in income because he was grappling with vague, complex tax laws.

Schindler coolly disagreed, saying Ryan easily could have asked his tax advisers.

"Did Ryan's lawyer spell out in plain English for him and more than once that personal use of campaign funds must be reported as income to him?" federal prosecutor Laurie Barcella asked.

"Yes," Schindler said.

Ryan, 71, and longtime friend Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count indictment with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. Prosecutors say Ryan failed to report $80,000 in income over four years, much of it money he withdrew from the Citizens for Ryan campaign fund.

Ryan filed two batches of amended tax returns, one in 1998 and another in 2002, and paid most of the money prosecutors say was owing.

He isn't charged with offenses stemming from the additional money that he paid along with his amended returns in 1998. But prosecutors refused to credit him with the money he paid along with his 2002 amended returns, saying the investigation had already begun.

Webb suggested Ryan hadn't been officially notified of the investigation when he filed his amended returns in December 2002. But Schindler testified that earlier in 2002 five Ryan children and his son-in-law had testified before a federal grand jury looking into the former governor's taxes and that newspapers were full of reports about the investigation.

Before their duel was over, Webb took Schindler item by item through every bit of allegedly unreported income, from a dinner at Zorba's restaurant in Palm Springs that was charged to the campaign fund to $55,000 in money from the fund that he gave to a debt-ridden son-in-law.

Pointing to plane tickets to Las Vegas for Ryan and Cook County Republican Chairman Manny Hoffman after the 1996 Republican National Convention, Webb suggested they might be considered a bona fide entertainment expense for the campaign fund in view of Hoffman's status.

"If they wanted to entertain him at the Republican convention, then I would consider that, but this was a private trip after the convention was over," Schindler said.

One observer who considered the duel evenly matched was Ryan co-defendant Warner, who approached reporters after court and volunteered that he was impressed with both participants.

"If you ask me, Dan Webb earned his reputation today," Warner said. But he added: "She held her own with him."

Accused City Clerk: 'Somebody Is Lying And It Isn't Me' (CHIT)

By Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2006

Facing federal corruption charges, a defiant James Laski vowed Wednesday to "keep fighting," insisted his office is running smoothly and took sharp issue with claims he was away from his job as Chicago city clerk for a prolonged period before charges were filed.

"Somebody is lying, and it isn't me," Laski declared.

The clerk's comments came after a surprise appearance at a City Council committee meeting, his first visit to the council chamber in nearly two months—a period during which a federal investigation culminated in bribery and obstruction-of-justice charges against him.

Laski attended a meeting of the council's Budget Committee in which aldermen advanced a measure designed to eliminate a loophole used by some city sticker scofflaws. The clerk's office issues stickers and cites motorists who fail to buy them.

Laski was not called upon to speak on the matter, but he made a show of walking onto the floor where he shook hands and chatted briefly with several aldermen.

"I wanted them to tell you I am here today, just in case you didn't see me," Laski said sarcastically to reporters as he walked from the council chamber, on the second floor of City Hall, to the clerk's first-floor office.

Laski is charged with taking bribes in return for obtaining city business for a trucking company and then trying to cover up the arrangement as federal agents investigated.

The company, Get Plowed Inc., was operated by Michael "Mick" Jones, a longtime Laski friend and top official in the clerk's office, and Jones' wife Traci, who also works in the office.

The Joneses secretly recorded Laski, who federal prosecutors contend referred to the bribes on tape and sought to prevent the couple from providing information to the government.

Laski implied Wednesday that exonerating portions of the recordings were not released when the U.S. attorney's office announced the charges against him on Jan. 13.

"Have you heard all of them?" he asked reporters. "Listen to all of them.... There are many more stories to be told."

The four Chicago police bodyguards assigned to Laski were withdrawn earlier this month because of his alleged absence from his office.

On Tuesday, First Deputy Police Supt. Dana Starks said he pulled the officers after they reported that Laski was not going to work.

"Mr. Starks and everybody is telling you things, and you believe that kind of stuff," Laski responded on Wednesday. "Why don't you check my office? Why don't you check [with] people in my office?"

Laski insisted he has been at work.

The exceptions have been a two-week vacation in December and days he was off for medical reasons, he said.

"I was taking tests at the hospital for my stomach," he said.

Laski said he has a history of stomach problems, and he added, "I guess stress would make anything worse."

Laski intentionally stayed away from the last three City Council meetings because of what he contends would have been the resulting "media circus."

But he said he will be in his usual spot on the dais just below Mayor Richard Daley at the next meeting on Feb. 8 , an announcement sure to attract a media throng.

Laski would not say whether he would ask for a reinstatement of his police detail. But "I am taking care of business, with or without bodyguards," he asserted.

The security contingent "was in place before I even came on board," and the officers assigned to him spent part of their time issuing citations to motorists whose vehicles did not have city stickers, he said.

"Check their logs. They wrote tickets constantly, generating revenue for the City of Chicago, OK?"

Laski was asked if he is going to beat the criminal charges.

"I am going to keep fighting," he replied. "I am going to keep fighting."

Aldermen greeted by him on Wednesday said Laski stressed his on-duty status.

"He basically said: 'I'm here—here I am in living flesh and blood. This is me,'" said Ald. Freddrenna Lyle (6th).

While there has been much speculation at City Hall about who might replace the clerk, there were no calls Wednesday for Laski to resign or take a leave of absence pending the outcome of his case.

DOJ_NMG_0011911

"There is a presumption of innocence," said Ald. Thomas Allen (38th), an attorney. "That is what our system is built on. Politically and personally, there may be other factors that weigh in his decision, but from a lawyer's perspective, they have charged him with something. They have to prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt. Everybody is entitled to that."

"Hell no, I wouldn't quit," declared Ald. Bernard Stone (50th). "Why should he quit? As I understand it, he hasn't admitted doing anything wrong up to this point."

gwashburn@tribune.com

Ex-Campbell Hire Testifies Loyalty Vital (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs , Jeffry Scott, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2006

Only months after being hired by Bill Campbell, Michael Sullivan testified Wednesday that he tasted what he described as the good life with the former Atlanta mayor.

Campbell's former contracts compliance director said he also learned hard lessons about discretion, but especially loyalty.

Sullivan, called by the prosecution, testified in Campbell's federal corruption trial that in 1994 he and the former mayor, along with city contractor Ricky Rowe, traveled together to Florida to attend a golf and tennis tournament sponsored by Black Enterprise magazine.

Sullivan said the city paid for his trip. He said he was unsure of who paid for Campbell's but noticed that when he and Rowe were checking out of the hotel, Rowe used his credit card for Campbell's incidentals. Sullivan told Campbell about it.

"He was upset that I allowed Mr. Rowe to pay for his incidentals," Sullivan told the jury. "He told me that you can't use a credit card to pay for things like that. It leaves a trail. He was upset about the manner it was paid for and a credit card receipt being generated."

The theme of loyalty to the mayor was played over and over Wednesday, witness after witness, as prosecutors tried to establish that City Hall under Campbell, who was mayor from 1994 until 2002, was a den of cronyism and deal-making between Campbell, his friends and political allies.

None of the prosecution's witnesses testified that Campbell made them do anything illegal, nor did they say they saw Campbell doing anything criminal.

The prosecution, however, has argued that it is first trying to establish a pattern of behavior and later witnesses will produce evidence of criminality. U.S. District Judge Richard Story had ruled prosecutors could use additional evidence to establish a pattern of Campbell's activities.

Among the witnesses for the prosecution Wednesday were former Campbell Chief Operating Officer Byron Marshall and Doug Hooker, a former commissioner of Public Works, both of whom, like Sullivan, testified about how vital loyalty was to Campbell.

Marshall said the debate over loyalty vs. competence became a running joke between him and Campbell. During his two days of testimony, Marshall said he and Campbell often battled over hires and what qualifications they needed.

During cross-examination, Campbell lead attorney Billy Martin asked Marshall if Campbell ever hired someone who wasn't competent.

"No one who is outright, totally incompetent," Marshall said. "But, there were people hired who were incompetent in their jobs."

When it came to city contracts, Marshall said he advocated a "transparent" bidding process once at a meeting. He said Campbell called him aside to complain he had not discussed the idea with the mayor first. Campbell never adopted the plan, Marshall said. He also said Campbell often interceded on contractors' behalf.

Another witness for the prosecution, Steven Baker, a former deputy general manager at Hartsfield International Airport, testified that in fall 1995 he was summoned to Campbell's office about an airport concessions contract that Rowe's company wanted to bid.

"He said, 'Ricky and [his wife] Dott are friends of mine. I expect you to take care of them.'" Baker testified he later wrote a memo complaining about the incident but has since lost it. Rowe died in 2004.

On cross-examination, Martin pressed Baker: "When you went in to see the mayor he didn't ask you to bribe anybody, did he?"

"No," Baker said.

Sullivan, the former contracts compliance director, said to make it easier for the mayor to identify contractors who were loyal to him he drew up a grid of potential contractors, putting an asterisk beside names that contributed to his political campaigns.

"He was pleased to have that information," Sullivan said.

Wis. Official Indicted Over Contract (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Filed at 12:44 a.m. ET

MADISON, Wis. (AP) -- An official in Gov. Jim Doyle's administration was indicted on two felony counts Tuesday for her role in awarding a state travel contract to a company whose executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign.

The federal indictment alleges that Georgia Thompson, chief of the Department of Administration's procurement bureau, tried to give her bosses political advantage and help her own job security.

Doyle's fundraising has become an issue in the Democrat's re-election bid this fall, with Republicans charging ethical lapses.

The indictment alleges wrongdoing by no one but Thompson.

Doyle was in Iraq visiting troops Tuesday. Thompson and her attorney did not return phone calls.

Thompson, 55, who was hired before Doyle took office in 2003, served on a committee that awarded a contract to Adelman Travel as part of an effort to cut travel costs. The indictment said she inflated the company's scores used to award the contract.

Questions were raised this summer after media reports that Adelman's CEO donated $10,000 to Doyle before the contract went into effect. An Adelman board member gave another $10,000 afterward, finance reports show.

Thompson faces as many as 20 years in prison if convicted of fraud and misapplication of funds.

Broderick Faces Jail Time After Guilty Plea In U.S. Court (FARMNT)

By TALI ISRAELI, Staff Writer

Farmingdale (NJ) News Transcript, January 26, 2006

MARLBORO — Thomas Broderick, a former public official, pleaded guilty in federal court last week to one count of money laundering.

Broderick, 56, served on the Township Council in the 1990s. He is a former assistant supervisor at the Monmouth County Division of Highways and a former Monmouth County undersheriff. He is a retired New York Police Department officer.

Broderick was one of the 11 Monmouth County officials who were arrested on Feb. 22, 2005 in an FBI investigation known as “Operation Bid Rig.”

According to the U.S. Attorney’s Office in Newark, Broderick pleaded guilty on Jan. 18 before U.S. District Judge William J. Martini. Broderick admitted that he accepted $15,000 for assisting in the laundering of large sums of cash from a cooperating government witness whom he believed was a corrupt demolition contractor.

Broderick faces a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. He is scheduled to be sentenced on April 27. Broderick remains free on $50,000 bail.

According to the charges, in May 2004 Broderick was introduced to the cooperating witness by a member of the Keyport Borough Council (subsequently identified as Robert Hyer, who has since died) and by an unnamed Monmouth County official.

Broderick believed the cooperating witness to be involved in construction work, extortionate illegal loan sharking and money laundering. Two law enforcement officers went undercover as employees of the cooperating witness.

Following the introduction, several money laundering transactions were made between Broderick and the cooperating witness.

DOJ_NMG_0011913

"Broderick entered into these transactions with a stunning eagerness and returned to feed at the trough repeatedly," U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a press release. "Unfortunately, there were plenty of others in Monmouth County who knew each other, spread the word between them, and followed their corrupt instincts as well."

In his guilty plea, Broderick specifically admitted conducting the following money laundering transactions:

• On May 4, 2004, Broderick met the cooperating witness and exchanged a $45,000 check for a brown paper bag containing $50,000 in cash.

• On May 17, 2004, Broderick exchanged a check for $22,500 for $25,000 in cash from the cooperating witness.

• On Sept. 14, 2004, Broderick provided another check for $22,500 in exchange for $25,000 in cash from the undercover agent acting as an employee of the cooperating witness.

• In October 2004, Broderick provided two checks totaling $45,000 to the undercover agent in exchange for $50,000 in cash.

Broderick also admitted to giving a portion of the money laundering proceeds to the unnamed Monmouth County official for his role in setting up the transactions.

In a press release dated Jan. 19, state Sen. Ellen Karcher (D-Monmouth and Mercer), of Marlboro, said Broderick's guilty plea is another embarrassment for the people of Monmouth County.

"Though it may be dismaying to read that yet another Monmouth official will be going to jail, we should be encouraged that corrupt practices, that for years went unnoticed, are now being dragged into the light of day," Karcher said.

"As a former undersheriff for Monmouth County, Broderick should have known that crime doesn't pay, but reports that he eagerly and frequently accepted bribes from a cooperating federal witness seem to suggest otherwise. Thankfully, he'll have a lot of time to catch up on the lessons he missed the first time around, considering he faces a maximum of 20 years in prison for his crimes," Karcher said.

In one of the documents released by Christie last week, Broderick is quoted as having said to the cooperating witness following their first transaction on May 4, 2004, "I wish I would have known you sooner."

Attorney Robert S. Bonney, who represented Broderick, could not be reached for comment.

Contractor Serving Socom Gets Probation, Fine (TAMPTRIB)

Tampa Tribune, January 26, 2006

TAMPA - A contractor formerly employed by U.S. Special Operations Command was sentenced Wednesday to three years probation and a $4,500 fine for his role in a bribery scheme that has tarnished the war fighting organization's reputation for acquiring equipment used by the nation's elite fighting forces.

U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called William E. Burke's crime ``scary`` and a ``bad thing,`` could have saddled him with a prison term of up to 16 months and a heftier fine.

But Bucklew opted for the lighter penalties mainly because Burke has been cooperating with federal law enforcement agents examining contracting practices at Socom, which is headquartered at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa.

Burke pleaded guilty to bribery Oct. 14.

Burke and his attorney, Daniel Hernandez , refused to answer questions before or after the nearly one-hour session in Bucklew's chambers.

Robert O'Neill, the assistant U.S. attorney prosecuting the case, said it would not be appropriate for him to comment on the sentence.

During the hearing, however, O'Neill told the judge that sentencing Burke to jail could cause logistical challenges in the upcoming trial of Thomas F. Spellissy, the former Army colonel who formed a defense consulting company months before he retired from Socom in January 2005.

In late 2004 and early 2005, Spellissy paid $4,500 to Burke, who used his position at the command to favor Spellissy's clients seeking to do business with Socom, according to court documents. More ``illegal payments`` were expected to change hands ``down the road,`` prosecutors charged.

DOJ_NMG_0011914

Burke worked for Sentel Corp. and had been assigned to Socom's acquisition directorate since 1999. In June 2005, several months after federal agents began their investigation, he was barred from entering Socom headquarters. Burke is no longer employed by Sentel.

Spellissy, of Clearwater, has been indicted on charges of bribery, conspiracy and wire fraud. He has pleaded not guilty and his trial is scheduled to begin in April.

Paper: Texas Favored Firm Tied To Abramoff (AP-Y2)

AP2, January 26, 2006

The state of Texas hired a firm with close ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff after rejecting competing bids that met more of its selection criteria and cost less, a newspaper reported Wednesday.

What the winning firm, Cassidy & Associates, had was access all the way to presidential aide Karl Rove, the Austin American-Statesman reported, citing memos and e-mails it obtained through a Texas open records request.

The firm was awarded a $15,000-a-month contract in 2004 to lobby Congress for the state.

"Cassidy is the best fit for Texas," David Pagan, associate director of the Office of State-Federal Relations, said in a May 25, 2004, e-mail to staff members. He wrote that the firm was the leader in Washington in acquiring federal funding.

Cassidy & Associates is under fire from Texas House Democrats because of the close ties between Cassidy senior vice president Todd Boulanger and Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud.

Seven Texas House Democrats sent a letter to Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, on Friday demanding that Cassidy's contract be canceled.

Perry's spokeswoman, Kathy Walt, said that although Cassidy was not initially the top scorer in the bidding process, it rose to the top after interviews with the state's selection committee and after its references were checked.

Cassidy was one of 17 firms that competed for the contract to represent the state.

An initial state assessment ranked Cassidy fourth, the newspaper said. Two of the firms ranked ahead of it would have charged Texas $300 to $833 less per month than Cassidy's initial offer of $15,833 a month.

Once the contract was signed, Cassidy's fee was down to $15,000, plus expenses.

Cyberattacker Pleads Guilty (FCW)

By Bob Brewin

Federal Computer Week, January 26, 2006

A hacker indicted for creating botnet armies that infected Defense Information Systems Agency networks and computers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake, Calif., pleaded guilty to the charges at a hearing earlier this week in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, the Justice Department said.

Justice said James Ancheta 20, of Downey, Calif, entered guilty pleas of conspiring to violate the Computer Fraud Abuse Act and causing damage to computers used in national defense.

Justice said the prosecution of Ancheta was the first of its kind in the United States against a hacker who used botnets, armies of computers infected with Trojan horse programs that allowed Ancheta to remotely control the computers. Justice said Ancheta controlled more than 400,000 computers as part of his botnet armies, which in turn infected other computers with unwanted adware.

Ancheta agreed to pay $15,000 in restitution to DISA and the Naval Air Warfare Center for damage he caused to their networks and computers. He also forfeited $60,000 in cash and a BMW, which he gained in payment for using his botnets to distribute adware.

Former Execs For Mail-order Company Outline Fraudulent Practices (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 26, 2006

CINCINNATI - Former executives of a mail-order firm admitted that the company bilked buyers out of more than $100 million by charging credit cards without permission and offering refund guarantees it had no intention of honoring.

DOJ_NMG_0011915

Four former executives of Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals Inc. detailed their involvement Wednesday with the Cincinnati-based company that sold vitamins and supplements for a variety of ills from fatigue to sexual disfunction.

The four executives filed written statements as part of an agreement to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati to charges of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud.

Federal agencies - including the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service and the Food and Drug Administration - have been investigating Berkeley, which is behind the popular "Smiling Bob" ads. The spots chronicle a down-on-his-luck man who improves his life after using Enzyte for natural male enhancement.

The former executives said Berkeley's vitamins and supplements - marketed as stress reducers, sex enhancers and diet boosters - weren't supported by strong medical proof, according to court documents.

Company ads contained fake surveys and doctor endorsements, and the company touted double or triple money-back guarantees without following through, the former executives said.

Sales representatives were told to overstate the effectiveness of the pills, and the company's director of customer care didn't exist, they wrote.

The company also altered credit card numbers and expiration dates to bring in more money, they said.

Berkeley did not return an e-mail message seeking comment from The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer.

The suspects have agreed to cooperate in the investigation as part of the plea agreement. No sentencing date has been set.

The four include the former president, vice president, controller and a division head.

Berkeley was founded in 2001. It generated approximately $250 million in sales in 2004, mostly from telephone orders spurred by television ads.

Jury Convicts Accused Iraqi Agent On Six Of Seven Counts (AP)

By Rick Callahan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2006

(AP) - INDIANAPOLIS-Jurors on Wednesday convicted a Palestinian migrant accused of being an Iraqi agent on six federal charges but could not reach a decision on a charge that he tried to sell to Saddam Hussein's regime the names of U.S. operatives and agents.

Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 53, showed little reaction as the federal jury returned its verdicts finding him guilty of six of seven counts, including acting as an unregistered foreign agent, violating sanctions against Iraq, conspiracy and witness tampering.

They could not decide his guilt on a charge of violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act by allegedly trying in late 2002 to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Iraq for $3 million (â,¬2.44 million). No evidence was presented during his trial, however, that he had access to that classified information.

U.S. District Judge John Tinder set sentencing for April 13 on the six convictions.

He said he would seek a hearing for sometime next week to discuss a retrial on charges of offering to sell U.S. secrets to Saddam Hussein's government.

Shaaban represented himself during an 11-day trial that included testimony by a former Iraqi intelligence officer. He repeatedly contended that the government had confused him with a dead identical twin brother who worked for the CIA.

Mike Donahoe, an attorney who advised Shaaban during the trial, said an appeal is likely.

"I'm disappointed in the verdict," he said. "I don't think he represents a threat to our national security."

Donahoe said Shaaban plans to continue to represent himself through his sentencing.

In tape recordings played in his trial, Shaaban told an FBI undercover agent he never had a list of agents but that he had hoped to receive the information from a Russian contact.

Shaaban was working as an Indiana truck driver when he was arrested last March after a yearlong FBI-led investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0011916

Prosecutors said Shaaban was trained as a spy in the former Soviet Union and, after emigrating to the U.S., legally changed his name in 1997 to Joe Brown. He also went by the name Shaaban S. Hafed and several other names, according to his indictment.

Last March, FBI agents who raided his house in Greenfield, about 20 miles (32 kilometers) east of Indianapolis, allegedly found computer files praising Hussein and an unsigned contract proposing to recruit "human shields" to protect Iraq from the U.S. invasion.

Kidnap Suspects Face U.S. Charges (COX)

By Joe Giordano and Ken-Yon Hardy, Cox News Service

Cox News Service, January 26, 2006

OXFORD | The FBI on Wednesday brought criminal charges against three people accused in the abduction, assault and robbery of a Miami University freshman.

Sidney R. Jones, 23, of Richmond, Ind.; Katrina L. Jones, 18, of Oxford; and Seth R. Jett, 21, of Richmond were turned over to federal custody Monday by local authorities, Special Agent Michael E. Brooks said.

The three had been detained at the Butler County Jail following their arrests Jan. 14 and 15 stemming from a case involving MU freshman Ryan Coli.

The charges were the result of a joint effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and the FBI in three states.

The three appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court where Magistrate Judge Timothy S. Hogan ordered them held pending a detention hearing Jan. 30, when the court will determine bond.

Brooks lauded the actions of two MU students who contacted police following Coli's disappearance.

"If (the students) had not immediately notified authorities with the significant information about the vehicle, (the authorities) probably would have not solved the case so quickly," Brooks said.

According to police, the two MU students were helping Coli back to his dormitory shortly before 3 a.m. Jan. 13 when some people pulled up in a van and offered Coli a ride.

The 19-year-old had trusted the three strangers to give him a ride to his Stanton Hall dorm.

Coli never made it to his dorm. He told police he was beaten and robbed of his cell phone and wallet and left stranded on Nine Mile Road in Union County, Ind.

The freshman found his way to a farmhouse where a resident called for help.

The kidnapping was one of four crimes against MU students reported since Jan. 9. The only arrests have come in the Coli case. Suspects in the other cases have not been identified, police said.

High Court To Hear Lethal-Injection Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide when death row inmates may challenge lethal injection as a method of capital punishment, in a surprise decision issued after the justices dramatically stopped the execution of a Florida prisoner who was already strapped to a gurney preparing to die.

Clarence E. Hill, 48, convicted of murdering a Pensacola police officer in 1982, had refused a final meal and needles had punctured his arm when the Supreme Court stayed his execution. The court said it would hear his claim that he should have an opportunity to argue that his civil rights would be violated because the chemicals used to execute him would cause excessive pain.

It is a claim that has been pressed with growing frequency by capital defense lawyers around the country in recent years -- but that has generally not yet succeeded, either in lower courts or at the Supreme Court.

Thirty-seven of the 38 death penalty states use lethal injection, as do the U.S. military and the federal government. Since the chemical mixtures in all jurisdictions are similar to those used in Florida, a victory for Hill at the Supreme Court could tie up the death penalty across the county in litigation, at least temporarily, legal analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0011917

"It certainly could be a mess," said Douglas A. Berman, a professor at Ohio State University who specializes in criminal law. According to the Death Penalty Information Center, an anti-death-penalty organization, at least 25 inmates are scheduled for execution between now and the end of June, when the court would probably issue a decision.

The Hill case does not ask the court to rule directly on the constitutionality of lethal injection -- which states adopted as an alternative to hanging, gas, electrocution and shooting -- even though Hill maintains that the particular mix of chemicals used in Florida would cause him an unconstitutional degree of suffering.

Rather, the case raises a procedural problem: what recourse there should be for a prisoner who finds out at or near the last minute that the method by which the state proposes to execute him might be "cruel and unusual" punishment.

Normally, death row inmates try to fight their sentences through claims that their constitutional rights were violated at trial. Congress and the Supreme Court have limited those appeals, known as petitions for habeas corpus, and once they run out, further efforts are generally not allowed.

But for years capital defense lawyers have argued that a separate federal civil rights statute creates a way to press constitutional claims between the time an inmate exhausts habeas corpus and the actual moment of execution.

Hill tried to persuade the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, based in Atlanta, to give him a day in court to argue against Florida's lethal-injection protocol, based in part on an article about lethal injection in the Lancet, a medical journal.

The article, published in 2005, said that 21 of 49 inmates executed by lethal injection in Arizona, Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina may have been conscious and feeling pain.

The 11th Circuit dismissed Hill's appeal, and he remained scheduled to die at 6 p.m. Tuesday. But the Supreme Court intervened, setting oral argument in the case for April 26.

The court's decision was a surprise to legal analysts because the court issued a stern rebuke of a similar last-minute challenge by a California death row inmate in 1992, and avoided the issue of permitting last-minute civil rights appeal in 2004. At that time it noted that "imposition of the death penalty presupposes a means of carrying it out."

But the court's most liberal members, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, have indicated an interest in the question of challenges to lethal injection.

In May 2005, they dissented from a 5 to 4 ruling that denied a stay of execution for a Missouri death row inmate on a similar issue.

Whether there would be five votes on the court to support Hill's claim is another question. The case is likely to be heard by a court that includes two new conservative justices appointed by President Bush: Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., whose Senate confirmation is expected this week.

The case is Hill v. Crosby , No. 05-8794.

Strapped To Gurney, Inmate Wins Stay; High Court To Hear Appeal (AP)

By Gina Holland, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

Hours after staying the execution of an inmate who was already strapped to a gurney, the Supreme Court said Wednesday it would hear arguments from the man who claims the drug cocktail used in lethal injections can cause excruciating pain.

Lethal injections are used in most states that have capital punishment, and there's been a growing dispute over the way they are carried out.

The Supreme Court has never found a specific form of execution to be cruel and unusual punishment, and the latest case from Florida does not give Court members that opportunity. The justices will, however, spell out what options are available to inmates with last-minute challenges to the way they will be put to death.

Florida inmate Clarence Hill, who filed the appeal, had been strapped to a gurney with intravenous lines running into his arms Tuesday night when he won a temporary Supreme Court stay, Hill's lawyer said. The stay was signed by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

The full Court announced Wednesday that the stay would be permanent until justices decide whether an appeals court was wrong to prevent Hill from challenging the lethal injection method.

DOJ_NMG_0011918

The argument is expected April 26, with a ruling before July.

"What a fantastic day. What a fantastic day," said Hill's attorney D. Todd Doss, who relayed the news to his client. "He was happy we get to go and present this to the U.S. Supreme Court."

Hill is on death row for killing a Pensacola, Fla., police officer after a bank robbery in 1982. Hill has converted to Islam and taken the name Razzaq Muhammad, although he does not use that name in court filings.

A Florida Department of Corrections spokeswoman said Hill would be moved off death watch, a cell block adjacent to the execution chamber, and back to death row.

Hill argues that the doses of three chemicals used in Florida executions -- sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride -- can cause pain. The first drug is a pain killer. The second one paralyzes the inmate and the third causes a fatal heart attack.

The final drug, potassium chloride, "burns intensely as it courses through the veins toward the heart," Doss wrote in the appeal. He said there is "a foreseeable risk of the gratuitous and unnecessary infliction of pain."

Hill's case allows the Court to revisit a 2004 ruling in an Alabama death case, in which justices said David Larry Nelson could pursue a last-ditch claim that his death by lethal injection would be unconstitutionally cruel because of his damaged veins.

While Hill does not have damaged veins, his appeal cites medical studies about the cocktail of drugs used by Florida and other states.

"The Court may be willing to broaden what can be considered as a civil rights claim," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the anti-capital punishment Death Penalty Information Center.

Dieter predicted that inmates facing executions in coming months will requests delays, based on the Hill case.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring, wrote the 2004 decision, which said that although Nelson had exhausted his traditional appeals, he should not have been barred from pursuing the issue that came up in the final days before the scheduled execution.

O'Connor said in the unanimous 2004 ruling that the Court was not going to "open the floodgates to all manner of method-of-execution challenges."

If appeals court Judge Samuel Alito is confirmed, as expected, to replace O'Connor, he will hear arguments and help decide the case.

The case is Hill v. Florida, 05-8794.

First Texas Inmate Put To Death This Year (AP)

The Associated Press, January 25, 2006

HUNTSVILLE - An Alabama man who was part of a ring that shuttled drugs from Texas to his home state was executed today for the slayings of four people in Houston nearly 14 years ago.

When asked by a warden if he had any final statement, Marion Dudley did not respond, kept his eyes closed and never turned his head toward witnesses in the chamber, which included one of his survivors and relatives of one of the people killed.

Eight minutes later at 6:16 p.m. CST, he was pronounced dead.

Dudley, 33, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., had said he wasn't at the house the night of June 20, 1992, where six people were shot, four of them fatally, in what authorities said was a drug dealer ripoff.

Dudley, who had record in his home state for burglary, assault, receiving stolen property and violating probation, was the first Texas inmate put to death this year.

Nineteen convicted killers were executed in 2005 as Texas maintained its notoriety as the nation's most active capital punishment state. Another inmate is set for lethal injection next week and three more next month. They are among more than a dozen Texas prisoners with execution dates in the first five months of this year.

Dudley's lawyer had hoped the U.S. Supreme Court would stop his punishment, arguing prosecutors improperly withheld from defense attorneys at his capital murder trial a letter to Alabama parole officials regarding an inmate from that state who testified against Dudley.

Attorney Ken McLean, however, said he wasn't optimistic.

DOJ_NMG_0011919

"Absolutely, it's a reach," he said. "But if it's the only thing you've got ..."

A few hours before his scheduled execution time, the high court rejected the appeal.

The two survivors identified the then 20-year-old Dudley as one of the three gunmen who barged into the home of Jose Tovar, 32, and his wife, Rachel, then 33.

In a recent interview on death row, Dudley said they were wrong.

"I was not," he said.

Jose Tovar was fatally shot in the head, as were his wife's son, Frank Farias, 17; Farias' girlfriend, Jessica Quinones, 19, who was seven months pregnant; and a neighbor Audrey Brown, 21, who had just stopped by to visit. Rachel Tovar and another friend, Nicholas Cortez, 22 at the time, survived.

All the victims were bound with towels or strips of sheets, hands tied behind their backs and nooses around their necks. Rachel Tovar managed to crawl to a neighbor's house for help.

Besides Dudley, Arthur "Squirt" Brown, of Tuscaloosa, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. Now 35, he remains on death row. A third man, Tony Dunson, also from Alabama and 19 at the time of the shootings, received a life sentence.

Police said the three previously had been at the Tovar house to buy drugs and knew drugs and money were there. Brown ran the ring that for nine months had been moving marijuana and cocaine from Houston to Tuscaloosa, authorities said.

A mini-van used as the getaway vehicle was recovered in the Alabama city, where evidence showed they bought a new Jeep SUV with cash, eventually traveling to Louisville, Ky., and Columbus, Ohio. About 2 1/2 weeks after the shootings, Dudley and Dunson were arrested in Fayetteville, N.C.

"My number one problem was women," Dudley said from death row. "I was running around. Everything went downhill from there... I just wanted to get money, easy money. And once you start getting easy money, it's so hard to slow down."

ID Theft Complaints Still Rising, But Rate Of Increase Slows (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Businesses, law-enforcement agencies and consumers may be beginning to turn the tide in the war against identity theft, data from the Federal Trade Commission suggest.

Identity-theft complaints were up again last year to nearly 256,000, the FTC said, but that was only 3.5% higher than the year before. In 2004, complaints rose by 15% and in 2003 by 33%.

Complaints about credit-card fraud -- the largest subset of identity theft -- declined 1.3% last year to 67,228, from 68,113 in 2004, and were also lower than the 2003 level. Total consumer-fraud complaints -- including identity theft -- totaled 686,683 last year, up slightly from 2004.

Industry officials and analysts say the development and widespread adoption of antifraud technologies are responsible for lower levels of card fraud. Visa USA Inc. said investments in its risk-management systems have reduced fraud levels to six cents for every $100 processed, down from 12 cents a decade ago.

Separately, the FTC is expected to announce today tough action against a company at the center of the personal-data industry. ChoicePoint Inc. is expected to agree to pay a multimillion-dollar penalty to settle alleged data-security violations stemming from a yearlong investigation by federal regulators, according to a person briefed on the matter. ChoicePoint spokesman Chuck Jones declined to comment.

ChoicePoint, which sells consumer data to financial institutions and government agencies, last February disclosed that criminals posing as legitimate businessmen had fraudulently obtained personal information on 145,000 people. That figure was later revised to 162,000 people.

In order to prevent fraud, many companies have turned to real-time fraud-scoring systems, which -- much like credit-scoring models -- assign three-digit scores to credit applications based on a variety of data confirmations and behavioral examinations. Steven Gal, vice president for corporate development at ID Analytics, a San Diego company that provides fraud-detection services, says his company screened over 250 million applications last year for potential fraud, a fourfold increase from 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0011920

The FTC figures offer a rare bit of hopeful news for consumers concerned that the recent string of security breaches at credit-card processors and banks will place them at risk, and for a financial industry continually under attack by computer fraud and other scams.

To be sure, identity theft remains a huge threat that costs businesses $50 billion a year and plunges victims into a draining, time-consuming battle to eradicate fraudulent activity. The FTC will release a survey this spring, but its most recent figures show that 10 million people, or roughly 4.6% of the adult population, are affected by identity theft each year, and that victims spend an average of $500 and 30 hours to clear their records.

The FTC report, based on data the agency receives from consumers, comes after a year of high-profile security lapses that exposed personal information belonging to more than 50 million consumers and familiarized many people with the crime of identity theft. Just yesterday, financial-services provider Ameriprise Financial Inc. announced that the theft of one of its employees' laptops had compromised the data of some 226,000 clients and current and former workers.

Such breaches have led to an outcry from consumer advocates, and lawmakers across the country moved to enact stiffer penalties and stronger protections. Legislation in Congress has stalled, but many states have enacted laws that force companies to disclose breaches or allow consumers to shield their credit reports from unauthorized access.

FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras stressed how important it is for consumers to file complaints when they are victimized, saying they "provide ammunition that helps law enforcers fight fraud and identity theft."

When the agency receives identity-theft complaints, they are analyzed, clustered with similar ones and made available to law-enforcement officials to assist with investigations and criminal trials. Betsy Broder, the attorney in charge of the FTC's identity-theft program, says the agency's database now contains more than one million complaints, which are used by law enforcement in investigations and criminal trials.

The FTC's complaint data showed that identity theft accounted for 37% of total fraud complaints. For the fourth year in a row, Washington, D.C., was the leader in total per-capita fraud complaints, and several Western cities led in the category of identity-theft complaints, including Phoenix, Las Vegas and Los Angeles.

Meanwhile, identity-theft complaints surged in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana, rising 26% last year, while Mississippi saw an 8% increase. Complaints related to "government documents or benefits" in Louisiana more than doubled, however, to 551 from 247, possibly an indicator of post-Katrina fraud.

Overall, the drop in credit-card fraud complaints was offset by an increase in complaints about the misuse of government records, and fraud involving things such as medical records, legal documents and fitness-club memberships. Bank-, phone- and utilities-related complaints stayed roughly the same, although complaints about electronic fund transfers rose.

Sophisticated identity thieves are always probing for vulnerabilities. One troubling trend emerged late last year, when the Securities and Exchange Commission warned that identity thieves were using keystroke-detecting programs to drain online brokerage accounts. Similarly, federal banking regulators have prodded financial institutions to move beyond "single-factor" authentication, which only requires a user name and password to gain access to accounts, by the end of this year.

For many consumer advocates, the focus is squarely on financial institutions to do more to catch identity thieves in the act. Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, says "there are some technology-based tools they can use, and there's some evidence showing that these tools are having marked effect. But sadly for victims, identity theft remains rampant."

Inmate Convicted Of Murdering Defrocked Priest (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

BOSTON, Jan. 25 — Rejecting an insanity defense, a state jury on Wednesday convicted an inmate of the prison murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest who was accused of molesting 150 boys. Mr. Geoghan played a central role in the sexual abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Archdiocese here.

DOJ_NMG_0011921

Judge Francis R. Fecteau of Worcester District Court sentenced the inmate, Joseph L. Druce, to life in prison without parole, in addition to the life sentence he is serving for another murder.

After the verdict, Mr. Druce told the jury that he had "no hard feelings." Mr. Druce, 40, who had testified that he had been abused as a child, asked after the sentencing that pedophiles be held accountable for their behavior.

During the trial there was no disagreement about what happened at 11:53 a.m. on Aug. 23, 2003, in a protective custody wing at Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center in Shirley, Mass.

Mr. Druce admitted to sneaking into Mr. Geoghan's cell while prisoners were returning their lunch trays, and strangling him.

Mr. Geoghan, 68, was serving a 9-to-10-year sentence for groping a boy at a suburban Boston swimming pool. His case began the sexual abuse scandal four years ago when internal church documents showed that officials had shuttled Mr. Geoghan from parish to parish, despite repeated accusations of abuse.

Prosecutors argued that Mr. Druce was a calculated killer who planned the murder for weeks and saw Mr. Geoghan as a trophy.

But Mr. Druce's lawyer, John LaChance, painted his client as someone who "never had a chance," unwanted from birth and the victim of physical and sexual abuse for much of his childhood and teenage years. He said Mr. Druce had concocted a "fantasy world" while in prison where he pretended to be a millionaire who owned yachts and expensive homes.

Mr. LaChance said that Mr. Druce believed that God ordered him to kill Mr. Geoghan and that he would be viewed as a savior of children.

Lawyers, and Mr. Druce, said he became delusional after overhearing Mr. Geoghan say over the phone that he planned to work with children in Costa Rica when his sentence was over. Mr. LaChance said the delusions got worse after Mr. Druce heard Mr. Geoghan and other pedophiles discuss child molesting.

The jury foreman, Thomas Wiegand, told The Associated Press that jurors felt sympathy for Mr. Druce and felt he was mentally ill, but that he willfully committed murder.

"Everyone agreed he has a mental illness," Mr. Wiegand said. "It's the degree that's always the question."

A Push To Focus On Worst Cases In Child Abuse (CSM)

By Maia Ridberg, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

NEW YORK - Calls to New York's child-abuse hot line have spiked dramatically ever since Nixzmary Brown was buried.

The 7-year-old girl, allegedly killed by her stepfather in her Brooklyn home this month, captured the hearts and minds of New Yorkers who never want to see such a tragedy happen again.

But now the city is left with the tall task of distinguishing the serious cases of abuse from reports of neglect. This is one of the most controversial challenges facing social welfare systems nationwide.

A growing number of states are passing laws that alter the way authorities investigate a child-abuse report, creating what is essentially a child-welfare triage system. Rather than treat all reports equally, the approach divides them into two groups.

This dual-track approach aims to ease systems overburdened with poverty-related neglect reports and focus aggressive tactics on the rarer cases of abuse.

"What it is attempting to do is to respond in a more helpful way ... by supporting parents in their responses rather than automatically approaching it from a criminal-investigation standpoint," says Lynn Usher, professor of social work at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill.

The approach has been adopted in various states, including Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and North Carolina. In Minnesota, one recent study shows the law improved the safety of children by providing better services for families such as food. "If we are able to address the needs of families who are reported ... in a positive and helpful way, we are able to reduce child maltreatment and improve family well-being," says Erin Sullivan Sutton of Minnesota's Child Safety and Permanency Office.

In North Carolina, 10 counties have implemented the program, and by 2006, all counties in the state will have the option of implementing the dual-track approach. David Atkinson, a local operations manager of the state's Division of Social Services, says

DOJ_NMG_0011922

60 to 70 percent of its caseload involves neglect of children living in poor conditions. "We realized that as a system we could handle those cases ... in a family-centered way."

So far, employees of North Carolina's child-welfare services are applauding the program. "Social workers are now feeling like they can make a difference," says Adele Spitz Roth of the Durham Family Initiative.

Controversy over how child welfare services should investigate a family stems from the 1960s, according to Karen Schimke, the former head of Buffalo's child services, who has over 35 years' experience in child welfare. The debate then, she says, was whether child-abuse cases should be handled by police or child-welfare services. Child services gained the upper hand, but as the system became codified, it was increasingly akin to "law enforcement in a welfare agency," says Ms. Schimke.

Sharwline Nicholson knows firsthand the potentially negative impact of an aggressive child welfare system. In 1999, Ms. Nicholson lost her two children to foster care without a court order. "My children were snatched away from me because I was a victim of domestic violence. They were taken from my home without any investigation," Nicholson says. Nicholson won her son and daughter back, along with a civil judgment against New York City for the wrongful removal of her children.

"The problem is that [a law-enforcement approach] has significant chilling effects on families' willingness to engage.... It is organized around placing blame and identifying the perpetrator," says Schimke, who is now lobbying for a dual-track approach in New York.

That lobbying effort failed most recently in 2005, when a dual-track law was passed by the state Legislature but was vetoed by the governor. In his veto message to the Senate, Gov. George Pataki cited New York City's opposition to the bill.

The city's main fear with dual track is that an abused child would be mishandled as a neglect case. In testimony opposing the dual-track bill last year, the city's Administration for Children's Services delivered the following statement: "Our current system addresses the core issues that the dual-track bill seeks to address without running a risk" of wrongly addressing a case of abuse.

That risk exists with or without dual track, as apparent with the Brown case. Last week, the Kings County District Attorney in Brooklyn indicted Nixzmary 's mother and stepfather with second-degree murder. According to the district attorney, the child's body showed signs of long-term abuse - some of it investigated by the city.

In the aftermath of the girl's death, authorities disciplined six employees involved in the investigation into her abuse. On Tuesday, the Mayor announced a $16 million plan to hire new child-welfare staff and increase cooperation between police, schools, and child services.

Some advocates of the dual-track approach say serious cases like Nixzmary's would receive more attention. But others caution against universal support for dual track, particularly in a city known for vast improvements in child protective services over the past decade.

"You can do this right whether you have dual track or not," says Andrew White, director of the Center for New York City Affairs at the New School. "What they are trying to do in New York City ... [is] infuse the system with better training and better respect for the parents," he says.

Fairfax Police Say Shooting Was Accident (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Fairfax County's police chief said yesterday that one of his officers accidentally shot and killed an optometrist outside the unarmed man's townhouse Tuesday night as an undercover detective was about to arrest him on suspicion of gambling on sports.

Police had been secretly making bets with Salvatore J. Culosi Jr., 37, since October as part of a gambling investigation, according to court records. They planned to search his home in the Fair Oaks area, just off Lee Highway, shortly after 9:30 p.m.

Culosi came out of his townhouse on Cavalier Landing Court about 9:35 p.m. and was standing next to the detective's sport-utility vehicle, police said, when the detective gave a signal to tactical officers assembled nearby to move in and arrest Culosi.

"As they approached him . . . one officer's weapon, a handgun, was unintentionally discharged," said Fairfax Police Chief David M. Rohrer.

DOJ_NMG_0011923

Culosi was not making any threatening moves when he was shot once in the upper part of his body, police said. He was taken to Inova Fairfax Hospital, where he was pronounced dead.

The last fatal police shooting in Fairfax was in September 2000, when an officer killed a man threatening him with a woodcutting tool.

"On behalf of the Fairfax County Police Department and myself, I wish to express our condolences and our sincere sympathy to Mr. Culosi's family and friends," Rohrer said. He declined to answer questions after making the statement.

Police departments generally do not accept responsibility for an officer-involved shooting before an investigation is completed.

Culosi's family in Annandale was grief-stricken and declined to be interviewed. Culosi's older sister, Constance Culosi Gulley, issued a statement saying that her brother was "a respected local businessman and doctor with his whole life ahead of him and didn't deserve to have his life end this way."

Culosi grew up just off Annandale Road, graduated from Bishop O'Connell High School and the University of Virginia, then attended the Southern College of Optometry in Memphis and became a doctor of optometry. He opened practices in Manassas and Warrenton that are attached to Wal-Mart stores.

The officer, a 17-year veteran assigned to the police tactical unit, was not identified. He was placed on leave with pay while police conduct both an internal administrative investigation and a criminal investigation. Rohrer also expressed support for the officer, calling him a valued veteran of the department.

Lt. Richard Perez, a police spokesman, said he could not say how or why the gun discharged.

"When you draw the weapon, you always try to assess what the potential threat is going to be," Perez said. He said the officers in the tactical squad are "highly trained officers. Do unintentional shootings occur? Absolutely. We're humans, and these kind of things do occur."

Perez said he did not know what type of handgun Culosi was shot with.

After several years without any shootings, officers shot and wounded several people last year, including one of their own officers in an accidental shooting. A robbery suspect was shot this month on Route 1. In the nearly 39 years that Robert F. Horan Jr. has been the chief prosecutor in Fairfax, no officer has been charged with improperly shooting someone.

Rohrer said in his statement that the tactical squad routinely performs arrests and provides support for detectives executing search warrants. The chief said in his statement that "we will fully review, as always, our policies, practices and this operation in detail."

Culosi's family said that "police action that results in the death of an unarmed, nonthreatening person calls for a full and open investigation. We hope proper steps are taken by county police to ensure other families won't have to endure similar pain."

Culosi was a lifelong Pittsburgh Steelers fan, longtime friend Steve Lunceford said. Culosi excelled at soccer, playing on travel teams as a youth and for the O'Connell varsity. He was not married and had no children.

"He was gregarious, outgoing, loved to sing off-key at weddings," Lunceford said. "For this to happen, it's surreal. The police need to account for and be held accountable for their actions."

Deon Chapman said he became a casual friend of Culosi's after meeting him at a pool tournament at a Fairfax bar about 10 years ago. "He was a laid-back guy, funny guy. . . . I've never known him to even carry a pocketknife. This is a college boy, clean-cut." He also said he had no idea that Culosi might have been a bookie.

In an affidavit for the search warrant, Detective David J. Baucom, who often investigates sports gambling in Fairfax, said he met Culosi at a bar in October and started making NFL bets with him by cell phone. Baucom said he placed more than $28,000 in bets on games through last Sunday and met Culosi about every two weeks to pay his debts or collect his winnings, either at a restaurant or Culosi's home. Through Jan. 16, Baucom had lost more than $5,500 to Culosi, his affidavit stated.

Lt. Steve Thompson, Baucom's supervisor in the police organized crime division, said in a recent interview that there is no shortage of sports bookies in Fairfax and that police investigate only those who meet certain criteria. He said that Fairfax typically goes after only those bookies with many customers who take in $100,000 in bets per week and that larger bookies will take in $300,000 to $400,000 on a busy football weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0011924

Last month, another investigation headed by Baucom resulted in the arrest of a man suspected of being a bookie who lives in Washington but operated in Fairfax. When police searched his safe deposit boxes, they seized nearly $350,000 in cash, court records show. Charges against that man are pending.

After shooting Culosi, police searched his townhouse. The results of that search were not available yesterday.

Perez said Culosi had not displayed a weapon or shown any violent tendencies while he was being investigated by Baucom. But Perez said police had to be prepared for any possibility, because "the unexpected can occur."

Crimes Prompt More Police Patrols In Adams Morgan (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

A spate of crimes outside Adams Morgan clubs and bars, including two assaults in which victims were left in critical condition, has prompted police to plan greater deployment in the area of 18th Street NW, they said yesterday.

Larry McCoy, commander of the 3rd Police District, said the number of officers will grow to as many as 23, up from five to 10 on a typical Thursday, Friday or Saturday night.

McCoy said that the officers will be moved from other shifts in the 3rd District and that they will be on foot, in cars and on scooters. The officers will patrol the main strip and side streets, he said.

"We're going to get this under control and make sure people can come into Adams Morgan and not have any fear," McCoy said at a news conference organized by D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1).

A business group plans to supplement the effort with a contingent of security guards and off-duty police to patrol the area on weekends, said Josh Gibson, executive director of Adams Morgan's newly formed business improvement district.

Thousands of people pour into Adams Morgan on weekend nights, drawn by its cafes and clubs.

Pat Patrick, vice president of the Adams Morgan Business and Professional Association, said fights have been started by youths who hang out on 18th Street NW until clubs close at 3 a.m.

"They have nothing better to do than insult or assault women as they come out; I've seen it with my own eyes," he said. "And then you have a full-fledged fight. These are not people who work in the area. These are purely people who look to pick a fight."

Overall, reported crime in the area that includes 18th Street increased by 5 percent from 2004 to 2005, including a 38 percent increase in burglaries, according to police statistics provided by the Kalorama Citizens Association.

While robberies declined by 13 percent last year, there was an increase from August to December, when there were 61, compared with 42 during the same period in 2004, according to the statistics.

In recent weeks, five assaults were reported, up from two for the same period last year, McCoy said. In one incident in December, a man was beaten outside a parking garage on 18th Street and was in a coma for more than a week. Police recently made an arrest after a suspect surrendered.

Last weekend, a man, 35, fell into a coma after he was punched and his head hit the pavement, apparently while defending a woman who had exchanged words with a group of men.

At the news conference, Graham said the neighborhood is generally safe but needs more policing.

"It's not a situation where we have gangs," he said. "It's a situation where people are losing their tempers."

Man Taught Son To Work Gun, Prosecutor Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The father of an 8-year-old boy arrested in the shooting of a 7-year-old girl at their Germantown day-care center provided his son with violent video games and showed him how to cock and release a gun hammer the day before the boy pulled the trigger, a prosecutor said yesterday.

John L. Hall has "significant influence" over the juvenile suspect, Montgomery County Assistant State's Attorney Karyn McAuliffe said during a bond hearing for Hall, who has been charged with numerous weapons offenses and was arrested the same day as his son.

DOJ_NMG_0011925

"He shares a bedroom with the 8-year-old child where he keeps the gun," McAuliffe said, referring to the .38-caliber Taurus revolver suspected of being used to shoot the girl in the upper right arm. "The child had previously been discovered playing with bullets."

Hall's sister, Darlene Hall, 53, disputed the prosecutor's characterization of her brother's influence over the child. "My brother is not a monster," she said.

The shooting victim, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary, was scheduled to be released last night from Children's Hospital in the District, her father said in a statement issued by the hospital. Neither he nor the girl was identified.

Law enforcement sources said the boy took the gun to the For Kids We Care Inc. center Tuesday after telling classmates last Friday after a fight that he had easy access to guns. The sources said the boy, who was not identified because he was charged as a juvenile, threatened to rob the girl before firing the single shot. Police have not disclosed the charges against the boy.

Montgomery District Court Judge Mary Beth McCormick reduced Hall's bond to $75,000 yesterday after authorities charged him Tuesday with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor and two other gun charges.

He is to appear before a judge again today because police have filed two additional weapons charges against him -- the unlawful transfer of a firearm and possession of a firearm by a felon convicted of a violent crime, which carries a mandatory minimum five-year sentence for a conviction.

Yesterday, police arrested a second man, Clyde Colmes Jr., 53, of Germantown, who they said was the registered owner of the weapon fired at the day-care center. Police said Colmes gave Hall the gun knowing that Hall couldn't possess one.

Assistant public defender Samantha Sandler said Hall has worked at the National Institutes of Health for more than a decade and has not been in trouble since 1989. Before then, he had been convicted of numerous crimes, including assault with the intent to maim.

Darlene Hall acknowledged her brother's criminal history, which stretched from 1968 to 1989, but said, "As an adult, he's been a productive citizen."

She said her nephew has had long-standing behavior problems.

"The child is on Ritalin," a drug often prescribed to children who are hyperactive or have attention deficit disorder, she said. "The mother can't control him."

The aunt said she doesn't think the boy took the gun to the day-care center, in the 12600 block of Grey Eagle Court, where he was dropped off by his stepsister early Tuesday. Darlene Hall also said her brother lives with her in Gaithersburg, disputing prosecutors' assertion that he shares a room with the boy at his mother's apartment.

John Hall listed the Grey Eagle address in his June 28 application for a restraining order against a woman he says assaulted him. The order was dismissed because Hall did not appear for a hearing.

The boy, a third-grader at Cedar Grove Elementary School, appeared before a judge yesterday shortly after his father's bond hearing. Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge Michael J. Algeo closed the child's hearing to the public. Maryland judges may in some instances close hearings of juveniles in criminal proceedings.

The boy's mother, Debbie Shipp, attended his hearing. She declined to comment.

The girl's father released a statement late Tuesday through the hospital urging more parental responsibility.

"This is a harsh reminder that we can never be too careful when it comes to the safety of our children," he said in the statement. "Parents need to realize how dangerous it is to keep guns in a place where their children can get to them. I don't want any parent to have to get a call like I got this morning."

He said his daughter will return to the day-care center once she recovers.

Mike Bass, the father of a 2-year-old girl who attends For Kids We Care, dropped off his daughter at sunrise yesterday. He said that although the shooting was chilling, he plans to continue using the center.

"I wouldn't want to take my daughter to a day care where they searched the kids," said Bass, 30, of Germantown. "The responsibility lies within the parents. I don't think the day care could have done anything to prevent it."

The Innocent And The Shammed (NYT)

By Joshua Marquis

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Astoria, Ore.

AS the words scroll across a darkened TV screen, we hear an authoritative voice announce that every year an alarming number of people in this country "are wrongfully convicted." Millions of Americans who watched these promotions in recent weeks knew they were pitches for the new ABC television drama "In Justice." But if they'd been listening from the next room, they might easily have thought from the somber tone that it was a tease for the nightly news or "20/20."

"In Justice" has received dismal reviews. But that hasn't stopped its premise from permeating the conventional wisdom: that our prisons are chock-full of doe-eyed innocents who have been framed by venal prosecutors and corrupt police officers with the help of grossly incompetent public defenders. It is a misconception that has run through our popular culture from "Perry Mason" to the novels of Scott Turow to the recent hit play "The Exonerated."

It was also seen on the front pages in recent weeks, in reporting about Roger Coleman, who was executed in Virginia in 1992 for rape and murder. DNA testing at the time had placed him within one-fifth of a percent of possible suspects, leading to widespread claims that he was innocent. The governor, L. Douglas Wilder, said he would consider commuting Mr. Coleman's sentence if he passed a lie detector test. He failed and was executed.

For more than a decade opponents of the death penalty have held up the Coleman case as the example that would prove that America executed an innocent man. Yet on Jan. 12 the Canadian laboratory that had been sent the last remaining DNA sample in the case announced the results of more advanced testing: it put the odds of Mr. Coleman not being the killer at less than 1 in 19 million. Still, while Mr. Coleman's face graced the cover of Time magazine at the height of the controversy, it is unlikely you will see him on the cover again marking his rightful conviction.

Americans love the underdog. Thousands of law students aspire to be Atticus Finch, the famous fictional lawyer from "To Kill A Mockingbird." But this can go too far: one of the jurors who acquitted the actor Robert Blake of murder last year cited the TV program "CSI" as the basis of her knowledge of what good police work should be. And if we take a deep breath and examine the state of American justice, a very different picture will emerge.

To start, only 14 Americans who were once on death row have been exonerated by DNA evidence alone. The hordes of Americans wrongfully convicted exist primarily on Planet Hollywood. In the Winter 2005 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, a group led by Samuel Gross, a law professor at the University of Michigan, published an exhaustive study of exonerations around the country from 1989 to 2003 in cases ranging from robbery to capital murder. They were able to document only 340 inmates who were eventually freed. (They counted cases where defendants were retried after an initial conviction and subsequently found not guilty as "exonerations.") Yet, despite the relatively small number his research came up with, Mr. Gross says he is certain that far more innocents languish undiscovered in prison.

So, let's give the professor the benefit of the doubt: let's assume that he understated the number of innocents by roughly a factor of 10, that instead of 340 there were 4,000 people in prison who weren't involved in the crime in any way. During that same 15 years, there were more than 15 million felony convictions across the country. That would make the error rate .027 percent — or, to put it another way, a success rate of 99.973 percent.

Most industries would like to claim such a record of efficiency. And while, of course, people's lives are far more important than widgets, we have an entire appeals court system intended to intervene in those few cases where the innocent are in jeopardy.

It is understandable that journalists focus on the rare case in which an innocent man or woman is sent to prison — because, as all reporters know, how many planes landed safely today has never been news. The larger issue is whether those who influence the culture, like an enormous television network, have a moral responsibility to keep the facts straight regardless of their thirst for drama. "In Justice" may soon find itself on the canceled list, but several million people will still have watched it, and they are likely to have the impression that wrongfully convicted death row inmates are the virtual rule.

The words "innocent" and "exonerated" carry tremendous emotional and political weight. But these terms have been tortured beyond recognition — not just by defense lawyers, but by the disseminators of entertainment under the guise of social conscience.

"The Exonerated" played for several years Off Broadway with a Who's Who of stage and screen stars portraying six supposedly innocent people who were once on death row. The play, originally subsidized by George Soros, the liberal billionaire philanthropist, now tours college campuses and was made into a television movie by Court TV.

The script never mentions that two of the play's six characters (Sonia Jacobs and Kerry Cook) were not exonerated, but were let out of prison after a combined 36 years behind bars when they agreed to plea bargains. A third (Robert Hayes) was unavailable to do publicity tours because he is in prison, having pleaded guilty to another homicide almost identical to the one of which he was acquitted.

American justice is a work in progress, and those of us charged with administering it are well aware that it needs constant improvement. But nothing is gained by deluding the public into believing that the police and prosecutors are trying to send innocent people to prison. Any experienced defense lawyer will concede that he would starve if he accepted only "innocent" clients. Americans should be far more worried about the wrongfully freed than the wrongfully convicted.

Once More With Amy, Joey And Mary Jo (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Before Angie and Brad, before Monica and Bill, there was Amy and Joey. Amy Fisher and Joey Buttafuoco — the Long Island Lolita and her body-shop lover — with Joey's wife, Mary Jo, formed a triangle of passion, obsession and violence that became the industry standard for tabloid crime way, way back in 1992.

There is an entire generation, or at least a cohort, or maybe a handful, or at least one or two journalists who remember working on that day in May when the story broke, and who still marvel at how that strange crime — a housewife in a swanky suburb shot in the face — soon became much stranger. It swelled in significance until it made headlines coast to coast and around the globe.

The South Shore of Long Island was something then. Nobody could touch Long Island for tabloid crime in those days, and people were raised right — they paid attention. The Amy and Joey story spawned not just one made-for-TV movie but three, among them vehicles for Alyssa Milano and Drew Barrymore. It put Massapequa on the map.

Back then, a nobody starting out with nothing — just a mighty helmet of hair, a pair of snakeskin boots and a statutory rape conviction — could dream of one day making it big in Hollywood. And make it Joey sorta did, taking bit parts in movies like "Mafia Movie Madness" and, lately, selling protein shakes on the set of "Desperate Housewives." He seems incapable of parlaying his fame into lasting fortune, though, possibly because of problems involving insurance fraud, probation violations and ammunition possession, possibly because he is a skeevy knucklehead.

Amy Fisher always seemed to be the smart one in this dense equation. She left prison, wrote a book and found a respectable position as a columnist for The Long Island Press. She left that job recently, but not before impressing many people with her articulate voice and winning a journalism award.

Poor Mary Jo, who miraculously survived the shooting despite serious injuries, forgave both Amy and Joey, and moved out to California with him. They divorced in 2003.

I miss the Buttafuoco era. Joey and Amy were the Sid Caesar and Howdy Doody of reality TV, relics of a simpler time when crime sold newspapers — imagine that — and when the culture tended to look down on adultery and teenage prostitutes, and when attempted murder carried a hint of shame, which presumably was why Amy, in her perp walk, went to the trouble of hiding her face with her long brown hair.

We learned this week in The New York Post that Amy, Joey and Mary Jo had agreed to be reunited for a TV show. That promises to be a complete waste of time, although the guy trying to sell the idea says there will be shocking revelations.

It is hard to imagine what those may be, or that a revival of this Long Island melodrama — even with its original cast — can regain even a fraction of its former glory. But you never know. Billy Joel, who sank pretty low into his own tabloid hell, is playing Madison Square Garden again in a sold-out engagement of record length. Howard Stern has re-emerged on satellite radio. We could be on the brink of another Long Island moment, and those have been hard to come by lately.

DOJ_NMG_0011928

CIVIL LAW:

Ex-supervisor At GE Parts Plant Sues (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

MADISONVILLE, Ky. -- A former supervisor at a General Electric Co. plant has filed $50.5 million federal lawsuit that claims that he was fired for testifying that GE shipped defective parts to military and commercial customers.

James Richard Gardner, of Madisonville, filed the suit Friday in U.S. District Court in Louisville. Gardner said he repeatedly alerted managers at the Madisonville plant that engine turbine blades were not meeting company and government specifications and that defective parts were shipped with the knowledge of managers to meet production requirements.

Marta Rhyner, a GE spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on specific allegations made in the lawsuit. She said the company is "confident in the parts produced by our employees at Madisonville."

The Defense Department began a criminal investigation at the plant in November 2000. The Justice Department is conducting a civil investigation.

Gardner alleged that the plant had concealed flaws on some blades. He said he asked his supervisor, "Is this legal?" He said he was told, "It's our shop. As long as people stamp it, it's good," according to the lawsuit.

Gardner was subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Bowling Green in June 2003. Before his appearance, Gardner said he was told by a plant manager that he would meet with a corporate attorney to be coached on how to answer. Gardner said he was told to answer "No" or "I don't know."

Gardner said he was later transferred to a different part of the plant, subsequently demoted and then fired last April after refusing a company buyout offer.

The lawsuit said the Air Force notified GE in 1999 that defective blades had been found in engines on fighter jets. Approximately 5,000 blades were returned to Madisonville for inspection and cleaning.

Former supervisor and quality control expert Terri Brown filed a $53 million lawsuit against GE in 2004. The filing alleges Brown was harassed and shoved down a stairway after raising concerns about defective parts being shipped to customers. It was unsealed in 2004.

Trustee Called Threat To Plan For Adelphia (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, January 26, 2006

In a decision released Wednesday in the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of cable company Adelphia Communications, the presiding judge said the motions by which one group of creditors sought the appointment of a trustee to oversee disputes and the disqualification of chief Adelphia bankruptcy counsel Willkie Farr & Gallagher constituted a "nuclear war button" threatening obliteration of a crucial $17.6 billion deal.

Southern District of New York Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber's strongly worded 113-page decision, In re Adelphia, 02-41729, previously filed under seal, clarified his order issued earlier in the week denying the appointment of a trustee but granting the disqualification of Willkie lawyers from participating in the disputes at issue. Willkie remains bankruptcy counsel to Adelphia.

Those disputes, which the requested trustee would have overseen, are between different groups of debt holders, all seeking to maximize their own claims on the bankruptcy estate, most of the assets of which are slated to be sold to rival cable companies Time Warner and Comcast for $17.6 billion.

The potential appointment of a bankruptcy trustee is almost always controversial, as such trustees are usually granted broad-ranging powers to settle disputes or dispose of assets.

Gerber said the disqualification and trustee motions, brought in November by noteholders of Arahova, a subsidiary through which Adelphia issued some $540 million in debt, seemed designed to "purposefully" imperil that sale as part of a "scorched earth litigation strategy" aimed at extracting a larger distribution by threatening dire consequences for all.

DOJ_NMG_0011929

"The relief sought by the Arahova Noteholders Committee could (and, in some circumstances, will) give Time Warner and Comcast the right to terminate the Purchase Agreements," he wrote. "If the sale transaction is not consummated, there will be severe, negative economic impact on all of the Debtors, including the subsidiaries of Arahova."

The judge pointed out Adelphia could owe Time Warner and Comcast a $443 million breakup fee if the transaction failed to close. He further noted the appointment of a trustee would constitute a default event under the agreement that provided Adelphia with $1.3 billion in debtor-in-possession financing.

"Where interdebtor issues exist and are material, they cannot, of course, be swept under the rug ... But the means established to resolve them should be the least destructive available," the judge wrote. "And neither the interests of a debtor's creditor body, nor the integrity of the bankruptcy system, can tolerate the use of motions like these as a tactic to assist creditor groups wishing to augment their personal recoveries."

Gerber noted that similar disputes among creditors had been a feature of other major bankruptcies, including those of WorldCom Inc., and Enron Corp.

Southern District Bankruptcy Judge Arthur Gonzalez, who oversaw both of those cases, appointed a trustee in neither, citing in the former the complexity of the case and the expense and delay that familiarizing a trustee would entail.

Likewise, Gerber said the case's complexity as well as the cost and delay involved weighed heavily against the appointment of a trustee. Moreover, "[t]he Balkanization of the decision making in this case would be highly damaging to all of the debtors, and their creditors, and the Arahova Debtors and their creditors would be no exception," he said.

NEUTRAL POSITION

Though he denied the motion to appoint a trustee, Gerber granted the disqualification of Willkie and further directed the recusal of Arahova managers with regard to disputes between creditors. But he made clear he felt the lawyers and executives had already voluntarily acted to maintain their neutrality in those disputes and his ruling was merely "prophylactic."

"[Willkie] has done nothing wrong," the judge wrote. "But the prophylactic imposition of mandatory neutrality on [Willkie] on interdebtor issues would not cause [Willkie], or the debtors, any material prejudice either."

Willkie has represented Adelphia since its 2002 bankruptcy filing amid charges that the Rigases, the company's founding family, looted it of hundreds of millions of dollars. The judge said the firm has played little role in the creditors' disputes beyond a neutral role of providing parties with information.

But the Arahova noteholders had originally sought to disqualify the law firm generally, barring it even from continuing work on the Time Warner/Comcast sale. This, Gerber said, would have been a disaster for the company.

"[Willkie] has acquired an extraordinary expertise in Adelphia affairs," the judge wrote, "and has performed its responsibilities with distinction. The loss of either of those especially at this late date, would be terrible for creditors, and would materially delay, if not torpedo, the Debtor's timely reorganization."

The Arahova noteholders were represented by J. Christopher Shore and Thomas Lauria of White & Case. The lawyers from Willkie leading the case have been Marc Abrams and Roger Netzer. Both sides declined to comment.

Flood Of Bids Is Behind Delay At GSA (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The General Services Administration said yesterday that it got more bids than expected for a $20 billion telecommunications contract known as Networx, forcing the agency to delay the award so it can evaluate the complex proposals.

"The good news is that we have a tremendous amount of interest in the program. The bad news is that we have a lot of work to do," said John C. Johnson, who is overseeing the program for the GSA.

The 10-year telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA, has attracted bids from companies including AT&T Inc., Qwest Communications International Inc., Sprint Nextel Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0011930

The contract is split into two parts: Networx Universal, which requires bidders to show they can provide a vast array of services around the globe, and Networx Enterprise, which has narrower requirements to allow smaller firms to get a piece of the action.

Contract awards had been due this year, but the GSA said Monday that bids would be delayed until next year without giving a reason.

Johnson, who said he was barred by federal procurement regulations from disclosing the number or names of bidders, said more companies had showed interest in the overall project than he expected and the bids covered "the whole spectrum" in terms of their quality.

"The level of interest was higher than expected, and these are large -- very large -- contracts, very complex, and the quality of the offers varies," he said. "Taking those things into account, we believe that it's going to take us longer to evaluate and ultimately make the awards."

Johnson said the GSA does not need more resources to handle the bids.

Federal contracting experts said delays of large federal contracts were not unusual, particularly those with complex technical requirements such as Networx. They also said there is often a lengthy back-and-forth with bidders to clarify their proposals.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, which has federal procurement oversight, said he was not too troubled by the delay.

"While I am certainly a bit disappointed in this latest delay and feel it's taking longer than it should, it is more important for GSA to do this right than to do it on schedule," Davis said in a written statement.

"Most of us expected there might be some delay. I think we were all surprised at the length of the delay," said Tony D'Agata, a vice president for federal government business at Sprint Nextel.

The GSA's Johnson said his agency planned to extend the current federal telecom contract -- FTS 2001 -- with the two incumbent providers, Sprint Nextel and Verizon.

D'Agata said the GSA had proposed prolonging Sprint Nextel's contract, which expires in December, for two years with the option for three further six-month extensions. He said the extra time might be needed to migrate federal agencies from the current contract to Networx.

Airborne Incident As It Adapts To Information Age, Lockheed Fumbles Key Project (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BETHESDA, Md. -- In 2004, Lockheed Martin Corp. won an Army spy-plane contract that broke with the past. Lockheed, the maker of such legendary surveillance planes as the U-2, wouldn't actually build the new model. Instead it would serve as the "lead integrator" -- stuffing somebody else's hardware with high-tech eavesdropping gear.

The spy plane was supposed to symbolize Lockheed's skill at harnessing information-age technology for the battlefield, a big goal at the Pentagon these days. But Lockheed engineers proved unable to load the airframe they were buying from Brazil with the equipment the Army wanted. Earlier this month, the Army scrapped Lockheed's contract.

The debacle is a setback for Chief Executive Robert Stevens and his young "integrated solutions" division, which he has put at the center of Lockheed's effort to recast itself for a new era. It's also a signal for the entire defense industry that de-emphasizing old-style hardware in favor of software and systems management isn't a sure path to success. The speed with which Lockheed's new spy plane crashed indicates how little margin there is for error as the Pentagon comes under pressure to pare weapons spending because of Iraq war costs and the rising federal deficit.

The Army, which sent mixed signals about what it wanted in the spy plane, shares some of the blame for the contract's demise, and Lockheed wasn't formally cited for performance shortfalls. In an interview while Lockheed was still scrambling to save the spy plane, Mr. Stevens said he was "personally disappointed" about the design problems but called them a reminder of the risks in projects that "push the state of the art."

DOJ_NMG_0011931

Lockheed, the biggest U.S. defense contractor, isn't alone in trying to transform itself from manufacturer to integrator. Companies that used to boast about their planes, ships and tanks now talk about operating systems and communications networks. The shift reflects the fact that across all technology markets, the biggest profits often lie in designing software and making products work together. Meanwhile manufacturing hardware is becoming a lower-margin business.

Boeing Co. won a contract as lead integrator for the Army's program to modernize its ground forces, whose ultimate cost may top $150 billion. The Chicago plane maker will develop the software blueprint for the program, but it isn't making any of the 18 new vehicles. General Dynamics Corp., best known for its ships and tanks, is designing a battlefield communications network to keep moving troops linked to satellites.

Mr. Stevens has moved aggressively to seize opportunities in what he calls the "evolution from the Industrial Age to the Information Age." Besides the spy plane, Lockheed has other high-profile integration projects where the company acts as chief architect to make software, electronics and other systems work together with hardware. Though not a helicopter maker, Lockheed won an upset victory last year to develop the next Marine One presidential chopper fleet by teaming with a foreign helicopter maker, Italian-owned AgustaWestland. Lockheed also gained a share of a Navy program for small, stealthy warships, though it owns no shipyard. The company is even building a digital database for the National Archives.

Mr. Stevens hopes the growth will make up for a possible slowdown in Lockheed's traditional mainstay of plane manufacturing. Budget challenges could curtail two huge programs led by Lockheed: the Joint Strike Fighter, which carries an estimated lifetime price tag of $240 billion, and the F-22 supersonic stealth fighter, which was officially deployed this month. Space, another Lockheed mainstay, could also face pressure as military-space programs undergo restructuring.

Wave of Deals

For decades, Lockheed has been synonymous with innovative aircraft. Its hits include the original radar-evading stealth planes. But a wave of deals in the 1990s including a merger with Martin Marietta Corp. left the company sprawling and heavily indebted. Prior to his promotion to chief executive in 2004, Mr. Stevens helped lead Lockheed's successful comeback strategy of slashing costs and refocusing by selling nondefense assets such as commercial telecommunications ventures. The company had already stopped making commercial aircraft in the 1980s.

Helped by post-9/11 defense spending and the big Joint Strike Fighter contract, Lockheed has grown rapidly in recent years and restored profits. In 2005 analysts estimate its revenue exceeded $37 billion, up from $24 billion in 2001. The company reports full-year 2005 figures today. Its stock price, which fell below $17 in 2000, now stands at about $65, near a 52-week high.

A former Marine, the 54-year-old Mr. Stevens is the only current chief executive at a top-five U.S. defense contractor who served in the military. He has sought to instill a more collaborative culture across Lockheed's five business units and 135,000 employees. Managers now get incentives for joining internal teams even if they aren't running a project. "The concept is that it's as good to be the follower as it is to be the leader," says Robert Coutts, executive vice president of electronic systems, which leads four major multidivision programs and supports four others.

The collaboration drive has even incorporated Lockheed's renowned Skunk Works, the secretive unit that fathered the stealth planes and long worked almost exclusively on aerospace projects. Now, it spends one-third of its time lending its expertise to other Lockheed businesses. Skunk Works head Frank Cappuccio credits the change to a "culture created by Stevens that says, 'Reach out.' "

No division was meant to embody Mr. Stevens's strategy more than the integrated systems and solutions unit -- the one in charge of the aborted spy plane. Formed in late 2003 by Mr. Stevens, then Lockheed president, the unit is designed to herd ideas and experts from around the company to capture Pentagon business in networked battlefield systems.

The Army spy plane, called the Aerial Common Sensor and potentially valued at $8 billion over its lifetime, looked like the perfect project for the new Lockheed unit. The Army wanted to replace two aging propeller-plane models that patrol battlefields and flashpoints such as the border between North and South Korea. The new spy plane would bulge with scores of antennas and sensors, collecting a wealth of information to be sped in real time to commanders and troops.

Heeding a Pentagon drive to save money by developing common weapons, the Army tried to enlist the Navy, which needed to replace its own creaky spy planes. The Army also decided to award the contract as a package deal instead of holding one competition for the airframe and another for the electronics and sensors. Both strategies would ultimately complicate the program.

DOJ_NMG_0011932

To speed up development and keep costs down, Lockheed wanted to adapt an existing airplane model for the mission. After studying dozens of airplanes, it chose to go into the bid with a 50-seat passenger jet made by Brazil's Empresa Brasileira de Aeronáutica SA, or Embraer. The Embraer plane had been adapted for military use in Brazil and was among the cheapest of its size in the market.

Even before the final bid, some engineers at Lockheed questioned whether the Embraer plane could support the weight of the crew and equipment, according to people involved in the bid. The Army wanted six onboard workstations instead of Lockheed's suggested four. Lockheed re-evaluated its bid and considered ditching Embraer. Just weeks before the June 2004 deadline, Lockheed sent letters to at least three plane makers, Boeing, General Dynamics and Bombardier Inc., seeking information about larger airframes.

Instead of switching at the 11th hour, Lockheed made what it describes as low-risk modifications to the wings, engines and fuselage of the Embraer plane to accommodate the extra weight. It submitted its bid with full confidence that the proposal could fulfill the Army's mission, says Marshall Keith, who later became Lockheed's vice president for the spy-plane program.

On Aug. 3, 2004, Lockheed beat out Northrop Grumman Corp., which had bid using a Gulfstream business jet from General Dynamics, for an $879 million development contract to build the first five Aerial Common Sensor planes. The Northrop bid was nixed because its jet couldn't carry the weight, Army officials said.

Airplane programs almost always encounter weight issues in development, but Lockheed's problems became severe early on. Because the company approached the program as an electronic integration project, it had largely excluded senior aeronautical engineers from its development team. Once detailed design work began, Lockheed discovered that the sensors and workstations would require extra supports, insulation and other equipment, adding significant unexpected weight.

By November, just three months after winning the contract, the startup problems forced Lockheed to clean house. It replaced 11 of the 13 engineering team leaders and dumped the program's manager in favor of Mr. Keith, who had aircraft-integration experience. It enlisted engineers from the aeronautics division, including the Skunk Works.

Reinforcements Arrive

The reinforcements arrived in Denver, where spy-plane work was based. As they corrected basic assumptions, the plane grew even heavier. One key problem: Technology advances had made electronic components lighter, but Lockheed had used a modeling tool that presumed the same degree of slimming for cables and wires. That wasn't the case, says Edward Bair, the Army's top official for the spy-plane program.

"We sent experts to major subcontractors to weigh cables on scales," says Lockheed's Mr. Keith -- a step that normally comes much later in development.

While Lockheed had left itself little leeway, the weight issues weren't all its fault. Mr. Bair says the Army insisted that the plane be able to operate all spy sensors simultaneously for nearly eight hours in flight, whether or not all were needed. That meant greater cooling and power demands, and thus more weight. The Army also demanded a stronger frame for crash protection, and the Navy -- which still hadn't formally joined the program -- wanted additional reinforcement in order to fly at low altitudes, within range of surface fire.

By May of last year, the plane had ballooned by 5,139 pounds beyond Lockheed's bid proposal to 42,886 pounds, according to Army figures. The weight had become nearly 3,000 pounds more than the Embraer model could bear. The weight of cables and installation equipment alone nearly doubled.

Lockheed proposed substituting a 100-passenger jet made by Embraer for the original 50-seat plane. Eager to retain its inaugural Pentagon project, the Brazilian company offered the plane at the same price as the previous jet, according to a Lockheed official. Embraer declined to comment.

The Army was open at first to letting Lockheed swap the plane without reopening its contract for bidding. It asked Lockheed to look at other companies' planes in addition to Embraer's 100-seater. However, the Army quickly grew more concerned as the spy plane's estimated development cost grew to $1.8 billion, double the size of the original Lockheed contract, because of new engineering and other costs. In September, the Army suspended development funding, meaning Lockheed wouldn't be paid as it researched ways to salvage the program.

DOJ_NMG_0011933

That same day, Mr. Stevens accepted responsibility for the spy plane, telling an investor conference that almost all of Lockheed's 3,000 programs are "performing superbly well. But we're not flawless, and it takes just a single program to create real stress in the enterprise." He denied in an October interview that the plane's woes stemmed from an initial shortage of aeronautical engineers, but said he was "applying all of the resources of this company" to produce a workable plane.

Soon after funding was halted, Mr. Stevens visited Army Secretary Francis Harvey to try saving the contract. At the Denver facility, the Brazilian flag representing Lockheed's partnership with Embraer still flew, but the team turned its energies to another airframe for the project: the Global Express business jet made by Bombardier Inc. of Montreal. In November, after thousands of engineering man-hours for which Lockheed and its subcontractors weren't paid, the company pitched the Global Express to the Army.

Army acquisition officials were wary of the repeated changes and inclined to pull the plug. They extended a review to avoid jeopardizing funds while Congress was still debating the Pentagon budget. On Jan. 12, the Army made its decision: The Lockheed contract was dead.

Army acquisition chief Claude Bolton says a new spy plane is still needed, but to make it succeed, the government and industry will have to go "back to the drawing board."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gay Marriage Ban Advances Toward Va. Referendum (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Jan. 25 -- The state Senate all but guaranteed on Wednesday that Virginia will hold a November referendum on whether to amend its 230-year-old Bill of Rights to bar same-sex marriages.

The Senate voted 28 to 11 to follow the House of Delegates in approving the amendment. Though each chamber still must pass the measure adopted by the other, their wording is identical and support among the senators and delegates is strong.

"The family is the foundation of our society, and it's been based on a union of a man and a woman since the inception of marriage," said Del. John A. Cosgrove (R-Chesapeake). "A constitutional amendment . . . will protect that."

In Maryland, Republicans introduced a similar measure in the Senate on Wednesday and said they believe they have the votes they need to bring the matter to an up-or-down vote, despite resistance from leaders of the Democrat-controlled legislature.

In the wake of a circuit court ruling last week that declared Maryland's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriage discriminatory, GOP leaders said it was important to at least put the matter to a vote.

"Some senators are clearly going to be put on the spot," said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris (R-Baltimore County). "But I think they know we can't take the risk of sitting it out and doing nothing."

Eighteen state constitutions define marriage as a union between a man and a woman, many through amendments approved since 2003, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Massachusetts is the only state that grants marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Connecticut and Vermont recognize civil unions, while four states, the District and several dozen localities allow couples to formalize relationships through domestic-partnership registries.

District leaders are considering a bill that would strengthen the city's domestic-partnership law.

In Virginia, the General Assembly's action is likely to spark an intense campaign by the amendment's supporters and by gay rights groups before the Nov. 7 vote.

The state Bill of Rights was last amended in 1996, when voters supported adding a section protecting the rights of crime victims. Although changes to the state constitution are common, the 1996 action was the only time the Bill of Rights has been amended since 1970, when voters ratified a new version of the constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0011934

The Bill of Rights was written by George Mason, a founding father of Virginia and the United States. "It's essentially the same document it was in 1776 in body and spirit," said A.E. Dick Howard, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Virginia, who led a commission responsible for writing the state's current constitution.

The amendment barring same-sex marriage would be added to Section 15, which begins by saying, "That no free government, nor the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue . . . "

The Virginia Bill of Rights served as a model for other states and for the first 10 amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

The marriage amendment would say in part, "That only a union between one man and one woman may be a marriage valid in or recognized by this Commonwealth and its political subdivisions."

Supporters said that a traditional definition of marriage is so important that it belongs in the most hallowed of Virginia documents.

"The only place in the constitution to put this is in the Bill of Rights," said Sen. Stephen D. Newman (R-Lynchburg). "There is currently no right in the United States, or certainly not in Virginia, for anything other than a marriage between one man and one woman."

Virginia law already defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman and does not allow for civil unions, but proponents said the amendment is needed in case courts try to force the state to recognize same-sex marriages or civil unions performed in other states.

Opponents said the amendment would corrupt the original intent of Mason's document by preventing a class of Virginians from enjoying the same rights as other Virginians.

"I find it ironic, Mr. President, that this resolution will amend the Bill of Rights, that section of the constitution that holds sacrosanct the unalienable rights of all human beings," said Sen. Mamie Locke (D-Newport News) during a floor speech.

Del. Adam P. Ebbin (D-Alexandria), the only openly gay legislator, said during the House debate this month, "This resolution seeks to write citizens out of our most sacred document."

At the Capitol on Wednesday, hundreds of supporters of Equality Virginia, the state's leading gay rights organization, vowed they would defeat the amendment.

"There are tens of thousands of people . . . prepared to fight this so-called marriage amendment," said Dyana Mason, executive director of Equality Virginia.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) does not have to review the amendment resolution. He could veto a separate bill that specifically calls for the November referendum, but press secretary Delacey Skinner said he will not do so.

"The governor's position is that a marriage is between one man and one woman," Skinner said.

The issue had been largely dormant in Maryland until last week, when a Baltimore Circuit Court judge ruled that the state's ban on same-sex marriage was unconstitutional.

The ruling, which came at the start of an election year for the Maryland General Assembly and governor, triggered an immediate response from Republican lawmakers, who said they needed to quickly amend the constitution before the state's highest court had the chance to uphold the lower court.

The Republicans introduced a proposed constitutional amendment in the Senate on Wednesday.

Even though they are outnumbered in the Senate, Republicans said they may have enough support from Democrats to compel a floor vote.

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who is seeking reelection, received a memo this week from his counsel advising him of three options: Wait for the Court of Appeals to rule, lead an effort to amend the constitution or support one led by GOP legislators, aides said.

"My politics on this are very clear," Ehrlich said. "We're going to protect marriage. Traditional marriage."

Democratic leaders have been discussing a strategy that would enable them to voice a clear position without hurting candidates. They're concerned the ruling could galvanize Ehrlich's conservative base, increasing Election Day turnout for him and other Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0011935

There is also a sizable contingent of Democrats who plan to fight GOP efforts because they believe banning gay and lesbian couples from marrying is wrong.

"I think it's a waste of time for a legislative body to argue for something that is so utterly and completely discriminatory," said Del. Sharon Grosfeld (D-Montgomery).

Marriage Amendment Set For Virginia Ballot (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

The Virginia Senate yesterday gave overwhelming final approval to a constitutional amendment that would define marriage as the union of one man and one woman, clearing the way for the issue to be put to voters in November.

The measure, which also would ban same-sex civil unions, passed 28-11 after a short debate.

Meanwhile, a similar proposal is gaining momentum in Maryland since a Baltimore Circuit Court judge last week ruled that the state's 33-year-old ban on same-sex "marriage" is unconstitutional.

Traditional marriage has widespread support in the Democrat-controlled Maryland legislature.

But state Democratic leaders appear reluctant to put a constitutional amendment on the ballot because it could energize conservative voters in an election year in which Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, is seeking re-election, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, also a Republican, is running for the U.S. Senate.

Maryland House Speaker Michael E. Busch and Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., both Democrats, said that they support traditional marriage, but that the General Assembly should not consider a constitutional amendment on the issue until the state's appellate court can rule on the circuit court judge's decision.

The court isn't expected to issue a ruling before the legislature adjourns in April.

"They don't want it on the ballot," said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican. "The votes are there. This is going to boil down to politics."

In Virginia, state Sen. Stephen D. Newman said the constitutional amendment is necessary to guard against "aggressive" judges in other states, including Maryland, who are trying to redefine marriage.

"A few judges or a few localities are now presuming to change that fundamental meaning for our civilization and their actions have created confusion on the issue," the Lynchburg Republican said. "The federal courts are going to leave us with no other recourse."

Democrats, bolstered by the hundreds of Virginians who lobbied at the state Capitol yesterday for special homosexual rights, argued that the measure would write discrimination into the constitution.

"I feel this overwhelming sense of sadness today, to think that we are deliberately doing something so intolerant, so discriminatory and so overreaching," said Sen. Mary Margaret Whipple, Arlington Democrat.

Sen. Richard L. Saslaw said the amendment will not protect marriage.

"If this is a threat to your marriage, you've got a problem," the Fairfax County Democrat said.

A poll conducted earlier this month by Rasmussen Reports showed that 63 percent of Virginians and 54 percent of Marylanders would support constitutional amendments that define marriage as the union between one man and one woman.

A proposed amendment would need a three-fifths majority in the Maryland House and Senate to go before voters in November.

Virginia's House of Delegates approved the amendment 73-22 earlier this month, and yesterday's final Senate passage placed it on the Nov. 7 ballot. It does not need the signature of Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat.

On Friday, Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdock ruled that it was unconstitutional for Maryland county clerks to deny marriage licenses to nine same-sex couples who applied for them. Judge Murdock said the 1973 law defining marriage violates the state's Equal Rights Amendment to the constitution.

The Maryland Attorney General's Office is appealing the decision.

FBI Report Could Rewrite Account Of Till's Murder (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011936

JACKSON - An FBI report on the decades-old murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till could rewrite the story of the slaying that put a young man's face on racial injustice in the South during that period.

The Chicago teenager was visiting relatives in the tiny Delta town of Money when he was tortured and killed in the summer of 1955.

His brutalized body was pulled from the Tallahatchie River a few days later. A gin fan was tied to his neck.

But some details of the crime could have been distorted or embellished over the past five decades, the FBI special agent in charge of Mississippi, John G. Raucci, told The Associated Press this week.

"The facts were told one way because that's the information that was available at the time," Raucci said. "And often times it's through urban legends and folklore - and people who lived in the community pass along information from generation to generation - and the next thing you know, they become fact."

Raucci did not rule out the possibility of indictments in the case or provide a timetable for releasing the report.

The reason Till was pulled from his uncle's home late one night before being beaten and shot, differ from person to person. Some say the youngster bragged about dating white women, and Carolyn Bryant, the 21-year-old wife of grocery story owner Roy Bryant, has claimed Till asked her for date.

Others have said a wolf whistle Till let out outside the grocery store was enough to motivate Roy Bryant and his half brother to kill Till.

Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam were acquitted by an all-white jury after a five-day trial in 1955. And while Milam and Bryant later confessed to the murder in a paid interview with Look Magazine, both men are now dead and no one has been punished.

Some witnesses have said a woman's voice, likely that of Carolyn Bryant could be heard at the scene of the abduction.

A telephone listing for her in Greenville was disconnected when called by the AP on Tuesday. Carolyn Bryant has declined interviews in the past.

Investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice have reportedly said that Henry Lee Loggins, a black man who worked for Milam, has also been investigated. Loggins, 82, has denied any involvement.

Some circumstances of the murder may not yet be clear, but there is little doubt Till's death helped invigorate the civil rights movement.

Mamie Till-Mobley had her son's body returned to Chicago for an open-casket funeral.

Thousands turned out for the service and a photograph of Till's disfigured face in Jet Magazine let the world see what was happening in the South.

Now, more than 50 years later, an official FBI investigative report is under review and should soon be turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles in Greenville.

"That does not necessarily mean that everybody involved in the Emmett Till case or the overt act is still alive or will one day be prosecuted," Raucci said. "Time hurts for a variety of reasons. Evidence may no longer be available. Individuals who may have witnessed an event, time has now gotten the better of their minds."

FBI Project Targets Human Smuggling (CO)

By Franco Ordoñez

The Charlotte Observer, January 26, 2006

The FBI is launching a new effort to raise awareness of human trafficking.

Calling it an offense against humanity akin to modern-day slavery, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Charlotte estimates thousands of victims are trafficked into the state each year for forced labor and prostitution.

"This is something that is flying under the radar," said Special Agent Kevin Kendrick, who is heading the local campaign. "This is a big problem."

In conjunction with increased investigative efforts to shut down human trafficking rings, the FBI is teaming up with local advocacy groups and social organizations to get a message out that federal agents should be trusted and not feared.

The FBI, Kendrick said, is looking to assist all victims of human trafficking, even if they're living in the country illegally. Not only will the FBI protect victims and their rights, Kendrick said, the agency also will help them remain permanently.

DOJ_NMG_0011937

Human trafficking often begins with someone paying to be smuggled across the border. The situation changes when smugglers change their prices or add fees the person is unable to pay. Smugglers then force them into work to pay off the debt. The low pay often doesn't cover the debt -- turning them into indentured servants.

Victims don't report the crime because they're afraid of being arrested or deported.

Nationally, between 20,000 and 50,000 victims are trafficked into the United States each year to be exploited for use in factories, migrant farm work, construction, domestic work and prostitution, according to the FBI.

"This is a reprehensible problem," said Assistant Special Agent Robert Clifford. "We'd look at every weapon in FBI's arsenal to countering human trafficking."

In the Southeast, where nearly a quarter of the trafficking occurs, about 61 percent of victims are from Latin America. About 35 percent of the victims are forced to work on farms and 29 percent in prostitution.

The push is funded by $15 million in the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, signed by President Bush on Jan. 10. The law also provides assistance and immigration benefits to trafficking victims, including issuing special visas, so victims can remain in the country legally without the fear of being sent back home.

"We need to let people know it's OK to contact us," Kendrick said. "This is an affront against humanity. This goes far past someone's immigration status."

For More Information

The FBI is asking those who may know anything about human trafficking operations to call their Charlotte office at (704) 377-9200.

El FBI Pide Su Ayuda

Si sabe algo sobre incidentes de tráfico humano, llame el FBI en Charlotte al (704) 377-9200.

Ga. Lawmakers Approve Requiring Voter ID (AP)

AP, January 25, 2006

ATLANTA - A birth certificate might not be enough to vote in Georgia this year - legislation sent to the governor Wednesday would require photo identification before voters could cast their ballots.

Gov. Sonny Perdue said he would sign it quickly to give counties time to prepare for the primary in July and the general election in November.

The U.S. Justice Department also must approve the requirement before it takes effect.

The legislation would require voters to have a driver's license, military ID or state-issued identification card with a photo. Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills would no longer be accepted.

Supporters said it would help fight voter fraud. Critics argued it would disenfranchise the poor, minorities or elderly - people who are less likely to have driver's licenses.

Similar legislation last year was blocked by a federal judge because a state ID fee would have amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax. This year's bill waives that fee.

Appellate Court Rules Against Shreveport In Race Discrimination Lawsuit (SHREVET)

By Francis McCabe

Shreveport (LA) Times, January 26, 2006

A federal appellate court changed its stance and ruled today in favor of plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the city of Shreveport and its Fire Department, overturning a lower court's decision to dismiss the five-year-old case.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the heart of the discrimination case back to U.S. District Court in Shreveport.

The petition originally was brought against the city in 2000 by Todd Dean, who was not hired by the Fire Department and felt the city's hiring practices discriminated against him because he is white. Dean earned a higher test score than some blacks hired then, his lawsuit alleges. Other men joined the lawsuit soon after.

DOJ_NMG_0011938

The 5th Circuit's ruling should compel the city not only to cease race-based hiring procedures in all departments, but also to re-evaluate the continued validity of all city programs that incorporate race as a criteria for participation," said local attorney Pamela R. Jones, who represented Dean, Shawn Sanders and Jason Matthews in the lawsuit.

Fire Chief Kelvin Cochran said he was unaware of the decision and withheld comment until he reviews it and discusses it with the city attorney's office.

The department ended race-based hiring practices 11 months before a federal magistrate dismissed Dean's case in December 2004 hoping to avoid further lawsuits, according to officials. Now the department relies on a pass/fail civil service exam, the educational background and technical training of each candidate and psychological and physical ability exams.

The city has maintained that the Fire Department's hiring practices are based on a complaint brought by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 that said the department had discriminated against blacks and women. Up to that point, the department had hired only three black men in its history, according to court records.

Then the 5th Circuit ruled that the department had to fill "at least 50 percent of all vacancies with qualified black applicants." And the department must hire qualified women for at least 15 percent of all vacancies. The department was ordered to divide job candidates into two categories, white and black. The most qualified candidates from each category received job offers — even if the most qualified candidates were all in one category — so that jobs were equally distributed to both whites and blacks.

A consent decree was agreed to with a long-term goal of the department staff reflecting the available work force of the city.

In its ruling Wednesday, the appellate court noted its change in view of the decree: "We reviewed the decree at that time under a rational basis standard of review. This standard of review no longer applies, and we now strictly scrutinize all race-conscious remedies to ensure they are narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. Thus, as we re-evaluate the decree under strict scrutiny, we are not bound by our prior approval of it under the rational basis standard."

SIU Tweaks Web Descriptions Of Fellowships Government Questioned (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

CARBONDALE, Ill. - While threatened with a federal lawsuit over three graduate fellowships the government considers discriminatory, Southern Illinois University has tweaked the descriptions of at least two of those scholarship programs on its Web site.

The fellowships at issue were said to specifically target minorities or "underrepresented groups," before the Justice Department objected last year, but the site now says those programs seek to help "underserved" populations.

The revisions come as SIU administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off a lawsuit threatened by the government, which in demanding that SIU discontinue the fellowship programs has accused the university of engaging in "intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males."

The university has refused to publicly discuss the proposal it got from the Justice Department last week, saying only that administrators and key constituency groups were being tapped this week for feedback before the university responds.

David Gross, a spokesman for the SIU system, said Wednesday the Web site changes were done without the consent of the university's president, the Carbondale school's chancellor or the system's legal counsel and "do not reflect the proposed offer from Department of Justice."

"We believe it was an assumption made from certain administrators," he said.

Gross said it remains unclear why the changes were made. But when asked if the unauthorized revisions would be pulled from the Web site, Gross said that "at this point, we are not sure about that."

Marvin Zeman, a math professor serving as the SIU Faculty Association's president, attended a private briefing Wednesday afternoon about the Justice Department proposal but declined to discuss it afterward, saying he'd been advised not to by administrators who led the meeting. Zeman said he was told that speaking publicly about the matter would violate "attorney-client privilege."

The university Web site's page titled "Underserved Fellowships" reads that applications for two of the fellowships - the Graduate Dean's and the Proactive Recruitment of Multicultural Professionals for Tomorrow, or PROMPT - "have been extensively revised and are now open to individuals whose personal or family background, life, cultural, and/or ethnic experiences could contribute to a more reflective responsive environment in the program, the institution, and the larger academic community."

DOJ_NMG_0011939

That portion, on the page last updated Jan. 20, is highlighted by asterisks and notes that the application deadline has been extended to Feb. 17 "to allow interested students to apply under the new guidelines."

PROMPT, which provided tuition waivers and monthly stipends to 78 students since 2000, previously had stated its goal was to "increase the number of minorities receiving advanced degrees in disciplines in which they are underrepresented."

But the Web site now doesn't mention race and says the program seeks "to increase the number of individuals receiving advanced degrees ... from families which have traditionally not had access to the opportunities of higher education."

The Graduate Dean's Fellowship, used by 27 students since 2000, was formerly "for women and traditionally underrepresented students who have overcome social, cultural or economic conditions." The Web site now says that program is for "traditionally underserved individuals" who have overcome barriers to their education.

Pat McNeil, the head of the office that oversees the third program at issue, the National Science Foundation's Bridge to the Doctorate program, said that program was not accepting applications.

That program, which has helped 24 students since its start in 2004, offered a $30,000 stipend plus $10,500 for educational expenses "for underrepresented minority students" to study in fields including math and engineering.

ON THE NET

Southern Illinois University: http://www.siu.edu

Justice Department: http://usdoj.gov

EEOC Ordered To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For 'Frivolous' Legal Action (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

The U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission must pay more than $1 million to a law firm that it sued unsuccessfully for allegations of sexual harassment and pregnancy discrimination, a federal judge has ruled.

The EEOC action was a "frivolous" lawsuit against Robert L. Reeves & Associates, which practices immigration law, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian said in a ruling issued Monday.

Reeves maintained that the EEOC should have known the harassment and discrimination allegations the agency was pursuing were part of a scheme by two of his former law associates to destroy his firm, said a statement from lawyers representing Reeves.

The EEOC has already appealed the judge's findings, said Anna Park, the EEOC regional attorney in charge of the Los Angeles district office's legal division.

"I think the judge's ruling is absolutely wrong," Park said.

The EEOC originally filed suit against Reeves & Associates in 2001.

Tevrizian dismissed the case the following year and ordered EEOC to pay Reeves $363,000 in legal fees. Before the EEOC sued Reeves, Tevrizian said, commission staffers only interviewed the two former Reeves associates and a third person who was romantically involved with one of them. One of the former associates, Tevrizian added, was also a decision maker in the firm's dismissal of an employee who complained she was fired after she became pregnant.

He accused the commission of "unreasonable and just plain mean-spirited" conduct.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed Tevrizian's first decision and returned the case to his court, resulting in Monday's ruling.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Offers Rivals Source Code (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

DOJ_NMG_0011940

Financial Times, January 26, 2006

Microsoft made a concession in its six-year dispute with European competition regulators on Wednesday by offering to give rivals access to parts of its Windows source code.

With only three weeks until a compliance deadline set by Brussels, which had threatened fines of €2m ($2.5m) a day, Brad Smith, the group's general counsel, said: "We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table."

However, while the software giant said the move went beyond the Commission's requirements, rivals were quick to say it fell far short of the demands on Microsoft. The Commission refused to say whether the offer was good enough.

Microsoft's offer, which it hopes will remove the threat of fresh financial penalties, came in response to a European Commission warning last month that it would impose fines unless the software group complied quickly with Brussels' 2004 antitrust ruling against the US group. The daily fines would come on top of the record €497m payment the Commission ordered in 2004.

The regulator said Microsoft had failed to comply with a part of the ruling requiring the software group to share information about its Windows operating system. That information, the Commission argues, is essential for rivals wanting to develop software that works with Windows-driven computers and servers.

Microsoft argues that in giving away a part of its source code – the basic programming instructions that form the core of the operating system – it has gone beyond the Commission's demand. But rivals say that instead it has dumped a vast amount of data on companies without the "road map" that tells them how to use it. The regulator did not, however, order Microsoft to release parts of the Windows source code.

In an attempt to end months of wrangling over the extent of the information required by the decision, Microsoft said it would license the relevant parts of the Windows source code.

Mr Smith said: "We have come to the conclusion that the only way to be certain of satisfying the Commission's demands is to go beyond the 2004 decision and offer a licence to the source code of the Windows server operating system."

Microsoft's rivals dismissed the group's offer. Thomas Vinje, a partner at Clifford Chance, who represents several Microsoft rivals, said the move was a "PR ploy". He added: "Microsoft is offering to dump a huge load of source code on companies that have not asked for source code and cannot use it. Without a roadmap that says how to use the code, a software engineer will not be able to design interoperable products."

Mr Smith had pointed out that the group had drawn up 12,000 pages of interoperability information for potential licensees, and had offered free advice on how to use the technical specifications contained on those pages.

Microsoft To Make More Code Available Move Made To Comply With EU Antitrust Sanctions (USAT)

By Byron Acohido

USA Today, January 26, 2006

SEATTLE — Microsoft said Wednesday that it will make more of its proprietary computer code available to rivals in an effort to comply with European antitrust sanctions.

The computer code, which normally can be viewed only by Microsoft employees and partners, is central to its Windows computer operating system.

The European Commission issued a terse statement saying it would "study carefully" Microsoft's announcement "once it has received the full details." The software giant is locked in a dispute about penalties that the Commission, the European Union's administrative arm, levied in March 2004.

Microsoft already has paid a record $613 million fine. And it has supplied Europe with a version of Windows for desktop PCs with Windows Media Player removed. But it has failed to make it easier for other software suppliers to write business applications that run smoothly on Windows server software.

Last October, Microsoft offered to share 12,000 pages of technical documents with other software companies, as long as they paid a licensing fee. The documents would make it easier for them to write programs that work well with Windows.

DOJ_NMG_0011941

But an independent monitor found the package to be “totally unfit.” The Commission in late December said it would fine the company $2.4 million a day if it failed to comply by Jan. 25, later extending the deadline to Feb. 15.

Meanwhile, Microsoft has said it expects to reverse the Commission's overall ruling in an appeal before Europe's Court of First Instance; hearings are to begin in Luxembourg in April.

“It looks a bit like Microsoft stalling for time, as it readies for the bigger battle,” said James Governor, London-based tech analyst for consulting firm RedMonk.

Microsoft on Wednesday sweetened the licensing plan by adding computer code to the package. “Today, we are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table so we can put technical compliance issues to rest,” Microsoft's general counsel Brad Smith said at a press conference in Brussels.

This is not the first time Microsoft has let outsiders view such code. It has granted governments, academics and business partners varying levels of access under tight restrictions.

“That statement suggests that the whole enchilada is on the table,” said tech industry analyst Paul DeGroot, who tracks the company's licensing programs for research firm Directions on Microsoft. “But that's simply impossible. It would mark a huge and strange departure for Microsoft, far beyond anything required.”

Microsoft Offers Blueprint License To Avert Fines (REU)

By David Lawsky and Sabina Zawadzki

Reuters, January 25, 2006

BRUSSELS (Reuters) - Microsoft Corp. will license some of its secret software blueprints in an effort to avert fines of up to 2 million euros ($2.5 million) a day for failing to comply with European antitrust penalties, the U.S. company said on Wednesday.

"We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table, so we can put technical compliance issues to rest and move forward with a serious discussion about the substance of this case," Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith said.

The European Commission said in a response three hours later that it would "study carefully the announcement" by Microsoft.

Microsoft's offer to license a small amount of its source code, relating to server software that helps manage tasks like printing within a group of desktop machines, would help proprietary software makers but not the so-called open source community.

Smith said he was telling a news conference, rather than the Commission, about the plan because "it now is a public issue" as the EU executive had revealed publicly its intention to impose the fines.

But a lawyer who represents opponents of Microsoft dismissed Smith's comments as "purely a PR ploy" and said large amounts of source code would be entirely useless, even with 500 free hours of support promised by Microsoft.

"They would dump millions of lines of code and finding what competitors need to interoperate would be like looking for a needle in a haystack. Even the most sophisticated software engineers would be lost," said Thomas Vinje.

The Commission decided in March 2004 that Microsoft had violated European Union antitrust laws by exploiting its dominant position to compete unfairly against other companies, and fined it 497 million euros.

Microsoft appealed against that decision to the Court of First Instance (CFI) in Luxembourg. Earlier in the day, the court announced a hearing on the full case would be heard before a 13-judge panel on April 24-28.

As part of the Commission's decision, Microsoft was also supposed to offer rivals so-called protocols, or rules of the road, that would enable rival makers of server software to work as well with Microsoft's Windows operating system as Microsoft server software does.

But a Microsoft-nominated trustee said that documentation to help rivals use its protocols was "fundamentally flawed". Earlier this week, the U.S. Justice Department made similar complaints about Microsoft software being licensed there.

SOURCE CODE

Smith was critical of the European trustee's comments, but said that in any event the company's offer would resolve all questions.

DOJ_NMG_0011942

"The Windows source code is the ultimate documentation of Windows server technologies," Smith said. "With this step our goal is to resolve all questions about the sufficiency of our technical documentation."

Microsoft shares were up 0.2 percent at $26.45 by 1732 GMT.

Smith said all source code related to protocols in the Commission remedy would be made available, but only for inspection. It may not be used by licensees.

He said Microsoft would charge no extra money for the code beyond what it was already planning to charge for the protocol licenses.

At this point, however, the price Microsoft wants others to pay for licensing is itself an issue before the EU executive.

Critics of Microsoft contend that protocols are standard software and that Microsoft has used what is essentially a digital combination lock to make them inaccessible.

A Commission spokesman said if that turns out to be true then Microsoft has no right to charge for them.

However, Microsoft says that the protocols include valuable patents and that it should be able to charge for their use, an argument under review at the Commission.

The price that Microsoft charges for licensing and the clarity of its protocols documentation are the two issues which could lead to the daily fine of up to 2 million euros.

A lawyer for some "open source" software developers, who reveal their source code openly, said the offer was of no interest to his clients.

Carlo Piana, who is the lawyer for the Free Software Foundation Europe and Microsoft competitor Samba, said the licensing would be useful for non-open source developers.

"This demonstrates that Microsoft doesn't fear very much competition from proprietary developers but rather from free software developers," he said.

Microsoft To License Windows Source Code In EU (AP)

AP, January 25, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium – Microsoft Corp. said today it will license part of its Windows source code, in what it called a voluntary step going beyond a European Union antitrust ruling.

The source code provides the building blocks of the operating system that competitors need to make products compatible with Windows.

The company's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said sharing the part of the Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code that helps rival PCs communicate with Windows servers was "a bold stroke" that should answer both EU and U.S. regulators' concerns.

"The source code is the ultimate documentation," he said. "It should have the answer to any questions that remain."

He insisted that Microsoft had already complied in December with an EU order to supply technical information by handing over up to 12,000 pages of documentation and offering 500 hours of free technical support to rivals worth some $100,000.

An independent monitor nominated by Microsoft found last month that the documents were "totally unfit for its intended purpose."

Microsoft has refused to license the source code in the past. Software developers licensed under a European Commission program will still have to pay for the code, which open source advocates will not be allowed to "publish for free," Smith cautioned. The company had "just started to provide this information on both sides on the Atlantic" and regulators "want to see all the details," Smith added.

The company only plans to make available the source code that implements the communications server protocols. Smith said there were no plans to publish the entire Windows source code.

Governments and some customers are already allowed to look at the code, but this is the first time it has been available to rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0011943

In March 2004, the EU executive levied a record $613 million fine against Microsoft, ordered it to share code with rivals and offer an unbundled version of Windows without the Media Player software for what the court saw as an abuse of the company's dominant position in the industry.

Last month, the European Commission threatened to fine Microsoft up to $2.36 million a day backdated to Dec. 15 for failing to obey, saying the software giant was being intransigent about sharing data with competitors.

today's move is designed "to put that issue to rest," Smith said.

Microsoft has launched a legal challenge scheduled to be heard by the European Court of First Instance on April 24-28.

Smith told a news conference he was confident of winning the case, saying the world had moved on since the EU opened its antitrust investigation eight years ago.

"If anything, it is clear that there are more opportunities for competitors today than there were a few years ago," he said.

"This case is going to establish the law that will determine how companies that have popular technology products can integrate new features into them."

Earlier, the EU had repeated its complaints that Microsoft was not complying with its demands.

"Microsoft is not disclosing complete and accurate interface information to allow non-Microsoft workgroup servers to receive full interoperability with Windows PCs and servers," said EU spokesman Jonathan Todd.

He said EU regulators took note that the U.S. Department of Justice was also claiming that Microsoft was failing to provide the technical information asked for in a Justice Department settlement.

In December, Microsoft said the EU Commission was trying to undermine its Windows operating system with more demands for technological transparency, and that it would contest the measure under EU law.

Todd said this was untrue. "We are not moving the goal posts as has been suggested," he said. "We are not changing our demands."

Todd stressed that the final word on whether Microsoft is meeting the terms of the EU antitrust order "rests in the first place with the Commission and not Microsoft."

Microsoft Bares Code To Avoid Fines (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Microsoft Corp. offered to allow rivals some access to the proprietary source code of its Windows operating system, a move designed to head off large daily fines in Europe and mollify increasingly impatient antitrust authorities in the U.S.

The offer to partly unveil the map of Windows was a shrewd step for Microsoft, analysts said. It may deflect criticism that Microsoft is defying legal orders to share programming information with rivals and government investigators. It also could thwart the ambitions of software developers who advocate free or "open source" access -- a threat to Microsoft's fee-based software business.

Microsoft was castigated yesterday by rival camps as trying to fake out regulators, with one calling the offer "a poisoned honey pot" that couldn't be used without risking legal jeopardy.

To answer European demands, Microsoft would allow competitors to review computer code that handles how two large "server" computers trade data. Microsoft is under orders in Europe to license so-called communications protocols that allow other software to mesh better with Microsoft's systems, and faces the threat of a €2 million ($2.5 million) daily fine if regulators aren't satisfied with its efforts. Microsoft currently provides some documentation about the protocols; handing over the source code -- the programming instructions used to make the software -- reveals more information about how the operating system works.

Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith yesterday called the code the "DNA" of Windows. In a Brussels news conference, Mr. Smith called the offer a "bold stroke" that would leave little doubt that Microsoft was cooperating with orders to open up software markets. The license would be restrictive, however, only allowing competitors to view and search through the code, not copy it, and only over a protected Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0011944

The move came after the Justice Department complained in a court filing this week about Microsoft's compliance with U.S. legal requirements -- and six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Antitrust Act against monopoly abuse. The Justice Department said the Redmond, Wash., software giant had provided inaccurate information to a technical committee, and described one incident as "particularly troubling" because it delayed an investigative team that had traveled to India. The filing also said the company had "fallen significantly behind" in complying with monitors' technical requests.

In Europe, the eight-year-old Microsoft case heated up in December when European Union regulators announced they were formally charging the company with evading a March 2004 order to share certain programming information with competitors. Regulators cited a report from a consultant, British computer scientist Neil Barrett, who said trying to make use of the Microsoft's programming information was "an absolutely frustrating, time-consuming and ultimately fruitless task."

The European Commission, the EU's regulatory arm, said in a statement that it would "study carefully" Mr. Smith's announcement. The statement reiterated that Microsoft has until Feb. 15 to answer the commission's formal complaint of intransigence. The Justice Department said only that it was discussing the source-code proposal with Microsoft.

A major objective in the European antitrust case is to open up Microsoft-dominated software markets to competition from so-called open-source developers. Because open-source software can be copied and modified and can run on the free Linux operating system, it is attractive to large companies and poses an increasing threat to Microsoft.

Open-source developers condemned Microsoft's offer to share source code as a feint. They fear that having any kind of access to the source code will make them vulnerable to later allegations from Microsoft of theft of patented intellectual property, if they write software that happens to mimic Microsoft's code.

"We will never look at Microsoft source code, never," said Volker Lendecke, a programmer for the free Samba network software. "They will sue us in an instant." Added Georg Greve, president of the Free Software Foundation Europe, a party to the European antitrust suit: "We never wanted their source code in the first place. It's putting out a poisoned honey pot."

In the U.S. case, the source code at issue is for Microsoft's Windows operating system for desktop computers. In Europe, the source code Microsoft is offering to license is for operating systems on the large computers that served as hubs for offices.

In 2001, the Bush administration dropped the U.S. government's case against Microsoft, but ordered it to change certain anticompetitive practices. In Europe, Microsoft paid a €497 million fine in 2004 but has appealed the EU's antitrust allegations to the Luxembourg-based Court of First Instance. The court announced yesterday that it will hold hearings in the case from April 24 to 28. A verdict will come about six months later, a court official said.

Guidant Can't Refuse Boston Scientific's Offer (USAT)

By Edward Iwata, Usa Today

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Medical device maker Guidant (GDT) on Wednesday accepted Boston Scientific's $27 billion bid, rebuffing a lower offer from Johnson & Johnson (JNJ) and ending a long-running takeover war.

The companies have been vying for an edge in the growing multibillion-dollar market for medical and heart devices, and Guidant's pacemakers, defibrillators and stents made it an attractive acquisition target.

The merger, to be completed early this year, will make Boston Scientific (BSX) the world's No. 2 maker of implantable pacemakers and defibrillators. Boston Scientific also will gain share in the market for heart stent devices, which hold open blood vessels.

Guidant CEO Jim Cornelius said: "We believe the transaction and the strategic rationale for this combination are in the best interests of our patients, employees, customers and shareholders — reflecting the full value of our firm."

Most Wall Street analysts and some Guidant investors had urged Guidant to take the pricier Boston Scientific offer, calling it a better long-term investment than J&J's deal. The combined company will have $9 billion in revenue in 2006, Boston Scientific says.

"I think Boston will do a good job," analyst Bruce Nudell of Sanford Bernstein told Bloomberg News. "They have the cash flow to pay off the debt. The revenue base is diversified and strengthened. It's a better investment vehicle with Guidant than without it."

DOJ_NMG_0011945

Boston Scientific will buy all Guidant shares at $80 each — $42 in cash and $38 in stock. Guidant shareholders will own 36% of the company. Boston Scientific also will cover a $705 million merger breakup fee that Guidant owes J&J.

To help close the deal and appease antitrust regulators, Boston Scientific teamed with Abbott Laboratories. Abbott will pay Boston Scientific $6.4 billion in cash to buy Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses.

Approvals are needed from U.S. and European regulators, plus shareholders for both companies.

Johnson & Johnson had offered $25 billion for Guidant in December 2004, but lowered its offer to $21 billion because of Guidant's legal and regulatory problems with recalled products and lawsuits.

In December, Boston Scientific set off a takeover battle when it offered $25 billion. After another round of bidding, Boston Scientific triumphed Wednesday.

Johnson & Johnson, which had $50 billion in revenue in 2005, could look for other acquisitions.

John Putnam, an analyst at Stanford Group, told the Associated Press on Wednesday that a higher bid by J&J would have hurt the conglomerate in future acquisitions, signaling that J&J "didn't have the financial discipline they've always been known for."

"We are excited about combining the talent and experience of Boston Scientific and Guidant employees," said Jim Tobin, Boston Scientific's president and CEO. "We look forward to working with Guidant to complete the transaction quickly and to creating a global leader in cardiovascular devices."

In filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission this month, Boston Scientific said Guidant's pacemakers and defibrillators could account for nearly one-quarter of pro forma sales. The heart device market is expected to grow by nearly 25% by 2008.

That growth will likely offset any of Guidant's legal liability — estimated to be as high as $2 billion — that Boston Scientific may have to absorb. Guidant has been plagued by lawsuits and regulatory investigations following multiple recalls and safety advisories. At least seven deaths have been linked to faulty devices.

Contributing: Reuters

Copyright 2006 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

Quiet End To Battle Of The Bids (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

For Johnson & Johnson, Tuesday started with a morning conference call with analysts to discuss earnings and ended with William C. Weldon, the company's chief executive, and Robert J. Darretta Jr., the chief financial officer, attending a dinner for several dozen institutional investors at the "21" Club in New York. Throughout the day and evening, the company maintained a rigid silence about the one subject on everyone's mind — whether it would respond to a midnight deadline to counter Boston Scientific's bold $27 billion offer for Guidant.

"They wanted to talk about anything but Guidant," said one investor who attended the dinner. "It was the elephant in the room."

Only yesterday morning did Johnson & Johnson address the elephant, in a terse news release saying the company had "determined not to increase its last offer for Guidant Corporation, because to do so would not have been in the best interest of its shareholders." About the only comment was its reminder that Guidant was obliged to pay it a $705 million breakup fee by today.

It was a remarkably quiet conclusion to the biggest and most contentious takeover battle yet in the medical device industry. The outcome leaves Boston Scientific as the apparent winner of Guidant, the No. 2 company in the $10 billion market for defibrillators and other implantable devices that regulate human heartbeats.

Those two companies announced their deal yesterday, pending the approval of shareholders and regulators. People close to the takeover negotiations say it had become evident at least 24 hours before the midnight deadline that a counteroffer was unlikely because Johnson & Johnson's advisers had stopped communicating with the Guidant team.

But in many ways, Johnson & Johnson had been forced into silence much earlier — by choices it made last fall, when it assumed it had the upper hand in its merger dealings with Guidant and reduced its offer by nearly $4 billion.

It was a short time later that Boston Scientific mounted its surprise takeover effort and emerged as the company willing to risk the most to acquire Guidant. By last week, having decided not to raise its own bid of $71 a share, Johnson & Johnson was reduced to behind-the-scenes attacks on the rationality of Boston Scientific's $80-a-share offer. It apparently hoped that Boston Scientific's stock would decline so far that Guidant shareholders would begin to doubt the deal's value.

Johnson & Johnson was not talking yesterday, but some analysts say the company's tough bargaining last fall resulted not only in the company's losing Guidant, but a certain amount of corporate luster as well.

"Their reputation had been as a savvy acquirer and a fair acquirer, and I think those two elements have been diminished in this," said Jan David Wald, a health care analyst at A. G. Edwards & Sons. Johnson & Johnson's declining drug sales in the United States make further expansion into medical devices a necessity, Mr. Wald said, but the Guidant stumble could hinder its ability to pursue future deals.

There are risks for Boston Scientific in coming out on top of this fight, not the least of which is the possibility that it is paying too much for Guidant to ever recoup its investment. And Johnson & Johnson could try to slow down Boston Scientific's efforts to close the Guidant deal by pressing antitrust objections at the Federal Trade Commission.

Such delays might send Boston Scientific's stock below $22.62, the price at which the value of the stock portion of the deal would begin shrinking, and induce Guidant investors to vote against the merger. Boston Scientific's shares are down nearly 14 percent since it announced its first bid in December, including a decline of 2 percent yesterday, to $23.54.

But Johnson & Johnson has lost its biggest advantage — the fact that its merger deal had been fully reviewed by regulators and could have been completed immediately after a Guidant shareholders' vote that had been scheduled for Jan. 31. "The odds of them stopping this are not high," said Matthew Dodds, who follows the industry for Citigroup. "They are fully committed to walking."

Analysts say that may be best for all concerned. Johnson & Johnson could easily afford Guidant. And it desperately needs Guidant or some other large, fast-growing acquisition to mollify shareholders restive about the stagnation in its drug business. But Johnson & Johnson's shareholders have apparently shared management's concern about overpaying for Guidant. Johnson & Johnson's shares fell every time it raised its bid for Guidant.

Analysts have published a blizzard of speculation about whether Johnson & Johnson will now turn its attention to smaller device companies — like St. Jude Medical, the third-ranked producer of heart-regulating implants, or Conor Medsystems, the developer of a promising new stent design for propping open heart arteries.

But some also note that the company could just as easily look for growth outside devices by purchasing drug or biotech companies.

"J.& J. has the financial strength to move on and the cash to acquire elsewhere to further its growth prospects," said Kenneth R. Weakley, who follows the industry for UBS, the brokerage house that sponsored Tuesday evening's dinner at the "21" Club. Mr. Weakley called the failure to close the deal with Guidant a "heartache, not a heart attack" for the company.

Johnson & Johnson's stock has fallen 4.4 percent since Boston Scientific first entered the bidding war, including a decline yesterday of 86 cents, to $58.50.

Boston Scientific clearly faces stiffer challenges. While Guidant will immediately transform it into a company with more than $9 billion in annual revenues and a shot at double-digit revenue growth for years to come, the cost of the transaction will eat into earnings for at least five years, according to most analysts' estimates.

In the near term, analysts will be closely watching whether Boston Scientific can keep to its ambitious timetable for completing regulatory reviews and close the deal by the end of this quarter. Under the terms of the agreement, it must pay interest to Guidant shareholders at a 6 percent annual rate for every day after March 31 that the closing is delayed.

The terms of the deal put extreme pressure on Boston Scientific to maintain the market share and profit margins of its blockbuster drug-coated stent, Taxus, which doctors use to keep patients' coronary arteries propped open after blockages are cleared. Boston Scientific will also need to meet targets for introducing important new products, like a disposable line of endoscopes, used to diagnose gastrointestinal problems, that is scheduled to be released later this year.

DOJ_NMG_0011947

Taxus is the market leader in the $6 billion market in countries where it competes with Cypher, Johnson & Johnson's drug-coated stent, but that lead has eroded. In addition, Medtronic recently entered the drug-coated stent market in Europe, and Guidant received word Tuesday that Europe is about to approve its Xience stent.

The one clear winner in the deal, analysts said, is Abbott Laboratories, which injected up to $6.2 billion into Boston Scientific's offer through a variety of side deals, stock sales and below-market-rate loans to that company. The payoff is that Abbott would receive virtually all of Guidant's business except for its heart-regulating implants. On news of the deal and a forecast of strong drug sales during Abbott's fourth-quarter earnings announcement, the company's stock was up more than 5 percent yesterday.

The Guidant portfolio of products to treat damage to the circulatory system from diseases like diabetes generates more than $1 billion annually in sales. It would transform Abbott into a major player in outpatient clinics and hospital laboratories that deliver therapy through catheters as an alternative to more invasive surgical treatments. Analysts say its share of the Guidant deal could begin contributing to Abbott's earnings next year.

That outcome represents a huge improvement from the gains Abbott could have expected if Johnson & Johnson had acquired Guidant. Under that deal, Abbott was to receive access to a valuable stent implant system and rights to certain stent-coating drugs. Johnson & Johnson had worked out that arrangement to satisfy antitrust objections. But those were mere hors d'oeuvres for Abbott, while Boston Scientific offered a seven-course meal.

Judge Sets Court Hearing On BlackBerry Injunction (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. and NTP Inc. will appear in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia Feb. 24 for the court to consider a shutdown of U.S. sales and service of the popular wireless email device.

In recent court filings, RIM, based in Waterloo, Ontario, argued a BlackBerry shutdown isn't warranted for various reasons, including recent preliminary moves by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to reject NTP's wireless email patents.

NTP, a Virginia patent holding concern, argues a BlackBerry shutdown is appropriate, since the court has already found RIM infringed on NTP's patents and case law calls for such a shutdown. The court could rule on the injunction as early as Feb. 24 or in the days following, an NTP lawyer said.

RIM could appeal a shutdown, lawyers following the case have said, though it isn't clear that would delay a court-ordered shutdown.

The U.S. Supreme Court this week declined a RIM appeal of the case.

Change From Within At Disney (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

A couple of years ago, nothing seemed less likely than the sale of Pixar to the Walt Disney Company. At the time, it looked as if the two companies wouldn't even be able to agree on the terms of their distribution deal, which gave Disney, then run by Michael Eisner, an unfair stake in Pixar's films, according to Pixar's chief executive, Steven Jobs. Now Mr. Eisner is gone, and on Tuesday Disney's board approved an offer of $7.4 billion, about $59 a share, to acquire Pixar, whose major shareholder is Mr. Jobs. The deal now goes to the Pixar board.

A company like that — and a figure like Mr. Jobs, notable for his dynamic role at both Apple and Pixar — doesn't let itself be bought for money alone, though the money is certainly enticing enough. This is really an opportunity to infect, and change, the creative culture of Disney, which, back in its founder's day, used to be one of the most creative places around.

Steven Jobs will take a seat on Disney's board, and John Lasseter, who is the chief creative officer at Pixar and a former Disney animator, will probably take over as head of animation at Disney. Disney's animated films have been nothing to shout about in the past decade or so, while Pixar, driven by extraordinary shifts in computer technology, has produced one imaginative and highly profitable hit after another.

On the surface, this looks like the joining of two companies whose shared mission is to produce cultural content. But Mr. Jobs's other company — Apple — has helped create, with its video iPods, a revolution in the way cultural content is distributed.

DOJ_NMG_0011948

For Pixar and Apple, there is only an upside in this deal. The same is true for Disney, especially if it keeps shedding the ways of Mr. Eisner's old company and allows itself to become what may turn out to be, in the end, Mr. Jobs's company after all.

ENVIRONMENT:

US Grand Jury Indicts Three For 'eco-terrorism' (REU)

By Michael Fitzgerald

Reuters, January 25, 2006

SACRAMENTO, California (Reuters) - A federal grand jury indicted three alleged "eco-terrorists" on Wednesday on charges of plotting to blow up facilities like dams and cell phone towers.

"These three individuals planned to commit a number of dangerous and destructive acts in our region, all in the name of the Environmental Liberation Front," U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott told a news conference in the California state capital.

The grand jury indicted Eric McDavid, 28, of Foresthill, California, Zachary Jenson, 20, of Washington state, and Lauren Weiner, 20, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The trio was arrested January 13 outside a retail store in Auburn, California, following six months of surveillance of McDavid by federal authorities.

According to Scott, McDavid attended two meetings of anarchist groups, one in July in Indiana and a second in August in Philadelphia, at which he announced intentions to construct explosive devices from common household items.

He also said he planned to blow up several northern California facilities and expressed a desire to kill a police officer, Scott said.

Officials said one of the bombing targets was the U.S. Forest Service Institute of Forest Genetics in Placerville, California. Other potential targets include the Nimbus Dam and Fish Hatchery, east of Sacramento, cell phone towers and electric power stations.

The charges were not related to a separate 65-count indictment handed down on Monday in Washington involving 11 environmental and animal rights activists in the Western United States.

Scott that McDavid recruited the other two defendants and conspired with them to construct homemade bombs and scout potential target locations. He said the trio rented a house east of Sacramento in the foothills where they engaged in bomb-making.

At some point, the three were joined by an unnamed woman who was a government informant.

"Because of the exceptional work of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and the brave efforts of a confidential source they were prevented from carrying out their planned attacks," the U.S. Attorney said.

"They were acquiring very significant materials. ... We thought it better to shut it down. We were satisfied we had enough evidence to bring a criminal prosecution," Scott said.

The three defendants, now in Sacramento County jail, face maximum sentences of 20 years in federal prison.

EPA Moves To Ban Cookware Chemicals (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, January 26, 2006

In a surprise turn Wednesday, the Environmental Protection Agency moved to eliminate the production of a suspected carcinogen used in the making of Teflon and other non-stick and non-stain coatings.

The EPA has asked eight manufacturers that use a family of chemicals known as perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, to reduce production 95% by 2010 and to stop using it altogether by 2015.

PFOA, which is found in the blood of more than 95% of Americans, has been tied to cancer and developmental damage in animal studies. It is used in the process that makes water-, stain- and grease-resistant products, everything from microwave popcorn bags to pizza box liners, non-stick cookware to pillows, upholstery to carpets.

Environmentalists and consumer groups have long dogged the agency to act.

DOJ_NMG_0011949

"The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do for our environment and our health," says Susan Hazen of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances.

"This program will call on industry to essentially eliminate PFOA release and its presence in products over the next decade."

EPA officials are calling for voluntary PFOA cutbacks because "under the Toxic Substances Control Act, they don't have authority to ban it," says Richard Wiles of the Environmental Working Group, a public interest group that has long fought to bring public attention to PFOA in the environment.

If the EPA is able to get the chemicals phased out, Wiles says, it will be "the single biggest action the agency has ever taken."

The DuPont Company announced Wednesday that it would comply with the EPA's voluntary guidelines. "DuPont has been aggressively reducing PFOA emissions to the environment," DuPont vice president Susan Stalnecker says.

DuPont has been at the center of the controversy. The company agreed in December to pay $10.25 million in fines and $6.25 million for research and education to resolve federal charges that it hid information about the dangers posed by PFOA.

Less toxic alternatives are readily available, says Scott Mabury, a professor of environmental chemistry at the University of Toronto in Canada.

PFOA is characterized by a chain of eight carbon atoms. But a version of four carbon atoms works well and doesn't accumulate in bodies, Mabury says. "You won't find them in huge quantities in polar bears or human blood, like we do the eight-carbon version. There will be chemical pollution from it but you can't have toxicology if you don't have exposure. It is an appropriate chemical solution to a chemical problem."

Harmful Teflon Chemical To Be Eliminated By 2015 (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Eight U.S. companies, including giant DuPont Co., agreed yesterday to virtually eliminate a harmful chemical used to make Teflon from all consumer products coated with the ubiquitous nonstick material.

Although the chemical would still be used to manufacture Teflon and similar products, processes will be developed to ensure that perfluorooctanoic acid (PFOA) would not be released into the environment from finished products or manufacturing plants.

PFOA -- a key processing agent in making nonstick and stain-resistant materials -- has been linked to cancer and birth defects in animals and is in the blood of 95 percent of Americans, including pregnant women. It has also been found in the blood of marine organisms and Arctic polar bears.

The voluntary pact, which was crafted by the Environmental Protection Agency, will force companies to reduce manufacturing emissions of PFOA by 95 percent by no later than 2010. They will also have to reduce trace amounts of the compound in consumer products by 95 percent during the same period and virtually eliminate them by 2015.

The agreement will dramatically reduce the extent to which PFOA shows up in a wide variety of everyday products, including pizza boxes, nonstick pans and microwave-popcorn bags.

While not as sweeping as the federal ban on DDT in 1972, yesterday's agreement is expected to have profound implications for public health and the environment. An independent federal scientific advisory board is expected to recommend soon whether the government should classify the chemical as a "likely" or "probable" carcinogen in humans, which could trigger a new set of federal regulations.

"The science is still coming in on PFOA, but the concern is there," said Susan B. Hazen, acting assistant administrator of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances. "This is the right thing to do for our health and our environment."

The move, which came just a month after DuPont reached a $16.5 million settlement with EPA over the company's failure to report possible health risks associated with PFOA, drew applause from environmental groups that have frequently criticized both the administration and DuPont.

DOJ_NMG_0011950

"This is one of those days when the Environmental Protection Agency is at its best. With its announcement today, the EPA is challenging an entire industry to err on the side of precaution and public safety, and invent new ways of doing business," said Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, an advocacy organization. "As harshly as we have singled out DuPont for criticism for its past handling of PFOA pollution, today we want to single out and commend the company and acknowledge its leadership going forward."

DuPont officials said they were confident they could alter manufacturing methods over the coming decade to contain PFOA exposure from products that generated $1 billion in sales for the company in 2004.

"It's important to do this because this is a persistent material in the environment, and it's at low levels in people's blood," said David Boothe, DuPont's global business director. To remove PFOA, he said, the company will subject some of its products to extra heat and will sometimes add a step in the manufacturing process. "We're going to push it really hard and take it as far as we can."

Scientific studies have not established a link between using products containing trace amounts of PFOA, such as microwave-popcorn bags or nonstick pans, and elevated cancer levels. Hazen said yesterday's announcement should "not indicate any concern . . . for consumers using household products" with such coatings.

Several other companies agreed yesterday to reduce public exposure to the chemical, including 3M Co., Ciba and Clariant Corp. But DuPont, which settled a class-action suit last year accusing it of contaminating drinking water in Ohio and West Virginia communities near its plant in Parkersburg, W.Va., has attracted the most public scrutiny over its PFOA use.

William Bailey III, who was born in 1981 with multiple birth defects while his mother, Sue, was working with the chemical at the Parkersburg plant, said he will "be watching" to see if the chemical giant complies with the new agreement.

"They're trying to save face," said Bailey, who is suing DuPont over his birth defects.

E.P.A. Seeks To Phase Out A Toxic Chemical (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The Environmental Protection Agency has asked DuPont and seven other chemical companies to stop using a toxic substance in the making of everyday products, including Teflon-coated pans, that has been linked in some studies to cancer, strokes and other health problems.

Announcing the voluntary program, officials of the agency said Wednesday that full compliance by the companies and their overseas affiliates would lead to a 95 percent reduction by 2010 in use of the substance, perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, and to their total elimination by 2015.

DuPont immediately pledged to join the program, saying it had already reduced its PFOA manufacturing emissions by 94 percent and had developed new technologies that could reduce PFOA content in products by more than 97 percent. The other companies are expected to commit to the program as well. They are 3M/Dyneon, Arkema, Asahi, Ciba, Clariant, Daikin and Solvay Solexis.

PFOA makes high-performance plastics resistant to fire, grease and stains. Its presence may be best known in Teflon, made by DuPont, but it is also found in fabrics, leather, automobile parts, wire insulation and microwave popcorn bags.

Uncertainties still surround the way PFOA exposure affects humans, and as part of the new program, the companies will provide test data so that those questions can be explored.

"The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do," said Susan B. Hazen, acting assistant administrator of the agency's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances.

Bush Seeks To Jump-Start Nuclear Power (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration plans to announce a $250 million initiative to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, a first step toward reversing a 1970s policy that rejected reprocessing as too dangerous to pursue.

DOJ_NMG_0011951

The administration's decision to put the money into its fiscal 2007 budget to test new technologies is part of an effort to jump-start the nuclear-power industry at a time when energy prices are high and concerns about global warming make nuclear power plants more acceptable.

According to nuclear industry officials and others briefed on the proposal in recent weeks, the program could be announced as early as next week in President Bush's State of the Union address. If the technology works, it could vastly reduce the amount of spent nuclear waste that would have to be buried in underground storage, such as at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, set to open after 2012.

The initiative will also explore using one or more temporary, above-ground nuclear-waste storage sites to relieve the logjam that has left thousands of tons of nuclear waste stored around reactors, many located near big cities. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Department of Energy experts have worried about the damage that could be caused by a terrorist attack on the spent fuel.

The heart of the initiative is reprocessing technology called UREX+ being developed by Argonne National Laboratory in Illinois. It is a method of removing plutonium and other long-lived radioactive elements in spent nuclear fuel that makes the elements reusable in nuclear power plants, but difficult to use for making nuclear weapons.

The process, according to its scientific backers, would also save the bulk of other elements in spent nuclear fuel, primarily uranium, to be reused or disposed of in facilities that don't require thousands of years of storage, such as the plant being prepared at Yucca Mountain. Phillip J. Finck, an Argonne official, told the House Science Committee last summer that UREX+ would reduce the nation's eventual need for more nuclear-waste storage by "a factor of more than 100."

The technology involves burning plutonium and other long-lived byproducts in special "fast" reactors. However, Dr. Finck added: "The practicality of these schemes is not yet established and requires additional scientific and engineering research."

The Bush proposal, tentatively called the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, would also give U.S. vendors, such as General Electric Co., opportunities to sell nuclear-power reactors and nuclear fuel to developing nations. It would promote the export of simpler, smaller and less-costly reactors and nuclear fuel on the condition that the U.S. would take back the spent fuel for reprocessing. While a safe way to reprocess nuclear waste also would remove a licensing hurdle to new nuclear plants in the U.S., building nuclear plants here will remain a costly and lengthy process.

The proposal is likely to renew a decades-old fight in Congress on U.S. nuclear-waste policy. "We're supportive of the concepts as a company and as an industry," said Christopher Crane, chief nuclear officer for Exelon Corp., which operates 17 nuclear reactors among the 103 running in the U.S. "We do agree that there is a good deal of unused energy in the fuel we have discharged from our reactors. We think it's positive that the U.S. Department of Energy and the administration want to look at ways to handle that."

Nuclear-industry officials said that without reprocessing, new nuclear plants called for by President Bush in his 2001 energy policy may not be licensed. Yucca Mountain will reach its storage limit -- 70,000 tons -- with waste produced by 2010 from existing plants.

The Department of Energy predicts that as many as eight more underground-storage sites may be needed by the end of the century if the current cycle for power plant fuel continues.

Thomas B. Cochran, a nuclear physicist at the Natural Resources Defense Council, which promoted the earlier policy to ban nuclear reprocessing along with other environmental and arms control groups, called the new reprocessing technology "uneconomical, unreliable, unsafe and unworkable." He predicted the utility industry wouldn't support its long-term costs, particularly the "fast" reactors that transform spent fuel by bombarding it with neutrons -- powerful, subatomic particles -- that can further reduce the radioactive waste content.

Ernest Muniz, a physicist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a former Clinton administration official at the Department of Energy, said he supports the renewed research and development of reprocessing, but predicts that it will require decades of research. Dr. Muniz said he also supports the idea of temporary above-ground waste-storage sites because it helps cool the heat-generating elements in the waste -- reducing a major complication for underground storage facilities.

Some of the changes the administration is proposing, particularly those that affect Yucca Mountain, will require action by Congress. A wild card in that debate is Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who has led his state's battle to stop the project, which is 90 miles from Las Vegas. He has regarded reprocessing as an alternative to long-term storage, but may have some interest in supporting a process that reduces the amount of spent fuel stored at Yucca Mountain.

DOJ_NMG_0011952

The original reprocessing technique chopped up spent nuclear-fuel rods and dissolved them in acid, extracting plutonium in an almost pure form. It was derived in the 1950s from the U.S. nuclear-weapons program, which uses plutonium as the primary metal to make atomic warheads explode. Japan, Russia and France use variants of this process, called PUREX, for power-plant fuel recycling, but the U.S. stopped research on its use during the Carter administration.

President Carter, a former nuclear engineer, and other officials were persuaded that separating pure plutonium and encouraging recycling around the world might encourage developing nations to use the plutonium to make bombs. The UREX+ process is designed to reduce this problem by extracting plutonium along with other heavy and highly radioactive elements that make it too hot to handle without advanced robotics to remove and deal with the material.

Write to John J. Fialka at john.fialka@wsj.com1

Nuclear Energy Plan Would Use Spent Fuel (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration is preparing a plan to expand civilian nuclear energy at home and abroad while taking spent fuel from foreign countries and reprocessing it, in a break with decades of U.S. policy, according to U.S. and foreign officials briefed on the initiative.

The United States has adamantly opposed reprocessing spent fuel from civilian reactors since the 1970s because it would produce material that could be used in nuclear weapons. But the Bush program, envisioned as a multi-decade effort dubbed the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, would invest research money to develop technologies intended to avoid any such risk, the officials said.

The program has been the subject of intense debate within the administration, and although a consensus has been reached about the direction, a senior official said it will not be ready for Bush to announce in his State of the Union address Tuesday. Even the discussion has stirred concerns among nuclear specialists and some members of Congress who consider it an expensive venture that relies on unproven concepts and could increase the danger of proliferation.

The notion of accepting other countries' spent fuel at a time when the United States has had trouble disposing of its own nuclear waste could also prove highly controversial.

But a small initial investment of money has been programmed into the administration's federal budget plan to be sent to Capitol Hill in two weeks. Senate Energy Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said yesterday that he expects the White House to send accompanying legislation in February.

"I expect a draft bill from the administration next month on spent nuclear fuel," he said. "I will introduce that bill on behalf of the president, hold a hearing on it and mark it up in committee this spring. I hope it will include a nuclear fuel recycling component. If it doesn't, well, I have been a career-long proponent of nuclear fuel recycling and I intend to pursue it aggressively."

Advocates use the word "recycling" to describe an advanced form of reprocessing that, instead of separating plutonium that can be used in bombs from spent fuel, would produce a mixed-oxide fuel too radioactive for terrorists to handle. Such fuel, called MOX, could be used in special reactors that exist in France but not in the United States.

Edwin Lyman, a senior scientist with the Union of Concerned Scientists, a nonprofit think tank that studies environmental and security issues, said U.N. nuclear inspectors would not make a distinction between that material or the kind of separated plutonium the world is worried Iran might get.

"We think they are putting a fig leaf on it by calling it proliferation-resistant and saying that it's not really reprocessing, so concerns about proliferation risks won't be valid," he said. "But if we develop something that we call proliferation-resistant and it really isn't, then other countries are going to claim rights to this technology. If it's really proliferation-resistant, would we let Iran have it?"

The fuel proposal is part of a broader push by the president for domestic and global nuclear energy. With worldwide energy demands on the rise and U.S. reliance on foreign oil increasing, Bush has held out nuclear power as a solution that will not affect global warming. "We ought to have more nuclear power in the United States of America," Bush said in a speech last week in Loudoun County. "It's clean, it's renewable, it's safer than it ever was in the past."

DOJ_NMG_0011953

In a modern version of the Atoms for Peace program during President Dwight D. Eisenhower's administration, officials said the administration envisions helping developing countries build small nuclear reactors that would produce about 5 to 10 percent of the energy generated by a typical reactor now on line in the United States. Some in Congress believe a global nuclear energy program is aimed at aiding the U.S. effort to build an alliance with India, which is eager for U.S. civilian nuclear technology.

Two senior U.S. officials traveled last week to several countries, including Japan and Russia, to brief them about the initiative. At one session, according to a source who was present, the administration officials said the United States has finally moved on from the Three Mile Island nuclear incident in 1979 that paralyzed the industry for years.

Bush has been briefed on the plan but has not given his final approval while diplomats consult with other nations, a senior administration official said. Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman hinted at the initiative in a November speech at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"The world will need much more energy in coming decades," he said, citing projections showing global demand increasing as much as 50 percent by 2025. "How do we meet this demand? How do we do it in a way that leaves all the nations of the earth safer and more secure? The search for answers to these questions increasingly points in one direction: nuclear energy."

Rather than just provide nuclear fuel to other countries that want to have their own reactors, Bodman suggested, the United States would also take back the fuel once it has been spent. "In the longer term, we see fuel-cycle states offering cradle-to-grave fuel-cycle services, leasing fuel for power reactors and then taking it back for reprocessing and ultimate disposition."

The main purpose for reprocessing spent fuel is to extract the radioactive plutonium within it and use that to fuel a reactor. But the process is considered dangerous, and many countries gave up civilian reprocessing years ago.

Officials briefed on the Bush plan said $250 million -- less than requested by the Energy Department -- will be included in the fiscal 2007 budget in a down payment on what they expect to be billions of dollars of spending. Among other things, it would pay for a pilot plant, possibly at the department's Savannah River facility in South Carolina, to test chemical reprocessing. If the program goes forward as planned, the domestic nuclear industry stands to reap hundreds of millions of dollars.

U.S. officials said they are interested in developing reactors that would not produce spent fuel that could be accessed by recipient countries. One model is a self-contained reactor that cannot be opened, is never refueled and is removed when it runs out of energy. Another, known as a pebble-bed reactor, has been under development in Germany and South Africa and likewise would not have fuel that could be used for weapons.

Al Gore, Sundance's Leading Man (WP)

By William Booth

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

PARK CITY, Utah -- Has ever a little indie film faced a greater hurdle? Imagine this sales pitch: Babe, it's a movie about global warming. Starring Al Gore. Doing a slide show.

With charts.

About "soil evaporation."

Improbable? Perhaps. So it's all the more amazing that "An Inconvenient Truth" had its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival on Tuesday night before an enthusiastic audience that gave the former vice president and his movie a big standing O.

Among the film's lessons: Earth's glaciers are melting, the polar bears are screwed, each year sets new heat records. Al Gore sometimes flies coach. He also schleps his own bags.

The morning after his debut as leading man, Gore pronounces this whole Sundance thing "a most excellent time." He is wearing earth tones again. He seems jolly. He brought Tipper and the kids. He is attending parties and posing for pictures with his fans and enjoying macaroni and cheese at the Discovery Channel soiree. He's palling around with Larry David of "Curb Your Enthusiasm," who says, "Al is a funny guy." But he is also a very serious guy who believes humans may have only 10 years left to save the planet from turning into a total frying pan.

DOJ_NMG_0011954

The core of the film is a one-man, ever-evolving multimedia slide show that Gore assembled himself. A little-known fact: Since his defeat by George W. Bush in 2000, Gore has traveled the globe with his bar graphs, staging event after event for small, invited audiences. Free of charge. And he's presented one version or another of this slide show, by his own estimation, a thousand times.

The official Sundance Film Festival guide calls the documentary a "gripping story" with "a visually mesmerizing presentation" that is "activist cinema at its very best."

In the film, Gore presents the latest evidence to demonstrate how the accumulation of carbon dioxide and other pollutants of the industrial age are increasing temperatures. In addition to timelines and bell curves and stuff about oxygen isotopes in Greenland ice cores, Gore includes several cartoons, one featuring a Mister Sunbeam trapped by the bullies known as Greenhouse Gases.

Gore argues -- with scientific evidence projected on big screens at his back -- that global warming may soon lead to catastrophic sea level rises, which could inundate cities such as New York (flooding the former site of the World Trade Center), producing scary nonlinear runaway spasms of extreme weather (bigger, badder hurricanes and typhoons), global pandemics and, depending on where you live, torrential rains or decade-long drought. It is not a pretty picture.

But the film's director, Davis Guggenheim (husband of actress Elisabeth Shue), captures another side of Gore, showing the former veep hitting the road, part Cassandra, part Willy Loman, working out of dreary hotel rooms, pecking away on his Apple laptop, crisscrossing the continents to tell his story over and over.

"I'm interested in choices characters make, especially when they hit against an obstacle," says Guggenheim as Gore sits beside him during an interview yesterday morning. "As I got into Al's story, I see a human being who's made some tough, tough choices in his life. After the 2000 election? To go back deeper and deeper into this issue? To decide that it is the most important thing he can do. . . . I see how tireless he is. That, to me, is so dramatic, so inspiring."

The film touches briefly but with emotion on three events in Gore's life and how they inspired his environmental activism: the car accident that almost took the life of his son; his defeat in Florida to Bush; and perhaps most foreboding, the death of his sister, a lifelong smoker, from lung cancer ("That's not one of the ways you want to die," Gore says in the film in a voice-over) and the fact that his family farmed tobacco and didn't stop until after her death. Gore underscores that this is the way people are, that it is hard to change old habits, be it smoking or growing tobacco or emitting carbon dioxide, but that without change, the bell tolls.

The film came about after Laurie David, wife of Larry David, saw Gore's slide show in New York after the 2004 premiere of the mega-budget global-warming feature film "The Day After Tomorrow" (starring Dennis Quaid and Jake Gyllenhaal). Laurie David gathered a team, including Lawrence Bender (producer of Quentin Tarantino films, including "Pulp Fiction") and Jeffrey Skoll, the billionaire eBay founder and movie mogul. They met with Gore. "We said you have to let us make this into a movie," David says in an interview over breakfast.

It took some convincing. The slide show, she says, "was his baby, and he felt proprietary about it and it was hard for him to let go." Now, David says, the filmmakers are in discussion with three or four distributors, hoping for a sale.

"This isn't about box office," David says. "None of us are going to make a dime." What is at stake, she says, "is, you know, the planet."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Metro Briefing (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

NEW YORK

F.B.I. DIRECTOR RECUSED FROM INVESTIGATION OF WELD'S FORMER SCHOOL The F.B.I. director will not play a role in the inquiry into Decker College, the Kentucky school once run by William F. Weld, because the director and Mr. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, are friends and former colleagues, an F.B.I. spokesman said yesterday. The New York Post reported the decision by Robert Mueller, the director, yesterday. The New York Democratic Party had asked that Mr. Mueller recuse himself, according to a party spokesman. Mr. Weld has not been accused of any wrongdoing involving Decker, which declared bankruptcy last fall amid allegations of fraud. PATRICK D. HEALY (NYT)

BROOKLYN: DOMESTIC VIOLENCE COURT PRAISED A special Brooklyn court that handles aspects of domestic violence cases including criminal, family and matrimonial matters has heard about 500 cases involving 115 families since it opened on Oct. 31, court officials announced at a news conference yesterday. The court, the integrated domestic violence court, is the fourth of its kind in the city. Charles J. Hynes, the Brooklyn district attorney, said the new court would treat victims of domestic violence with greater sensitivity. MICHAEL BRICK (NYT)

MANHATTAN: ACCOUNTANT SOUGHT IN INQUIRY IS IN ISRAEL David E. Cohen, an accountant who boasted that he could make tax problems disappear "like magic," is in Israel, the Manhattan district attorney's office said yesterday. Prosecutors said they were exploring the possibility of extraditing him to New York, where he and a partner, Jeffrey C. Rosner, face charges of grand larceny and tax fraud. Mr. Rosner surrendered on Tuesday. ANEMONA HARTOCOLLIS (NYT)

BINGHAMTON: ANTIWAR PROTESTERS SENTENCED An antiwar campaigner who poured blood around a military recruitment center three years ago was sentenced to prison yesterday for trespassing and destroying government property. Clare Grady, 47, of Ithaca, received a sentence of six months in federal prison. Ms. Grady is the third defendant to be sentenced for the protest, which took place before the invasion of Iraq in 2003. Two others were sentenced earlier this week. MICHELLE YORK (NYT)

GARDEN CITY: COUNTY LEGISLATORS BATTLE OVER LEADERSHIP The Nassau County Legislature met in a belated and tumultuous session yesterday to pick a presiding officer. The Republican minority leader, Peter J. Schmitt, claimed victory with nine votes, while the Democrats split with eight for Kevan M. Abrahams and two for Roger H. Corbin. Claiming that the law requires 10 votes to win, the main Democrats obtained a temporary court order barring Mr. Schmitt from doing any hiring or firing. BRUCE LAMBERT (NYT)

MANHATTAN: VETERAN CHIEF TO HEAD COMMUNITY UNIT Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly has asked a veteran chief to head a Community Affairs Bureau focusing on counterterrorism as well as crime fighting. On Feb. 1, the chief, Douglas Zeigler, will take command of the bureau as it absorbs the School Safety Division to oversee more than 4,500 police officers and safety agents who work in schools. It is the first time that a uniformed member of the department, rather than a civilian, will head the bureau. Chief Zeigler is now head of the Organized Crime Control Bureau. AL BAKER (NYT)

WHITE PLAINS: PARENTS PLEAD GUILTY IN TODDLERS' DEATHS The parents of two toddlers who were burned to death in scalding water while trapped in the bathroom of their Yonkers apartment last July pleaded guilty to manslaughter and homicide charges on Wednesday. The parents, David Maldonado and Luz Arroyo, had maintained their innocence ever since the boys died, but on Wednesday they reversed themselves and pleaded guilty after prosecutors agreed to drop drug-possession charges against them. The plea deal was made only days before the parents were set to go on trial in County Court here. Mr. Maldonado, who pleaded guilty to second-degree manslaughter, faces 5 to 15 years in prison. Ms. Arroyo, who pleaded guilty to criminally negligent homicide, faces 1 to 4 years. ANAHAD O'CONNOR (NYT)

NEW JERSEY

TRENTON: STATE GIVEN MORE TIME TO REFORM CHILD WELFARE Lawyers in a class-action suit against New Jersey's child welfare agency agreed yesterday to delay action on a request that the system be placed under federal control. The child welfare advocacy group, Children's Rights Inc., said the decision by its lawyers reflected the group's confidence in Gov. Jon S. Corzine and Kevin M. Ryan, the human services commissioner. Although the agreement still leaves open the possibility of a federal takeover of New Jersey's child welfare system, Mr. Ryan vowed that he would not allow that to occur. RICHARD LEZIN JONES (NYT)

NEWARK: UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT'S DEPARTURE IS DELAYED Trustees at New Jersey's troubled state medical school yesterday said they would wait an additional week before voting on the $600,000 severance package being offered to the school's outgoing president, Dr. John J. Petillo. Dr. Petillo resigned last week, after a year in which the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey was rattled by financial scandals and was forced to accept a federal monitor. Board members were set to vote on

DOJ_NMG_0011956

Dr. Petillo's resignation at their meeting, but the federal monitor requested more time to review the severance package. DAVID KOCIENIEWSKI (NYT)

Compiled by John Sullivan

(NYPOST)

By FREDRIC U. DICKER

The New York Post, January 25, 2006

FBI Director Robert Mueller will recuse himself from the potentially explosive ongoing probe of Decker College, which was once headed by his longtime friend and colleague, New York GOP gubernatorial hopeful William Weld, The Post learned yesterday.

Mueller's decision to step aside came after The Post told the FBI that New York Democrats would be joining former Republican Sen. Alfonse D'Amato's call for Mueller to do that.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko told The Post that while the Decker probe was being handled by the special agent in charge of the Louisville, Ky., field office, Mueller himself is "regularly briefed on significant investigations and cases."

And while Kolko insisted Mueller "has not had a role in directing any part of this investigation," he said, "since the issue has been raised publicly, and to avoid even the appearance of any conflict, any decisions that would otherwise be made by the director in this matter will, instead, be handled by Deputy Director John Pistole."

Kolko's announcement came a few hours after state Democratic Chairman Herman "Denny" Farrell joined D'Amato in urging Mueller to step aside.

The Post disclosed yesterday that D'Amato, who has bitterly attacked former Massachusetts Gov. Weld for his supposed role as a U.S. Justice Department official in prosecuting his brother, Armand, in the early 1990s. Alfonse D'Amato had urged Mueller to recuse himself because of his strong ties to Weld.

Farrell said Weld and Mueller were "good friends" during the 1980s when both served in the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston.

He said Mueller had also contributed to Weld's unsuccessful U.S. Senate campaign against incumbent John Kerry of Massachusetts in 1996.

Decker College in Kentucky, which emphasized job-training skills, was shut down in September amid an FBI probe into allegations of widespread financial improprieties.

Weld, whose investment company owned part of the for-profit college, served as the school's chief executive officer for several months last year and has denied any wrongdoing.

Lawyer Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

(AP) - MINNEAPOLIS-A lawyer has been indicted on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets.

Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday.

Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August.

The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was "both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes."

Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud; unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Adkins, from St. Paul, refused to comment and referred calls to his own attorney, Earl Gray. Gray said Wednesday that the allegations "are simply not true."

Smith's bail was revoked for violating the terms of his release and he remains in custody.

No. 2 In Drug Ring Pleads Guilty (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 26, 2006

"Superman" made him nervous.

But admitting crimes that could lock him away for life made Stephen "Black" Ardis downright scared Wednesday.

Ardis, who was captured on secret recordings expressing worries that an undercover agent he dubbed "Superman" was on his trail, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to being second-in-command of a Detroit-to-Knoxville drug running operation.

But the 26-year-old drug slinger made it clear before entering his plea that a possible life sentence was a scary proposition he wanted to avoid.

"This person has a very high number of months to serve," defense attorney James W. Bell told federal Judge Thomas Phillips. "I can never be sure what (a client's) criminal history is. I've explained to (Ardis) his criminal history could push this so his sentence could be life."

It's not an entirely reasonable fear, though.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said the massive amount of drugs Ardis conspired to put onto Knoxville's streets guarantees the Detroit man a 20-year prison term.

Then, there are the half dozen or so guns the group used to protect the slew of stash and crack houses the organization set up in Knoxville, Winck said. That weaponry, Winck said, will boost Ardis even farther up the sentencing scale.

If Ardis has a criminal record already, he would climb even higher up the sentencing ladder. Still, his likely punishment would hover around the 30-year mark, not a life term.

Phillips, however, wanted to make sure Ardis knew the ramifications of his guilty plea.

"It could turn out to be very different than what it looks like now," Phillips told Ardis of his possible punishment. "Do you understand that, Mr. Ardis?"

Ardis hesitated and then replied, "Yeah."

His boss in the drug conspiracy that involved cocaine, crack, marijuana and Ecstasy is facing a life term. Conspiracy leader Robert "Party" Smith, 31, of Detroit, pleaded guilty last week. His potential penalty range is so high it outpaces the highest rung on the federal sentencing ladder.

The drug ring was broken in November after a probe led by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey.

It was Conkey whom Ardis dubbed "Superman" in a conversation secretly recorded by the agents during their investigation. In that conversation, Ardis told Smith that he had just learned that Conkey, a well-known undercover officer, had been following him.

A few weeks later, the pair, along with three others, were arrested, several houses raided, and drugs and guns seized.

Phillips set an April 17 sentencing hearing for Ardis.

Prosecutor Postpones Charges In Bomb Case (TRICH)

By John Trumbo, Herald staff writer

Tri-City Herald, January 25, 2006

Benton County prosecutors will need several weeks to decide potential charges against a Richland man who says he kept bomb-making material because he is a miner.

Kevin D. Johnson, 49, was released from jail Friday, three days after Richland police arrested him at his home where they seized gunpowder, nitro-methane and about 20 pounds of ammonium nitrate. They also found six firearms.

Prosecutor Andy Miller said Tuesday that no charges were filed during the 72-hour hold on Johnson because more investigation is needed. Items taken from the home also have to be analyzed by agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, he said.

"To prove the elements of the case, we'd have to get the ATF to test the items," Miller said.

Johnson told the Herald in an interview at the jail last week that he has mining claims in Oregon and college degrees in civil engineering and geophysics.

"We want to follow up on some of the items mentioned in the (Tri-City Herald) news story," Miller said.

Johnson said he doesn't have a grudge against the police who arrested him.

"I think the police were doing their jobs," he said, noting that Richland officers made an arrest in an unrelated explosives case days before he was arrested.

"The police were here to check me out and it would've been irresponsible if they didn't," he said.

Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb said an ATF agent told him Tuesday analysis of the items found at Johnson's home would be completed in two to four weeks.

Cobb said the investigation also involves 91 blasting caps that allegedly belonged to Johnson that were found Jan. 15 at a home in Franklin County. Cobb said officers discovered the caps in a closet of a man's home after they investigated a domestic violence complaint.

Richland's bomb squad was invited by Franklin County authorities to pick up the material, Cobb said.

"The person who had them said he was keeping them for a guy who lives in Richland," Cobb said.

A search warrant for the Franklin County address on Quail Road said officers found 38, one-third pound sticks of an ammonium nitrate explosive. A box labeled "blasting caps," a gallon of racing nitro-methane, six jars of nitric acid and pre-made electrical charges also were found, according to court documents.

The owner of the property said the items "were used in mining and that a friend (Kevin Johnson) had given them to him to hold (for safekeeping)," the document said.

That led Richland police to Johnson's home at 914 Smith Avenue, where a search was done Jan 15. Johnson was booked into Benton County jail three days later on an investigative hold.

Johnson said if no charges are filed he hopes to have his guns returned because some of them are family heirlooms.

"The guys from the ATF were here and they didn't seem to be overly concerned," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Pinochet's Daughter May Seek US Asylum (REU)

Reuters, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON/SANTIAGO (Reuters) - The eldest daughter of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Wednesday asked the United States to grant her political asylum after she fled tax charges in Chile, Chilean officials said.

Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, 60, was being moved to an immigration detention center late on Wednesday after spending most of the day at Dulles International Airport near Washington, Chile's Foreign Relations Minister Ignacio Walker told local radio in Santiago.

Earlier, Interior Minister Francisco Vidal said Chile had been told that Pinochet Hiriart had asked for asylum.

"In the coming two or three days we will have a decision from the United States which, I insist, will be a rejection (of asylum)," Walker said.

U.S. officials would not confirm that Pinochet Hiriart had requested asylum.

"Lucia Pinochet is currently in U.S. Customs and Border Protection custody at Dulles International Airport, pending resolution of her immigration status," said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security.

"The Department of Homeland Security is unable to comment on whether or not an individual is seeking asylum."

Pinochet Hiriart has been charged with tax fraud related to some $1 million in undeclared taxes and falsification of documents as part of a widening tax evasion and fraud investigation involving the Pinochet family.

She was served with a subpoena in Chile over the weekend to attend court on Monday, but never appeared.

Pinochet Hiriart was pulled over for special screening after arriving at Virginia's Dulles airport.

"She did arrive this morning at about 7 a.m. at Dulles on a flight from Argentina and she's currently being interviewed," Customs and Border Protection agency spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino said.

Chilean officials said Pinochet Hiriart was considered a fugitive from justice and President Ricardo Lagos said she would be asked to return to her country voluntarily.

"As I understand it, contact has been made and we are trying to see if she could return voluntarily to the country," Lagos told reporters.

EXTRADITION UNCERTAIN

A U.S. Justice Department official said the United States has a limited extradition treaty with Chile, but it did not cover all crimes and may not cover the criminal charges against Pinochet Hiriart.

Media reports in Chile said Pinochet Hiriart fled to neighboring Argentina by car on Sunday, a day before her mother and four siblings were arrested on charges of tax evasion and fraud linked to her father's multimillion-dollar bank accounts.

Pinochet Hiriart's son Rodrigo Garcia Pinochet told a radio in Santiago that his mother had decided to visit the United States and return in March to "clear up this situation."

"She never imagined being in this turmoil, in this situation," he said.

Augusto Pinochet, 90, ruled Chile for 17 years after he took power in a 1973 military coup that toppled Salvador Allende. He has been accused of responsibility in the deaths of as many as 3,000 Chileans during his regime between 1973 and 1990, and in tens of thousands of torture cases.

He was charged last year with evading taxes on an estimated $27 million hidden in foreign accounts. Prosecutors say Pinochet and his family stashed millions of dollars in more than 100 bank accounts outside of Chile.

Observers say he may end up facing prosecution for tax crimes before any of the human rights charges against him, which are stalled in the courts because of his health.

On Tuesday, a Santiago court of appeals approved bail for wife Lucia Hiriart, his youngest son Marco Antonio, and his daughters Jacqueline and Veronica.

Pinochet's eldest son Augusto was released on Monday, hours after being arrested on charges of falsification of documents related to a fraud and tax evasion investigation involving more than 100 secret foreign bank accounts.

The bank accounts have damaged Pinochet's reputation domestically. The left has long accused him of being ultimately responsible for thousands of deaths and the torture of tens of thousands of leftists that occurred during his regime.

But many Chileans had supported him partly because he was seen as a clean leader in financial matters compared with many other Latin American presidents and dictators.

(Additional reporting by Antonio de la Jara in Santiago, Louise Egan in Buenos Aires and David Wiessler in Washington)

TAX:

Hatch Guilty Of Failing To Pay Taxes On 'Survivor' Winnings (AP)

By Ray Henry, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2006

(AP) - PROVIDENCE, Rhode Island-Richard Hatch, who won $1 million (â,¬810,000) in the debut season of the reality show "Survivor," was found guilty Wednesday of failing to pay taxes on his winnings and taken straight to jail.

Hatch remained calm as the court clerk read the verdict. He waved goodbye to family members, then was handcuffed and taken into custody after U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres said he was a potential flight risk.

The charges carry up to 13 years in prison. Torres said he expected a sentence of between 33 months and 41 months, but said the time could be longer because prosecutors say Hatch committed perjury. Sentencing was scheduled for April 28.

Hatch, 44, was also convicted of evading taxes on $327,000 (â,¬265,983) he earned as co-host of a Boston radio show and $28,000 (â,¬22,775) in rent on property he owned. He was acquitted of seven bank, mail and wire fraud charges related to a charity, Horizon Bound, he planned to open for troubled youth.

Hatch's lawyer, John MacDonald, said he would appeal the verdict. He said Hatch was aware of the possibility of jail time.

"Rich has been going through this now for three years and he's prepared himself mentally and emotionally for this date," MacDonald said.

Torres said Hatch never accounted for a significant part of his money, including the "Survivor" prize, which he said could be used to flee.

Near the end of the trial, an explanation for Hatch's failure to pay taxes was raised by his lawyer - but never mentioned in the jury's presence. Hatch's lawyer, Michael Minns, said Hatch caught fellow contestants cheating and struck a deal with the show's producers to pay his taxes if he won. But Hatch was never asked about the allegation when he testified.

Instead, Minns told jurors Hatch was the "world's worst bookkeeper" and said his client never meant to do anything wrong. Hatch testified that he thought producers were supposed to pay his "Survivor" taxes, and said the donations he took from his charity were far less than the money he had already poured into it.

One juror, Robert Paquette, said in a telephone interview that the jury believed Hatch had legitimate questions about who was responsible for paying his "Survivor" taxes. But he said Hatch crossed the line when he didn't report income from his rental property and radio show.

"Even if you take the `Survivor' money out of there, there was still a lot of evidence," Paquette said.

More than five years after winning, Hatch remains reality TV's most famous villain, the man viewers loved to hate. He first captured their attention for shedding his clothes on "Survivor," prompting David Letterman to nickname him "the fat naked guy," and became known for manipulating competitors to his advantage.

Government Says Struckman Nabbed (PSBIZ)

Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal, January 26, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday that former Renton resident David Struckman has been captured in Panama. Struckman had been charged by the Internal Revenue Service for running an operation that promoted tax-avoidance plans.

Struckman was indicted in 2004 and charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States. He then "disappeared," according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. He was arrested in Panama earlier this month and deported, the department said, and will be transported to Western Washington.

The government alleges that Struckman and four others sold "Global Prosperity" wealth-building products, including videotapes, CDs and seminars, which "included fraudulent methods of income tax elimination."

The seminars cost as much as $37,000 to attend and, according to the government, the group then concealed income earned from the products by using bogus trusts and offshore bank accounts.

Struckman's four co-defendants pleaded guilty and face sentencing on April 10 in Seattle. Last year, Struckman was also charged by the government with tax evasion for 1999 through 2001. If convicted, he faces up to 20 years in jail and $1 million in fines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Moves Toward Senate Confirmation (SACBEE)

By jesse holland

The Sacramento Bee, January 26, 2006

Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito is moving toward all-but-certain confirmation as the nation's 110th justice, with unhappy Democrats keeping up a drumbeat of criticism of the conservative judge while advising their leaders against attempting a filibuster.

"Because we have such a full plate of pressing issues before Congress, a filibuster at this time would be, in my view, very counterproductive," said Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who wants the Senate to concentrate on Hurricane Katrina rebuilding programs. "We simply cannot afford to bring the Senate to a halt at a time when we need its action the most."

Without a filibuster, Alito will be confirmed as the replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who throughout her years on the high court often has been a key fifth vote on contentious social issues including abortion, affirmative action and the death penalty. Alito already has majority support in the Senate, with 51 Republicans and Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska already publicly supporting his confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0011961

The confirmation debate on the Senate floor was continuing Thursday, but Republicans and the White House are so confident that Alito will be approved by the Senate that they've already started congratulating him and sending up new lower-court nominations for senators to consider.

A few hours after senators started debating his nomination Wednesday, Alito met with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter in a U.S. Capitol room that directly faces the neighboring Supreme Court.

The conservative judge shook their hands and joked with the Republican leaders and thanked them for their efforts. Alito, who had met privately with more than 80 senators since President Bush nominated him in October, also thanked "all of the senators who supported me and were kind enough to meet with me."

The 100-member Senate is expected to confirm the 55-year-old judge from the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia before Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday.

"I call on the United States Senate to put partisanship aside and give Judge Alito the up-or-down vote he deserves and confirm him as the next associate justice of the Supreme Court," the president said at the White House.

Even though Democrats like Landrieu and Ken Salazar of Colorado won't support a filibuster, that doesn't mean that liberals aren't working to get the largest vote against Alito possible.

Nelson is the only Democrat to express support for Alito, and all eight Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee voted against his nomination on Tuesday. Twenty-three Democrats have already said they will vote against Alito, which is one more than opposed conservative Chief Justice John Roberts last year.

If the pattern continues, Alito may be on his way to the most partisan Senate victory for a Supreme Court nominee in years. The closest vote in modern history is Justice Clarence Thomas' 52-48 victory in 1991, when 11 Democrats broke with their party and voted for President George H.W. Bush's nominee.

Democrats argue that replacing O'Connor with Alito would put people's rights and liberties in danger.

Alito "will tip the balance of the scales of justice," said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat. "He will tip the balance against protecting our basic privacy and personal freedoms. He will tip the balance in favor of presidential power even when it violates the law."

Senate Debates Bush Court Pick, Approval Expected (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, January 26, 2006

U.S. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito appeared to have the votes for confirmation on Wednesday as the Senate began a bitter debate about the conservative judge who could push the high court to the right.

Democrats said Alito valued presidential power over civil liberties, and Republicans denounced what they described as a smear campaign against President George W. Bush's 55-year-old nominee.

At least 51 of the Senate's 55 Republicans, along with at least one Democrat, plan to vote for Alito, according to an unofficial tally based on statements and interviews with lawmakers and aides in the 100-member chamber.

"Judge Alito deserves to become Justice Alito," said Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "Those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man."

Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) of Massachusetts ripped into Alito by complaining about what he described as bid for expanded power by Bush. He cited in particular the administration's program of domestic eavesdropping without warrants.

"The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the president is out of bounds," Kennedy said. "He (Alito) is a long-standing advocate for expanding executive power, even at the expense of core individual liberties."

DOJ_NMG_0011962

If confirmed, Alito would replace moderate conservative Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and could help move the nine-member high court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other hot-button issues.

The Senate began its debate a day after its Judiciary Committee split 10-8 along party lines to approve Bush's second justice on the high court, which the president has promised to make more conservative.

NO FILIBUSTER

Democrats have not threatened a filibuster since they do not appear to have the votes to sustain such a procedural roadblock. But they appear certain to push the Senate into holding at least a few days of debate.

At the White House, Bush called on the Senate to "put partisanship aside and give Judge Alito the up-or-down vote he deserves and to confirm him as the next associate justice of the Supreme Court."

Flanked by 39 of Alito's former law clerks, Bush said, "In its 216-year history, the Senate has held an up-or-down vote on every Supreme Court nominee with a majority of Senate support."

Democrats have made clear they intend to make Alito and the high-court an issue in the November congressional elections.

Republicans have said they would welcome such a debate and argued that Alito, a federal appeals judge for the past 15 years, is far more mainstream than many Democratic supporters.

Traditionally, the Senate has approved successful Supreme Court nominees with broad bipartisan support, but Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), an Alabama Republican, charged that Democrats have sought to mount opposition to Alito to score political points.

The "knife cuts both ways," Sessions said. "If this is affirmed, then it will be more difficult in the future for Democratic presidents to have their nominees confirmed."

Republican backers have hailed Alito as a fair-minded judge who received the American Bar Association's top rating. But Democratic critics say he has staked out extreme positions on such matters as abortion, civil rights and presidential powers.

With Republicans holding 55 of 100 seats in the Senate, Alito appears certain to be approved. As of Wednesday, only four Republicans had not disclosed their intentions.

The Senate vote on Alito is expected to be far closer than the 78-22 one that John Roberts, Bush's first nomination to the high court, received in September in being confirmed as U.S. chief justice.

Half of the Senate's 44 Democrats voted for Roberts but only one of them, Ben Nelson of Nebraska, has announced he will vote for Alito. All but a few other Democrats appear certain to oppose him.

Parties Shore Up Votes On Alito (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Democrats took their opposition of Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Senate floor yesterday as Republicans rounded up the 60 votes they need to block any attempt to filibuster his nomination.

"The Democrats know that they can't defeat this nomination," Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said yesterday. "There won't be a filibuster, in all likelihood. But what they can do, unfortunately, is smear the name and the reputation of this good man who has offered himself to public service."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and one of Judge Alito's harshest critics, called the vote on the nomination "the vote of a generation."

"The American people will have no second chance to decide whether this person should be trusted with such an awesome responsibility," Mr. Kennedy said. "As their representatives, it is our responsibility to ask the tough questions and demand meaningful answers."

Republicans, meanwhile, counted the 60 votes they need to prevent a filibuster. Party leaders expect at least five Democrats to join the chamber's 55 Republicans in opposing a filibuster, although they expect to win fewer than 60 votes on final confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0011963

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat, has announced that he will support Judge Alito's confirmation. Also, Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California, Mark Pryor of Arkansas, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut have said they see no grounds for a filibuster.

Sen. Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat, who campaigned on a pledge not to participate in filibusters of judicial nominees, has declined to rule out supporting an Alito filibuster.

Mr. Salazar is part of the so-called "Gang of 14" senators who last year brokered an end to the judicial filibusters. Of those seven Democrats and seven Republicans, 11 say the Alito nomination is not an "extraordinary circumstance" under which a filibuster would be acceptable.

Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey have speculated that Democrats won't filibuster the nomination. But the Democratic leadership in the Senate repeatedly has refused to say that a filibuster is no longer being considered.

However, not everybody who supports Judge Alito wants to avoid a filibuster.

"If they move forward with such a filibuster, my reaction is: Make my day," Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, said yesterday. "We'll enjoy pulling the constitutional trigger to allow Judge Alito a fair up-or-down vote."

The "constitutional" route would require 51 votes to ban judicial filibusters.

With a filibuster looking unlikely, the only question remaining about Judge Alito's Senate confirmation is when the full vote will occur.

Republicans said yesterday that they are hoping for a vote Monday. Democrats, however, are aiming for a vote as late as Tuesday so President Bush's State of the Union address that day will downplay news of the confirmation.

Robert Novak (CHIST)

By Alito a dilemma for red state Dems

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2006

As the Senate moved this week toward the anticipated vote to confirm Samuel Alito, a resident of far-off North Dakota was likely to watch a heavily aired television ad. A female announcer read this:

"Along with Democrats and Republicans, newspapers across America . . . are endorsing Judge Samuel Alito for the U.S. Supreme Court. Yet, politically motivated liberal extremists like Ted Kennedy continue to attack Alito. Sen. Kent Conrad will soon cast his vote. Call Sen. Conrad and tell him to vote yes on Judge Alito and stand with mainstream America, not Ted Kennedy."

Conrad, a powerful figure in the Senate as ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee, normally experiences no difficulty in making up his mind to express firm opinions. But not on the Alito confirmation. He scheduled an extra meeting with the judge on Friday, and his staff said an internal meeting to decide his vote would be held later that morning. Facing re-election this year in the very red state of North Dakota, Conrad may be wondering what political price he might pay to vote no on Alito.

The Democratic leadership has made a calculated decision to follow Kennedy and liberal pressure groups in opposition to Alito. Sen. Ben Nelson, up for re-election in Nebraska, at this writing is the Senate's only Democrat to endorse Alito. Regarding this opposition as a political decision, conservative strategists are determined to play politics themselves this year against Democrats -- particularly red state senators who oppose Alito.

That has opened the door for conservatives to turn the Alito confirmation into a political asset in the 2006 elections. Two unnamed donors have contributed $100,000 for current TV ads in the Dakotas to influence Democrats Kent Conrad and Tim Johnson. These same contributors, who spent $4.5 million in the 2004 election cycle, have privately committed $5 million against the re-election of red state Democrats who actually vote against Alito.

Conrad and his North Dakota colleague Byron Dorgan, Bill Nelson of Florida, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas are red state Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts. While Roberts is no less conservative than Alito and was markedly less forthcoming in answering Senate Judiciary Committee questions, these Democrats who voted for the chief justice have been under intense pressure from the left to oppose Alito.

DOJ_NMG_0011964

All such senators may be willing to risk a politically unpopular "no" vote, partly thanks to disappointing Senate Republican candidate recruitment this year. With party leaders unable to persuade popular Republican Gov. John Hoeven to run in North Dakota, Conrad does not yet even have an opponent. Florida Republican leaders did not get the candidate they wanted with Rep. Katherine Harris running far behind, enabling Bill Nelson to surprise many colleagues by announcing opposition to Alito. However, conservative money now will pour into both Florida and North Dakota.

Politicizing the confirmation vote also poses problems for prominent Democratic non-incumbent candidates. Pennsylvania State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., the nominally pro-life opponent of Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, is keeping quiet about Alito. In New Jersey, newly appointed Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez does not have Casey's luxury of neutrality on Alito. He is expected to vote no, threatening Italian-American votes against him this year in favor of Republican Thomas Kean (son of the former governor).

Alito strategists were delighted this week when "Friends of John Kerry" dispatched over the whole country an e-mail signed by the 2004 presidential nominee. That facilitates the conservative tactic of linking Conrad with Kennedy and Kerry in the minds of North Dakotans if he votes against Alito.

"We can't trust [Alito] to defend mainstream American values," contended Kerry's letter. The contention that President Bush's nominee is outside the "mainstream" is the major talking point against Alito, but polls show support for him and his endorsement of spousal abortion notification. That debate's outcome may determine whether senators who vote against Alito will suffer at the polls this year and in the years ahead.

Senators In Need Of A Spine (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Judge Samuel Alito Jr., whose entire history suggests that he holds extreme views about the expansive powers of the presidency and the limited role of Congress, will almost certainly be a Supreme Court justice soon. His elevation will come courtesy of a president whose grandiose vision of his own powers threatens to undermine the nation's basic philosophy of government — and a Senate that seems eager to cooperate by rolling over and playing dead.

It is hard to imagine a moment when it would be more appropriate for senators to fight for a principle. Even a losing battle would draw the public's attention to the import of this nomination.

At the Judiciary Committee hearings, the judge followed the well-worn path to confirmation, which has the nominee offer up only the most boring statements and unarguable truisms: the president is not above the law; diversity in college student bodies is a good thing. But in what he has said in the past, and what he refused to say in the hearings, Judge Alito raised warning flags that, in the current political context, cannot simply be shrugged away with a promise to fight again another day.

The Alito nomination has been discussed largely in the context of his opposition to abortion rights, and if the hearings provided any serious insight at all into the nominee's intentions, it was that he has never changed his early convictions on that point. The judge — who long maintained that Roe v. Wade should be overturned — ignored all the efforts by the Judiciary Committee's chairman, Arlen Specter, to get him to provide some cover for pro-choice senators who wanted to support the nomination. As it stands, it is indefensible for Mr. Specter or any other senator who has promised constituents to protect a woman's right to an abortion to turn around and hand Judge Alito a potent vote to undermine or even end it.

But portraying the Alito nomination as just another volley in the culture wars vastly underestimates its significance. The judge's record strongly suggests that he is an eager lieutenant in the ranks of the conservative theorists who ignore our system of checks and balances, elevating the presidency over everything else. He has expressed little enthusiasm for restrictions on presidential power and has espoused the peculiar argument that a president's intent in signing a bill is just as important as the intent of Congress in writing it. This would be worrisome at any time, but it takes on far more significance now, when the Bush administration seems determined to use the cover of the "war on terror" and presidential privilege to ignore every restraint, from the Constitution to Congressional demands for information.

There was nothing that Judge Alito said in his hearings that gave any comfort to those of us who wonder whether the new Roberts court will follow precedent and continue to affirm, for instance, that a man the president labels an "unlawful enemy combatant" has the basic right to challenge the government's ability to hold him in detention forever without explanation. His much-quoted statement that the president is not above the law is meaningless unless he also believes that the law requires the chief executive to defer to Congress and the courts.

DOJ_NMG_0011965

Judge Alito's refusal to even pretend to sound like a moderate was telling because it would have cost him so little. Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., who was far more skillful at appearing mainstream at the hearings, has already given indications that whatever he said about the limits of executive power when he was questioned by the Senate has little practical impact on how he will rule now that he has a lifetime appointment.

Senate Democrats, who presented a united front against the nomination of Judge Alito in the Judiciary Committee, seem unwilling to risk the public criticism that might come with a filibuster — particularly since there is very little chance it would work. Judge Alito's supporters would almost certainly be able to muster the 60 senators necessary to put the nomination to a final vote.

A filibuster is a radical tool. It's easy to see why Democrats are frightened of it. But from our perspective, there are some things far more frightening. One of them is Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court.

The Roberts-Alito Court (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

With at least 52 Senators already on record in support, it's clear that -- short of some smear ex machina -- liberal Democrats can't stop Samuel Alito from being confirmed to a seat on the Supreme Court. So it's a good moment to consider what this says about our politics and what it means for the Court as it enters a new era.

One conclusion is that the confirmation of both Chief Justice John Roberts and Judge Alito marks the most important domestic success for President Bush since his 2003 tax cuts. These look like legacy picks. Despite the Harriet Miers misstep, Mr. Bush has now fulfilled one of his campaign promises. And with two distinguished conservative jurists joining Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the Court is closer than it's been in 50 years to having a majority that can restore Constitutional interpretation to its founding principles.

In this sense, the Alito-Roberts ascendancy also marks a victory for the generation of legal conservatives who earned their stripes in the Reagan Administration. The two new Justices are both stars of that generation -- many others are scattered throughout the lower courts -- and they are now poised to influence the law and culture for 20 years or more. All those Federalist Society seminars may have finally paid off. Call it Ed Meese's revenge.

The Roberts-Alito Court also represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its "borking" strategy. They have long thought of the Courts as their personal legislature, and they have shown they will do and say anything to keep control of it. But this time they lost, and on their own ideological terms.

Senator Chuck Schumer declared in 2001 that he wanted to turn judicial confirmations into battles over "ideology." The New York Democrat succeeded in doing so, but he ended up losing in a self-knockout. One reason Democrats couldn't defeat Chief Justice Roberts or Judge Alito, despite near party-line opposition, is that their filibuster strategy had made judges a top-line election issue in both 2002 and 2004.

The battle over their unprecedented filibuster of 10 appeals-court nominees helped to sweep Democrats out of the Senate in Bush-leaning states and give Republicans a larger majority. The Democrats who remain in red states -- five of whom are up for re-election in November -- saw all this and had no appetite for a repeat in 2006. The liberal interest groups that devised the filibuster strategy and wrote the anti-Alito talking points for Senators Ted Kennedy and Patrick Leahy thus contributed as much as anyone to Judge Alito's confirmation. Congratulations, Ralph Neas. It's your finest hour.

While it's impossible to know how any new Justice will vote on specific issues, every indication is that the new duo will fit somewhere along the Court's conservative-libertarian wing. With Judge Alito replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who in her later years had moved markedly left on the culture, we can anticipate more skepticism toward both racial preferences and campaign-finance restrictions on free speech.

We can also expect more respect for the Free Exercise of religion clause in the First Amendment, as opposed to the rigid invocation of the Establishment Clause's "wall" of separation between church and state. We'd also hope for greater respect for property rights, including a revisiting of last year's egregious Kelo decision, as well as a revival of the Lopez line of Commerce

DOJ_NMG_0011966

Clause cases showing more respect for federalism. Roe v. Wade may survive, or not, but we'd expect that individual states would receive more leeway to enact restrictions on abortion as per the wishes of their citizens.

This does not mean this will be a "conservative" Court, however. Four reliable liberals remain, as well as the protean Justice Anthony Kennedy, who has been making his own migration to the cultural left and the make-it-up-as-you-go jurisprudence exemplified by Lawrence (on state laws on homosexuality) and Roper v. Simmons (on the juvenile death penalty). You can bet the press corps and liberal politicians will now apply their carrot-and-stick strategy of praise and castigation to push Justice Kennedy further to the left and retain a five-vote liberal majority. This will be especially true on the polarizing cultural disputes that are better solved democratically.

All of which means that the political battles over the Courts will continue. It is possible Mr. Bush will get another Supreme Court nomination before his term ends. Even if he doesn't, there will be many crucial places on the appellate courts to fill. There are eight appeals-court nominees awaiting action and a total of 15 vacancies, excluding Judge Alito's slot on the Third Circuit.

The White House and Senate should move with confidence and dispatch to fill these openings with judges in the Thomas-Scalia and now Roberts-Alito mold, while they still have the votes to confirm them. One thing we've surely learned from the past six months of Supreme Court debate is that elections matter to the courts as much as they do to the other two branches of government.

A Stop At Senate On The Way To Court (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

On the verge of a second successful Supreme Court appointment, the White House flexed its judicial muscles yesterday, sending Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Capitol for an early victory lap and resubmitting a contentious appellate court nominee blocked by Democrats in past years.

Just hours after Senate debate opened on his nomination to the Supreme Court, Alito posed for photographs and congratulations with Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) and other senior GOP senators. Although a Senate confirmation vote is not expected until Friday at the earliest -- and possibly as late as Tuesday -- the group acted as if the result was not in doubt. Alito, an appellate judge for 15 years, thanked "all of the senators who supported me and were kind enough to meet with me."

Meanwhile, the White House renominated Brett M. Kavanaugh to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. President Bush nominated Kavanaugh, the White House staff secretary, in July 2003, but he fell victim to intense battles between Senate Democrats and Republicans over numerous judicial appointments. A May 2005 bipartisan pact averted a showdown over judicial filibusters and enabled some contested nominees to win confirmation. But it left Kavanaugh in limbo.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's eight Democrats complained last year that Kavanaugh took several months to answer their written questions about his qualifications. Other Democrats have noted that Kavanaugh, 40, has limited courtroom experience and helped independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr pursue the Monica S. Lewinsky case during the Clinton presidency.

Senate debate on Alito opened with Republicans praising him and Democrats calling him a threat to long-established rights such as access to abortion in all 50 states. "He has voted to narrow that circle, to restrict the rights that Americans hold dear," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) said.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) said Alito "has stated he looks at the facts of each case. Yet time and time again his decisions show support for big business, for the executive branch, but not so much for everyday Americans."

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said Alito "is highly qualified to serve on the Supreme Court." Democrats, he said, "are so intent on manufacturing a case against this nominee that they brush aside this seemingly minor detail of his qualifications as if it were just an annoyance."

Frist began the debate by saying that "those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man and imposing an unfair, political standard on all judicial nominees." The senator added: "He has a record that demonstrates a respect for judicial restraint, an aversion to political agendas on the bench, and a commitment to the rule of law and the Constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0011967

At the White House, Bush met with 54 of Alito's former law clerks. The president told reporters that Alito "has earned broad support from his fellow judges on the 3rd Circuit" and said: "There's no doubt about Judge Alito's qualifications, his intellect, or his complete dedication to our Constitution and laws. He is exactly the kind of person Americans want on the Supreme Court."

Bush NJ Federal Court Nominees Include Abramoff Prosecutor (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Wednesday nominated one of the Justice Department's lead prosecutors in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe to a U.S. District Court seat.

Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, was nominated for the federal judgeship in New Jersey, where he served in the U.S. Attorney's office under Michael Chertoff, now secretary of Homeland Security.

The White House was poised to nominate Hillman last summer, after New Jersey's two Democratic senators took the opportunity to weigh in on Hillman and other nominees in exchange for lifting their objections to another candidate Bush had nominated in 2003.

White House press officials did not immediately comment on the timing of the nomination.

Hillman will step down as chief of the public integrity unit next week, but remain in the Justice Department's criminal division until he is confirmed, a department official said. Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Miami, will lead the public corruption-fighting office on a temporary basis, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss personnel matters.

Lourie performed the same role until Hillman took over early in 2003.

During a news conference earlier this month following Abramoff's guilty plea on corruption-related charges, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said Hillman played an important role in providing leadership in the investigation.

Hillman came to Washington in 2001. Before that, he was an assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey from 1992 to 2001, coming in while Chertoff was the U.S. attorney.

Last summer, Democratic Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg signed off on the nominations of Hillman and two others nominated to judgeships in New Jersey on Wednesday. They gave the OK as part of an agreement to lift their objections to Bush's nomination of Peter Sheridan, a lawyer and Republican activist, to the federal bench.

Bush Plays Down Bailout Prospects For GM And Ford (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper And John D. Mckinnon, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. should develop "a product that's relevant" rather than look to Washington for help with their heavy pension obligations, and hinted he would take a dim view of a government bailout of the struggling auto makers.

In an Oval Office interview, Mr. Bush said that his administration has discussed the development of new fuel technologies with the nation's top two auto makers, which might make them more competitive, but that he has had no talks about the companies' finances.

Asked if he had spoken to GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner or Ford Chairman and CEO William Clay Ford Jr., Mr. Bush replied: "Not about their balance sheets." He added: "And I haven't been asked by any automobile manufacturer about a bailout."

Earlier this week, Ford announced sweeping layoffs and plant closings, amid falling sales and increased foreign competition that have sparked concerns one or both of the auto makers may seek bankruptcy protection. Both have denied such plans. But the prospect has fueled speculation that the federal government could face pressure to bail out the companies, as President Carter's administration did in 1979 with $1.5 billion in loan guarantees for Chrysler Corp.

Mr. Bush said little to suggest the companies should find comfort in that precedent. "I have been very reluctant -- I'm mindful of the past where at one point in time, a predecessor of mine was faced with that same dilemma," he said. "I would hope I wouldn't be asked to make that decision."

DOJ_NMG_0011968

Asked if the government should take any pre-emptive action, he said: "I think it's very important for the market to function." He suggested he felt optimistic about the companies' prospects.

1 TRANSCRIPT

Read an edited transcript2 of the interview with President Bush.

The auto industry's struggles could become a big political issue in this year's midterm elections and beyond, especially in Midwestern states such as Michigan and Ohio, where much of the industry's manufacturing base is located. Ford and GM plan to cut at least 60,000 jobs over the next few years, and the fallout could ripple across the auto-supply industry as well, whether or not the companies ever seek bankruptcy protection. While resisting a bailout could cost Republicans support among some voters, it also would serve to shore up their support among those who favor free-market solutions.

While neither GM nor Ford has explicitly sought a Chrysler-style bailout, the two auto makers have dropped hints they would welcome government help in areas such as coping with rising health-care and pension burdens and the high costs of developing fuel-efficient vehicles. And both are key administration priorities in 2006.

Market Forces for Health Care

Speaking less than a week before his annual State of the Union address, Mr. Bush previewed his push to harness market forces to make health care more affordable by giving consumers more direct control of their care. Among other things, Mr. Bush signaled he wants to significantly expand the Health Savings Account program, under which workers who sign up for special high-deductible insurance are allowed to put away money tax-free to bankroll basic expenditures.

On other matters, Mr. Bush:

• said he would not deal with the radical Hamas Islamist party, regardless of how many seats it won in yesterday's Palestinian parliamentary elections until it accepts Israel's right to exist;

• declared that "it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy" in trying to halt Iran's nuclear program, and said he advocates a plan for Russia to enrich nuclear material and deliver it to Iran for a civilian nuclear-energy program;

• said the controversial program to wiretap conversations between people inside and outside the U.S. without warrants was developed by national-security experts and was constructed outside an existing law on covert surveillance because "we require a different response to an enemy" in an era of terrorism.

In discussing the auto companies' woes, Mr. Bush suggested his sympathies lie more with the workers who are displaced or unsettled by a changing corporate environment, saying his administration would focus on ways to retrain laid-off employees. "This is going to be a very troubling time for workers and their families," Mr. Bush said, adding that companies had an obligation to assist employees they cut loose.

On the subject of ballooning pension expenses, which are part of Detroit's problems, Mr. Bush called on GM, Ford and the airline industry to think twice before backing away from their promises to pay in full. "That's not how the market works and that's not corporate responsibility as I see it," he said. "I'm very firm on seeing to it that this government hold people to account."

While neither GM nor Ford has sought to pass on pension obligations, a few airlines have. After filing for bankruptcy protection, UAL Corp.'s United Airlines and US Airways Group Inc. dumped nearly $10 billion in unfunded pension obligations on the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal insurer of private-sector traditional pension plans. Northwest Airlines and Delta Air Lines, which are currently operating in Chapter 11, have said they haven't decided whether they will ask the court to shift their pension plans to the PBGC.

Mr. Bush suggested that one way auto makers can make more appealing products is to promote cars using alternative fuels -- a topic he plans to touch on in his speech next week. He said U.S. auto makers could find new market share in the competition to sell so-called flexible-fuel vehicles, which can use gasoline or blends containing such alternative fuels as ethanol.

"As these automobile manufacturers compete for market share and use technology to try to get consumers to buy their product, they also will be helping America become less dependent on foreign sources of oil," he said.

Mr. Bush's discussion of alternative fuels is likely to boost efforts on Capitol Hill to set targets for reducing U.S. oil consumption, and to start mandating flexible-fuel technology on motor vehicles. He said he has been impressed by the example of Brazil, where alternative auto fuels made from sugar are expected to soon help that country end dependence on imported oil.

DOJ_NMG_0011969

But Mr. Bush's proposal is likely to focus more on government-sponsored research than expansive new tax breaks for purchase of flex-fuel vehicles, for example.

On the health-care front, Mr. Bush will call on Congress to provide more information on providers, including how much they charge, so consumers can be smarter shoppers. "The patient-doctor relationship is a crucial relationship in helping control the costs of medicine," Mr. Bush said. "The more transparent pricing is, and the more opportunities patients have to make decisions in the health-care field, the more likely it is costs will not increase as dramatically as they have in the past."

He said he also will push for legislation making it harder to file malpractice lawsuits, which he said are "running up the cost of medicine." Congress has declined to address this issue in the past.

Acknowledging that he hasn't always managed to get the Republican-controlled Congress to take on his priorities, Mr. Bush called Washington gridlock "the challenge of the '06 year." He said he would make an effort to draw Democrats into the health-care debate.

During the interview, Mr. Bush appeared relaxed as he sipped coffee and called for questions, often holding up his hands to say more about a topic or finish a thought. His most animated and expansive comments came as he discussed his drive to introduce democracy in the Middle East, a topic that often drew him to the edge of his seat.

The president said his administration's efforts are advancing across the Middle East, despite concerns that they are sowing instability. "My attitude is that America must have faith in our values, be idealistic about our vision, and practical about what's possible," he said. "But it's changing. It's changing."

Conditions for Hamas

Still, Mr. Bush warned he isn't prepared to accept one offshoot of that drive: the electoral rise of the radical Hamas party among Palestinians. Whether Hamas is democratically elected or not, Mr. Bush said, the U.S. won't deal with the group. Hamas has claimed responsibility for many attacks on Israel over the years and continues to deny its right to exist.

"A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," Mr. Bush said. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

The Palestinian election is a reminder that, in some countries in the region, elections could elevate Islamic religious parties that aren't friendly to the West or eager to see other Western values spread. But Mr. Bush made clear he isn't deterred by such concerns, saying he sees "no alternative" to democracy as a long-term stabilizing force.

Elsewhere in the Middle East, Mr. Bush said he is working with other international leaders to defuse Iran's nuclear program. He made it clear that he is particularly supportive of a proposal under which Russia would enrich nuclear material on the Iranians' behalf in return for that country's renunciation of nuclear-weapons research.

Iran has said it is interested in the idea. Its top nuclear negotiator has been discussing it with Russian officials this week, but no agreement has been reached.

Mr. Bush suggested he had grave reservations about the West's ability to work with Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, citing that leader's call for the destruction of Israel. Mr. Bush said Mr. Ahmadinejad's "interest in the destruction of one of our closest allies" is a matter of concern "to people who care for the peace around the world."

Mr. Bush also had words of criticism for Syria, saying that government continued to meddle in the affairs of its neighbor Lebanon in direct defiance of United Nations disengagement demands.

--Joseph B. White in Detroit contributed to this article.

Write to Christopher Cooper at christopher.cooper@wsj.com3 and John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com4

Managing Detroit (WP)

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

IT'S BEEN YEARS since chrome and tail fins seduced consumers, and few people still believe that what's good for General Motors is good for America. But the big Detroit carmakers remain so prominent -- as employers, industrial symbols and purveyors of cultural icons -- that it's hard to keep their grim results in some sort of perspective. Last year General Motors Corp. announced plans to cut 30,000 U.S. jobs, and this week Ford Motor Co. followed with plans to cut at least 25,000. These losses are painful.

DOJ_NMG_0011970

But they do not herald the death of American car manufacturing. Nor do they justify special measures from the federal government.

Since 1985 the value of cars, trucks and components manufactured in the United States has roughly doubled. Even more remarkably, the industry employs about the same number of workers it did 20 years ago -- a notable achievement given that employment in other types of manufacturing has fallen. What the GM and Ford announcements signal is not the decline of an industry but rather a shift in its makeup. The U.S. payrolls of Detroit's Big Three (the third company being Chrysler, though it is now German-owned) fell from about 1 million people to roughly 400,000 between 1979 and 2003. Some of those jobs were transferred to components makers that were spun off by GM and Ford, and some were replaced by foreign "transplant" factories whose American payrolls have grown to just under 300,000. As a result of this process, membership in the United Auto Workers union has fallen by more than half over the past quarter-century.

The dislocation has been grueling. Michigan has been a net loser of at least 100,000 automobile jobs since the late 1970s, although other Midwestern states have held roughly level; Indiana has even gained a bit. The new Sun Belt factories make up for Michigan's loss to some extent, but some of the foreign plants offer workers lower benefits and remain union-free partly because of harsh laws that discourage workers from organizing. Even with fairer labor laws, though, the generous compensation offered by Detroit would not have been sustainable. Only a combination of oligopoly and perverse government policy disguised this fact for a generation.

Until the 1970s the Detroit three accounted for more than 80 percent of vehicle sales in the United States. At its peak, GM alone controlled more than half of the market. This power allowed Detroit to charge high prices, which hurt ordinary families, and in turn to pay wages that were much more generous than workers in other industries could expect. But by the late 1970s foreign imports were growing, and generous compensation became unaffordable; in 1979, Chrysler had to be rescued by the federal government. The arrival of transplant factories in the 1980s was an extension of this foreign competition -- and a welcome one. If the foreigners hadn't started making cars here, imports would have boomed even faster. Michigan's pain would not have been offset by gains in the Sun Belt.

The rise of foreign competition should have forced the auto workers' compensation into line with that of other industries, but this is where perverse government incentives kicked in. The government allowed companies to boost compensation by promising generous retirement benefits, but it failed to require firms to set aside the cash to make good on those pledges. In the case of pensions, companies had to set aside something, but not the full amount needed. In the case of retiree health benefits, they were free to set aside only what they wanted . This "promise now, pay later" option allowed carmakers to postpone adjustment to foreign competition. But "later" has arrived, and the Detroit three confront benefit costs that undermine their ability to compete against the transplant factories.

Detroit's advocates understandably wish that the old world of oligopoly wages could somehow be preserved forever. They tend to oppose trade, which they rightly identify as the root cause of their problems. But trade and competition promote efficiency and innovation -- new models, safety features and hybrid engines, not to mention good prices -- and these consumer gains outweigh the losses for unionized car workers. Equally, Detroit's advocates tend to favor regulation that expands the option of paying later; right now, they are pushing Congress to weaken rules on pension funding still further. But the pay-later approach is cruel to workers who count on benefit promises that turn out to be fake, and it increases the risk that pension plans will ultimately be bailed out by taxpayers.

It's not clear whether the GM and Ford restructuring plans will be enough to avert bankruptcy. Their difficulties may take on a more political tone, particularly since the Midwest is a key battleground for presidential campaign strategists. But Congress needs to keep Motown's troubles in perspective. They are the result of competitive pressures that most parts of the U.S. economy take for granted every day. And it is precisely by embracing competition that the United States has become the world's most powerful economy.

In Address, Bush Is Seen Avoiding Large Initiatives (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011971

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — Having stabilized his political standing after a difficult 2005, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday intent primarily on retaining his party's slim majority in Congress this year and completing unfinished business from his existing agenda.

Unlike last year, when he used the occasion to kick off an ambitious and ultimately failed effort to overhaul Social Security, Mr. Bush seems unlikely to reshape the political landscape with his speech on Tuesday, members of both parties said.

Lawmakers said this election year would not be a good time to push difficult initiatives, and the White House has already shelved what it had initially planned as its big idea for 2006, a rewriting of the tax code.

Administration officials and other Republicans in Washington said Mr. Bush would focus on several topics, including health care, spending restraint, illegal immigration and the nation's international economic competitiveness, as well as an unapologetic restatement of his national security policy.

Much of the speech, they said, will be tied together under a broad theme acknowledging that the United States is going through transitions that involve wrenching dislocation as well as opportunity.

His aides portray Mr. Bush as undaunted by the plague of setbacks last year that loosened his grip on his party and drove down his poll numbers, which although up from their lows last fall remain at anemic levels. They said he was intent on using the nationally televised address on Tuesday to set out a forceful agenda that he will use to draw sharp contrasts with Democrats.

"People don't sit around here wallowing and wondering if we should go the school uniform route because we had some challenges last year," said Nicolle Wallace, the White House communications director, referring to an initiative once championed by President Bill Clinton that has come to symbolize a retreat into small-bore leadership.

"The state of the union address will be directional for our party and our country, and visionary," Ms. Wallace said. "That is not code for it lacking substance."

In the broadest sense, Mr. Bush's challenge is to demonstrate to both parties that he can still drive the national agenda despite the increasing difficulties he has had keeping Republicans together on domestic issues and in line with his assertively expansive view of his own wartime powers.

After five tumultuous years in office, he must show that his administration is not exhausted and bereft of ideas, and that the more ambitious goals he has set out at home and abroad have not crashed up against the nation's tolerance for ideological change.

The president's main goals for the year appear to be showing progress in Iraq, the issue that more than any determines his public support, and doing all he can to help maintain Republican control of Congress in the fall elections.

Part of that calculation, members of both parties said, is acknowledging that overreaching on legislative initiatives this year could carry outsized political risks, since the loss of even of few seats in either chamber could endanger his ability to get anything done for the remainder of his term.

"We shouldn't underestimate the White House's ability to win a political campaign, so to the extent that success in November is his objective, this is his announcement speech, and an important one," said Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council, an organization of centrist Democrats.

The speech is an opportunity for Mr. Bush to frame the legislative debates that will dominate Congress in coming months and provide ammunition for the fall elections. He has signaled that he will push hard for the extension of his tax cuts, arguing that failure to do so would amount to a tax increase that would endanger the economy. He is also fighting big fights over reauthorization of the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act and legislation to stem illegal immigration.

Aides said he also wanted to set out a broader vision of where the country should be heading and how it should get there.

"He views the times we are living in to be transformational, and with that comes great anxiety," said a senior administration official who is working closely with the president on the speech and who spoke on the condition of anonymity to provide a glimpse of the speech's contents.

Mr. Bush, the official said, will bring up topics like protectionism and isolationism to make a point that "America is at its best when we are shaping events, not when we are being shaped by them, both in foreign policy and domestically."

The president goes into the speech having dealt to a large degree with the most acute political problems from the latter half of last year. One was the demoralization of his conservative base, whose enthusiasm could determine the control of Congress. The other was his loss of control last fall of the terms of the partisan debate over national security, the issue that more than any other has determined his political fortunes.

The nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court, and the smooth handling of his confirmation process, has gone a long way toward calming social conservatives. Economic conservatives say they have been reassured by signals from the White House that Mr. Bush will tackle more directly their main area of concern, the rapid growth in government spending.

On the politics of national security, Mr. Bush has struck back forcefully after spending much of last year on the defensive, especially over the continued bloodshed in Iraq and his evolving rationales for taking the United States to war.

"They're on their way up, and they're going to be slow and methodical about recovering the political capital and the ground they will need to advance more of their agenda," said Pat Toomey, a former Republican member of Congress who is now the president of the Club for Growth, a conservative political action committee.

Mr. Bush and other White House officials have issued broad hints about his 2006 agenda, especially a repackaged set of health care initiatives built on existing proposals.

The White House has signaled that Mr. Bush will highlight his support for expanding the tax deductibility of medical expenses for people who lack employer-provided insurance or who have out-of-pocket expenses.

Economists who have consulted with the administration on the issue said Mr. Bush might push for a tax credit for uninsured medical expenses that would be structured so that even people who pay little or nothing in federal income tax would receive it.

Supporters of this proposal say it would mitigate a bias in the tax code that encourages employer-provided health insurance rather than individually purchased coverage.

R. Glenn Hubbard, dean of the Graduate School of Business at Columbia University and a former chief economist at the White House, and two other economists set forth the rationale in a recent book, "Healthy, Wealthy and Wise."

If the government encourages people to buy individual insurance policies with lower premiums and higher co-payments, they said, consumers will "make careful choices about their health care spending," and this, in turn, "will significantly reduce the growths in health costs."

In his budget last year, Mr. Bush proposed a refundable tax credit for the cost of health insurance bought by individuals under 65. The Treasury estimated the 10-year cost at $74 billion. Mr. Bush also said that people should be allowed to take tax deductions for the premiums they paid for high-deductible health insurance plans.

People buy such plans when they establish health savings accounts to pay routine medical expenses. The Treasury said the proposed deduction would cost $28 billion over 10 years.

On health care and other issues, however, Mr. Bush faces daunting hurdles. House Republicans are in the middle of a leadership fight that will not be concluded until after the State of the Union address. In addition, the criminal inquiry into bribery and corruption by lobbyists holds huge risks for Republicans.

Federal budget deficits limit the president's ability to undertake new programs. And members of his own party, especially in the Senate, are beginning to maneuver for advantage for the 2008 presidential race.

"You're starting to see the beginnings of a shift in the center of gravity away from Bush and his agenda toward the next agenda and the next leader of the party," said Bruce Bartlett, a conservative commentator who is often critical of the administration.

Health Of The Union (WSJ)

By David Gratzer

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

During next week's State of the Union address, President Bush will cite rising health costs as a major problem for Americans and their businesses, and he will outline steps to strengthen health savings accounts as a remedy. But he is unlikely to mention Medicare reform -- and that would be a mistake. Indeed, if the president is serious about health reform, he will have to tackle Medicare. And he can start by re-engaging a debate from 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0011973

Seven years ago, Sen. John Breaux and Rep. Bill Thomas completed the final report of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. Considering various reforms, they eventually settled on a proposal modeled after the popular Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP), which covers nine million federal employees and their families. Instead of today's one-size-fits-all Medicare structure, they envisioned a program where seniors choose among competing private plans.

Since then, Washington has debated the size and scope of Medicare expansion -- such as the prescription benefit -- but the program itself has yet to be fundamentally rethought. It needs to be, because faced with Medicare's rising costs over the past four decades, the only real response has been a bipartisan exercise in wage and price controls. The results have been dismal:

• Poor physician participation. In cities such as Denver, it is hard for the elderly to find a doctor. According to a new study by the Center for Studying Health System Change, nearly 30% of American physicians will not accept new Medicare patients.

• Regulatory excess. Medicare requires hospitals and other providers to comply with over 130,000 pages of regulations, according to a Mayo Clinic estimate. A study for the American Hospital Association found that for every hour of care delivered to a Medicare patient, hospital officials spend roughly a half-hour completing the paperwork.

• Uneven service. "One unintended consequence of [Medicare's] administered pricing systems," notes a recent Federal Trade Commission report, "has been to make some hospital services extraordinarily lucrative and others unprofitable. As a result, some services are more available (and others less available) than they would be in a competitive market."

Herein lies the core problem with attempting to separate health reform from Medicare reform: The pricing and regulations of this massively large federal program have a profound impact on the rest of health care. With its controls, Medicare bureaucrats simply shift costs over to insured Americans. And if we really fret over rising health care costs, Medicare gives us plenty of reason for angst: It will consume 25% of federal income-tax revenues by 2030.

What then to do about Medicare? Breaux-Thomas proposed various worthwhile ideas, like collapsing the archaic structure of Medicare (Parts A and B) into a single plan. But the most far-reaching ideas focused on replacing the present program with competing private plans. The federal government would then offer premium support to individuals, providing more subsidies for lower-income seniors than those with higher-incomes.

Premium support is mentioned in the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, but the idea is confined to a handful of demonstration projects starting in 2010. Writing on this page, former House Majority Leader Dick Armey observed: "I was in Congress long enough to know how demonstration projects really work. . . . On meaningful needed reforms, demonstration projects mean a quiet, obscure death."

There are, of course, other steps that must be taken to reform Medicare. The age of eligibility remains 65 -- just as it was 40 years ago when House Ways and Means Chairman Wilbur Mills helped ink the original legislation. Even social security changes its age of eligibility, albeit over the next two decades. We live longer and work longer than ever before -- shouldn't Medicare reflect that?

Medicare works on a pay-as-you-go basis, meaning that today's retirees depend on the financial support of today's taxpayers. With an aging population, the foundations are sinking. Some type of prefunding would be critically important. Indeed, the arguments made in favor of private accounts for social security are even stronger for Medicare reform, given that the unfunded liability is so much larger.

The White House is unlikely to touch prefunding again. Still, it would make sense is to finish the job started by Sen. Breaux and Rep. Thomas. Let's not forget that premium support won approval from a majority on a commission appointed by President Clinton.

In his State of the Union address three years ago, President Bush outlined sweeping changes to Medicare, suggesting that the program needed choice. He even alluded to the FEHBP when he suggested that seniors should have coverage "just like you -- the members of Congress, and your staff, and other federal employees." If the president is serious about taming rising health costs, he will use his second term to act on these words. In fact, the cool reception to his new prescription drug benefit may present an opportunity, since many seniors want the coverage but are hesitant on Plan D. Certainly a bold proposal will give Congress more to discuss than earmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0011974

Protesters Sue For Speech Spot (WP)

By Karlyn Barker

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Organizers planning a protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week say they have been denied a permit to hold the demonstration around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool because that area has been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of the speech.

The organizers of the Tuesday protest, called "World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime," say the National Park Service and the U.S. Capitol Police initially offered them the Capitol Reflecting Pool as a demonstration site but changed their minds.

Demonstrators have been told to confine their gathering to the gravel walkways on the Mall between Third and Fourth streets, farther from the Capitol. The grassy areas are fenced off because they are being resodded.

Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, said the restrictions effectively deny the protesters a meaningful public space to gather as a group. The nearest place to meet together, he said, is Seventh Street, about a mile from the Capitol.

"We are being told that turf renovation and security trump our First Amendment right to protest," he said.

Morales said the group was offered use of the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on Jan. 10 and that the site was not then part of any security perimeter. But on Jan. 19, he said, the group was told the security area had been expanded to include the Reflecting Pool.

He called the change "politically motivated," adding that the Bush administration "is trying to push us so far away that we can't be seen or heard. . . . A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest."

The demonstrators filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking a court order that would enable them to gather at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina will convene a hearing, possibly today.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Capitol Police declined to comment on Morales's allegations that politics played a part in the decision and would not say if the Capitol Reflecting Pool has been used in the past as a protest site.

"Many of the questions you are asking are security-related, so we can't comment on that," said Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a public information officer with the agency.

Mara Verheyden-Hilliard, a lawyer with the Partnership for Civil Justice, said the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on the west side of the U.S. Capitol has historically been a site where demonstrators have staged protests.

"It's been used time and time again for major demonstrations and small demonstrations," she said. "It's been a critical location for First Amendment expressive activity for a long, long time."

James R. Klimaski, an attorney for the demonstrators, said protesters have been told they can't use the area because it would interfere with Bush's motorcade. But, Klimaski said, that portion of the Capitol grounds is normally used as a parking lot.

Klimaski said that other groups have previously held demonstrations on the east side of the Capitol during State of the Union addresses but that those areas are now off limits because of the construction of a new visitor center.

Morales said organizers of the Capitol Hill protest expect it to draw about 5,000 participants. The demonstration is one of several planned around the country. The group's Web site urges people to gather on the night of Bush's address to Congress and to "symbolically drown out" the president's speech with drums, pots and pans, and other noise.

He said organizers are trying to get a permit from D.C. police to close part of Third Street so they can rally there. The group said it does have a permit to hold a national demonstration against the Bush administration at the Ellipse on Feb. 4.

Moderate, Picked As Dems' Voice, Faces Liberal Outcry Governor To Respond To State Of The Union (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine lifted the Democratic Party's spirits last fall when he won in a conservative state and gave his fellow Democrats some ideas about how to replicate his success.

DOJ_NMG_0011975

The fruits of victory include the honor of being picked to respond to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday — and the wrath of liberal bloggers wondering why Democrats didn't choose somebody else. Anybody else.

On the campaign trail, Kaine was "not at all bashful about talking about faith and values," as he puts it, or about contrasting the successes of his state's popular Democratic leaders with the record of the Republican president and Congress.

He set "a leadership example for the rest of the country," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said when they named Kaine to give the party response on national TV.

Their pick — a Roman Catholic who opposes gay marriage — highlighted fault lines within the party. Bloggers on several liberal websites were furious for reasons including Kaine's looks, style and obscurity, his open talk about religion, his moderate positions and his inexperience in foreign affairs.

"What the hell are they thinking?" Arianna Huffington demanded on www.huffingtonpost.com. In a post that drew 262 responses mostly echoing her irritation, she accused Democrats of choosing "someone whose only claim to fame is that he carried a red state" when they badly need to make the case that "the GOP is not the party that can best keep us safe."

Kaine is not planning to ignore Iraq, national security or what Democrats call the Republican "culture of corruption." But, he said, when he speaks from Richmond on his 17th day as governor, he won't throw red meat either.

In an interview Wednesday, Kaine said he insisted on writing his own speech. He said it will highlight results, bipartisanship and good management at the state level. He'll draw a contrast with "the partisan gridlock, corruption and back and forth" in Washington.

"Bad management at the federal level covers a litany of sins, and corruption is one of them," Kaine said. Others he might mention, he said, include problems with the Iraq war, the Katrina response and the Medicare prescription-drug program.

The overall message: "Results matter. Management is important. Management can be life or death."

Nathan Gonzales, an analyst for the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report, said anyone responding to a State of the Union speech is in a "futile" position, given the trappings of the main event. For Kaine the job is especially tough, he said, because "people don't have any idea who he is or what he's done."

Bloggers at dailykos.com, talkleft.com and other liberal sites showered cyberspace with alternatives: new faces — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer — and famous faces — Al Gore, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Rep. Rick Boucher, D-Va., said Kaine is a "brilliant" choice. He won rural and suburban support last fall, Boucher said, "the very constituents that Democrats need to … regain the House and the Senate."

Liberal writer Ezra Klein atezraklein.typepad.com was unimpressed. He called Kaine "a squat, squinty, pug-nosed fellow" with little oratorical skill.

Kaine addressed his appearance in a USA TODAY interview last fall. "I start with looks that appeal to the homely," he said. His press aide grew agitated, but Kaine reassured him: "Homely polls well."

DIRTY TRICKS (HP)

Huffington Post, January 26, 2006

Why is the White House desperately stonewalling requests to release information about Jack Abramoff's White House comings and goings? I mean, sure, the former uber-lobbyist has become the poster boy for the GOP's culture of corruption -- but it's not like he's been implicated in murder, right? Oh, wait a minute, he has -- the 2001 gangland-style murder of Gus Boulis, a Florida businessman involved in a disputed business deal with Abramoff and two of Abramoff's buddies from his College Republican days. Abramoff has denied any involvement in the murder, but the more you learn about his connection to the case, the more something smells fishy in Florida.

Dems Pick Villaraigosa To Rebut State Of Union, In Spanish (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats announced today that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will deliver the party's Spanish-language response to next week's State of the Union address

DOJ_NMG_0011976

Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine will deliver the Democratic response in English from the governor's mansion in Richmond, Va., while Villaraigosa will do so in Spanish from his office in Los Angeles City Hall, said Sen. Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

The annual presidential address, before a joint session of Congress and a national audience, gives the chief executive the opportunity to lay out his agenda for the coming year.

Bush's speech will begin at 6 p.m. PST; the Democratic response generally begins about an hour later. The mayor's comments will be carried on Spanish-language networks.

This will be the third consecutive year that Democrats have offered a Spanish language response to Bush's speech.

Two years ago, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico delivered the first such response. Last year, it was jointly given by then Rep. Robert Menendez, now a senator from New Jersey, and Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico.

Bush began editing drafts of his speech yesterday. He is expected to propose an array of new initiatives, including allowing Americans to take tax deductions on more of their out-of-pocket medical expenses.

"We are proud to have Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa delivering the Spanish language response this year," Reid and Pelosi said in a joint statement issued in both languages.

"Mayor Villaraigosa is working hard to increase economic opportunity and provide affordable and quality education for the people of Los Angeles. As the first Latino mayor of Los Angeles in more than a century, we are proud to have his diverse voice within the party," they said.

Prognosis Is Mixed For Health Savings (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

President Bush has made "consumer-directed" health savings plans a cornerstone of his policy for addressing runaway medical costs, and he plans to push them again in the State of the Union address next week. But so far there is little evidence that the approach is helping many consumers come to grips with the high price of health care.

In a way, the early results do offer some hope. More than two million people have signed up for the plans, which were created as part of Medicare overhaul legislation in 2003 but were not an option for many people until the health insurance sign-up season last fall. While that is a tiny fraction of the 180 million Americans with health insurance, some experts say the numbers show a notably fast adoption rate for a complicated new consumer program.

By other measures, though, workers and employers have been slow to embrace health savings plans, which are intended to reduce corporate health care costs while giving individuals more control of their medical spending.

In essence, health savings plans are high-deductible insurance policies that people can obtain through their employers or buy independently from insurance companies. In exchange for paying at least the first $1,050 of their medical expenses each year (or for families, a deductible of the first $2,100, consumers are supposed to benefit in two ways: lower monthly premiums and the ability to put pretax dollars into a savings account that grows tax-free.

Those savings, in theory, could be used toward the deductible in future years and help pay additional health bills not covered by the underlying insurance policy. As with a 401(k) retirement account, the health savings are the individual's to keep when changing employers — a portability feature that Bush administration officials like to cite.

But in many cases, people have evidently signed up not because they are eager to direct their own medical spending but because the plan looked cheap or they had no other insurance option. And at least half of those enrolled have not put money in their health savings accounts. So there will be no money building up for next year's out-of-pocket expenses — a big selling point for these health plans.

In addition, many employers have been slow to offer the plans. And companies that do so have been reluctant to encourage worker participation by contributing money to the savings accounts. The employers figure that "portability" means that their money will go out the door with workers who leave.

"That is our main concern," said Eric Airola, benefits director of J. B. Hunt Transport Services, a trucking company based in Lowell, Ark. "Turnover in the truckload industry as a whole is very high," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0011977

As the plans were conceived, people using their own money could be expected to spend less on health care, switching to lower-cost drugs, for example, and adopting healthier lifestyles. Employers were promised savings as they shifted responsibility to workers for thousands of dollars in costs. Uninsured employees of small companies and self-employed people would be able to set aside pretax dollars for low-cost, limited coverage.

But for those who criticized the idea of health savings plans from the start, the early results simply confirm their gloomier forecasts. The critics say this approach is increasing many people's out-of-pocket expenses and warn that it will make them less likely to seek routine preventive care that might stave off bigger problems down the road.

Pat Schoeni, executive director of the National Coalition on Health Care, a group seeking better, more affordable medical care, said, "The savings accounts are not designed to help people pay for health care; they are designed to help employers unload their health care costs."

Mr. Bush, in his weekly radio talk last Saturday, said he would call on Congress in the State of the Union speech to make the plans "more available, more affordable and more portable." Among other steps, White House officials say, he will propose raising the tax-free contribution ceiling, which for 2006 is $2,700 for individuals and $5,450 for families.

Frank McArdle, a health policy expert in Washington for Hewitt Associates, the big benefits-consulting firm, predicted that "expanding health savings accounts to make them more attractive to employers and their people will be a hot issue in Congress this year."

For people with modest incomes who are hard put to save for medical needs or much else, raising the contribution limit may be a moot point. But for those who have the money to set aside, the savings accounts can be attractive.

Eric Kok, 32, a printing and packaging company manager in Lancaster, Pa., says he will put part of his pay this year into a tax-free health savings account. "Because I'm young, I'm still maxing out my 401(k)," he said of his retirement plan at the Banta Corporation. He calls that Step 1. "Step 2 is opening a health savings account and trying to put as much into it as possible."

He and his wife, Susan, who has her own insurance from her employer, together have a six-figure income. Mr. Kok said that when he retires, he can use the health savings tax-free for care and for premiums in the company's retiree health plan. If he dies with a balance in the account, his survivors can inherit the money, as with a 401(k) account.

Stacy Ryan, the benefits manager at Banta, said the company saw the plan as "the new wave of health care." Banta added health savings accounts and eliminated company-subsidized health benefits for its 4,000 nonunion workers this year.

She said the health savings plan had already had "a huge impact" on employees' actions. They are "making better decisions, such as not going to the emergency room if it is not an emergency."

Based on the acceptance of health maintenance organizations in the 1980's, some industry analysts predict the pace of people signing up for the plans will continue to grow quickly. Forrester Research, a market research firm, projects that nearly 22 million people will have health savings plans by January 2008 — about 12 percent of those with insurance.

While nonunion employees of Banta have no insurance alternative, workers at large companies that still offer a choice have been slow to abandon coverage like H.M.O.'s and preferred-provider networks.

At I.B.M., only "a very small number" of employees have selected the health savings account option, according to Marianne E. DeFazio, the director of global health benefits, who declined to provide a specific figure. Industry experts estimated that 3 percent of I.B.M. employees had signed up for the savings plans, which the company has offered for the last two enrollment periods.

UnitedHealth Group, the largest provider of the savings plans, says that of the 24 million people insured under its various types of policies, 654,000 now have health savings plans. But so far, only about half have started setting aside money, a spokesman, Daryl Richard, said.

Among UnitedHealth's policy holders, a larger number — 846,000 — are still covered under an older type of policy that, like health savings plans, has low premiums and high annual deductibles. But instead of employees' setting aside money, the employer contributes to an account that gradually grows in value and is available for the employee to draw down for health expenses.

The money in these plans, known as health reimbursement accounts, reverts to the employer when workers leave their jobs. That is one reason some large employers are sticking with this older form of insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0011978

Schneider National, a big trucking company in Green Bay, Wis., went further last year and chose such a plan as its only insurance option.

A happy beneficiary of Schneider's insurance plan is Lara Hobbs, 36, of Spring Hill, Fla. Ms. Hobbs, who drives 18-wheelers cross-country, has the liver disease hepatitis C. "It's terminal and deadly unless you cure it," said Ms. Hobbs, who is being treated with an expensive drug, a form of alpha interferon. "I've already been tested," she said. The hepatitis was not detectable. "They are hoping that I've beat it."

Last year, Schneider contributed $750 to Ms. Hobbs's health reimbursement account. She paid $1,500 more herself. But beyond that, her insurance covered 100 percent of weekly injections and six pills a day, whose total cost exceeded $50,000 — more than her annual income.

For Schneider, the first year was "pretty challenging," a spokeswoman, Janet Bonkowski, said. "There was a lot of learning that goes on. Our associates had to become much more involved and active in their care." But Schneider saved money and intends to continue the program, she said, though it is also considering whether to offer the savings plans.

At the White House, the deputy press secretary, Trent Duffy, said the president had no preference between the older health reimbursement plans and the new savings accounts he has been promoting.

But these days, Mr. Duffy said, people change jobs so frequently that they need a health plan they can take with them when they move. Mr. Bush, he said, believes "that the health care system that worked 30 or 40 years ago isn't working."

Bush's Cure-All For Health Care Sidesteps Big Ills (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

President Bush has found the cure for what ails the American health-care system.

"Do you realize the medical field is one where you don't do any comparative shopping," he told an audience last week. "When you buy tile ... for your house, you're out there shopping it. You ... say, 'Look, what am I bid?' When you're buying pipe or things you put in the wall ... you're out there bidding price."

"There's no transparency in pricing in medicine," he said. "You don't know whether the guy next [door] is going to offer a better deal."

That's true. The issue is what to do about it. Mr. Bush's reply: Give Americans more skin in the health-care game so they'll be better shoppers. (That's what he means when he talks about health savings accounts and policies with large deductibles.) Make health care more like the market for tile and pipes, he argues, and Americans will get better health care for less.

Set aside the case that only a taxpayer-financed, government-organized solution works. A Republican president and Congress aren't going there, and a lot of Democrats are skeptical, too.

Instead, the U.S. is going to experiment with market forces to solve this problem: that Americans aren't getting their money's worth for the $1.9 trillion a year they spend on health care. For that sum, we ought to have more equitable access to health care and have healthier people. Politicians too often boast the U.S. has the best health-care system in the world, marvel at medical technology -- and then fail to ask if we should be getting more, given what we spend.

In the 1990s, the U.S. focused market weaponry on providers, not patients. Managed care was about giving groups of health-care providers a flat sum, thus giving them incentives to do what was necessary to keep patients healthy and costs down, rather than underpaying for preventive care and paying up each time a patient showed up ill. Forcing managed-care outfits to compete for patients was supposed to stop them from skimping on care.

Americans tasted that and spit it out. The 2000s "pay for performance" version, one Medicare is toying with, is to pay doctors and hospitals not for how much care they give but rather for how well they care for patients.

Mr. Bush, by contrast, is talking about using market forces to influence individuals, not providers. He reasons that if Americans had to pay more out of their pockets, perhaps with money that employers or government hands them, they'd use health care more judiciously. And if Americans were better shoppers, health-care providers would compete much as cellphone companies and auto makers do -- to the benefit of consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0011979

Implicit in this approach is the notion that Americans use too much health care. So, make them pay for unnecessary emergency-room visits or the costlier one-a-day antibiotic instead of the generic, and they'll spend less. That's a sound idea. It may save the system some money by eliminating the cost of processing small claims for essentially healthy people. But is avoiding the emergency room the big problem that needs solving?

Not Really. A bigger problem is that too many healthy (for now) Americans go without preventive care, and too many chronically ill Americans don't get care that would avoid costly, painful complications later. HSAs don't help there. And then there's the uncomfortable fact that 80% of health spending in the U.S. each year is spent on 8% of the population. Giving them tax breaks to buy health-insurance policies with $2,000 deductibles won't ensure that money is well spent.

"HSAs aren't a way of responding to the very sick people who are responsible for the bulk of health-care spending," says James Robinson, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley.

Is moving to "empower the individual" appropriate to health care? In part, it is. Doctors, hospitals and insurers need a nudge to think of us more as customers than they sometimes do. But choosing floor tile is easier than distinguishing between a headache caused by stress and a headache caused by a brain tumor. The costs of a mistaken decision to avoid a doctor visit are greater than choosing the wrong cellphone plan.

Well-functioning markets require consumers with enough information to make sound choices. That doesn't yet describe health care. "It's going to take a lot of effort to get us to the point where we're confident that using the market is going to improve care, rather than make it worse," says Elliott Fisher, a Dartmouth Medical School professor.

Talking about health care on the national stage is better than not talking about it. But let's clearly define the problem so we devise the right solutions.

The Fix-It Myth (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Almost everyone agrees that we ought to "fix the health care system" -- a completely meaningless phrase despite its popularity with politicians, pundits and "experts." Indeed, it is popular precisely because it is meaningless. The people who proclaim it rarely tell you the discomforting choices it might involve. Instead, they focus on a few specific shortcomings of our $1.9 trillion health-industrial complex and imply that, if we correct these often serious flaws, we'll have "fixed" the system or at least made a good start. This is rarely true, and so most forays into "health reform" end with disillusion.

We are about to start the cycle again. By most accounts, President Bush plans to highlight health care in his forthcoming State of the Union address. His proposals may or may not have merit, but they surely won't fix the health system in any fundamental way. The reason is that most Americans don't want to fix the system in that sense. Most are satisfied with their care. Most don't see (or directly pay) the vast majority of their costs. Because politicians -- of both parties -- reflect public opinion, they won't do more than tinker.

Unfortunately, tinkering isn't enough. As everyone knows, health care spending has risen steadily. In 2004, it totaled 16 percent of national income, up from 7.2 percent in 1970. Spending will continue to rise, if for no other reasons than that the population is aging and the average annual health costs for someone 65 and older ($7,910 in 2003) are -- surprise -- more than twice those for someone 35 to 54 ($2,966). As health insurance becomes more costly, the number of uninsured, now about 46 million, may grow. Worse, health costs may depress wage gains, raise taxes and squeeze other government programs.

Here's the paradox: A health care system that satisfies most of us as individuals may hurt us as a society. Let me offer myself as an example. All my doctors are in small practices. I like it that way. It seems to make for closer personal connections. But I'm always stunned by how many people they employ for nonmedical chores -- appointments, recordkeeping, insurance collections. A bigger practice, though more impersonal, might be more efficient. Because insurance covers most of my medical bills, though, I don't have any stake in switching.

On a grander scale, that's our predicament. Americans generally want their health care system to do three things: (1) provide needed care to all people, regardless of income; (2) maintain our freedom to pick doctors and their freedom to recommend the best care for us; and (3) control costs. The trouble is that these laudable goals aren't compatible. We can have any two of them, but not all three. Everyone can get care with complete choice -- but costs will explode, because patients and doctors have no reason to control them. We can control costs but only by denying care or limiting choices.

DOJ_NMG_0011980

Disliking the inconsistencies, we hide them -- to individuals. We subsidize employer-paid health insurance by excluding it from income taxes (the 2006 cost to government: an estimated $126 billion). Most workers don't see the full costs of their health care; a reported Bush proposal to add new tax subsidies would magnify the effect. A similar blindness applies to Medicare recipients, whose costs are paid mainly by other people's payroll taxes. Despite complaints about rising co-payments and deductibles, out-of-pocket costs are still falling as a share of all health spending. In 2004, they were 12.5 percent; in 1993, they were 15.8 percent.

We're living in a fantasy world. Given our inconsistent expectations, no health care system -- not one completely run by government or one following "market" principles -- can satisfy public opinion. Politicians and pundits can score cheap points by emphasizing one goal or another (insure the uninsured, cover drugs for Medicare recipients, expand "choice") without facing the harder job: finding a better balance among competing goals.

Every attempt to do so has failed. Consider the "managed care" experiment of the 1990s. The idea was simple: Herd patients into health maintenance organizations or large physician networks; impose "best practices" on doctors and patients to encourage preventive medicine and eliminate wasteful spending; and cut costs through administrative economies. For a while, it seemed to work. From 1993 to 1997, private insurance premiums rose only 2.6 percent annually. But managed care upset doctors and patients. It restricted personal choice. Some coverage denials seemed inhumane or inept. After a political backlash, managed-care organizations relaxed cost controls.

Now, some say that because the "market" has failed, greater government control is the answer. Private insurance has high overhead costs and generates too much paperwork. True. Still, there's not much evidence that over long periods government controls health spending any better. From 1970 to 2003, Medicare spending rose an average of 9 percent annually, reports the Kaiser Family Foundation. In the same years, private insurance costs rose 10.1 percent annually. Part of the gap reflected private insurance's greater generosity. It covered drugs while Medicare didn't.

Americans want more health care for less money, and when they don't get it, they indict drug companies, insurers, trial lawyers and bureaucrats. Although these familiar scapegoats may not be blameless, the real problem is us. We demand the impossible. The changes we truly need are political. We need to reconnect people with the public consequences of their private acts. We should curb the subsidization of private insurance. Medicare recipients, especially wealthier ones, should pay more of their bills. But these changes won't happen because people don't want to see the costs. We don't have the health care system we need, but we do have the one we deserve.

Drug Benefit Suffers Side Effects (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Administration officials yesterday told senators the new Medicare prescription-drug program has problems, but they're under control, and states will be reimbursed for covering seniors' prescription costs resulting from the glitches.

Senators on the Finance Committee seemed cautiously optimistic at the assurances, but some said Congress will still probably need to act.

"I think there's no question that the issue of prescription drugs will be back on the [Senate] floor in some form this year," said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday, "We've identified the problems, we're working on them and the plan gets better every day."

He and Medicare chief Mark McClellan had a private meeting yesterday with committee members to brief them on the situation.

Since the new Medicare drug program began three weeks ago, enrollment problems have left many seniors without coverage, and more than 20 states stepped in to cover costs. Low-income seniors had the most trouble, as the government worked to automatically transfer them from Medicaid drug coverage to the new Medicare program.

DOJ_NMG_0011981

Mr. McClellan said states should first seek reimbursement from private plans offering the drug coverage, but the government will reimburse the states for any difference. The total price tag isn't clear yet.

"The good news is the administration does admit there's problems," said Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat and the Finance Committee's ranking member, who will work with committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, to "nail down" a timeline for reimbursement. He said that if he's not satisfied with the reimbursement plan, "then I think legislation will be much more likely."

He also said some seniors are paying co-payments they shouldn't.

Mr. Grassley said he'll follow up with a public hearing on the new program, but he's satisfied Mr. Leavitt has it "under control."

"They've identified problems very well ... and I feel they're making good progress," he said.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, Maine Republican, said officials are "making good-faith efforts," and reimbursement legislation "may not be necessary."

But she and other senators are ready with a bill that would reimburse the states, cut the wait time for seniors who call the Medicare hot line and make other changes.

Today, top Senate Democrats will demand President Bush make immediate changes to fix the program.

Mrs. Snowe said legislation may be required to extend the mid-May deadline seniors face for choosing their new drug plan. Mr. Grassley said that will be decided closer to May.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said he worried the administration will "leave the states holding the bag" on the reimbursement issue.

"We have to monitor very carefully," Mr. Schumer said.

Caution Urged For Executives Seeking Spots On Nonprofit Boards (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, January 26, 2006

Agencies should be careful about allowing employees to serve on the boards of nonprofit organizations that have an interest in their work, according to a recent opinion published by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel.

Federal executives can serve as officers or directors at nonprofit organizations, a 19-page opinion released Jan. 11 stated. But agencies should take into account the appearance of an ethical violation before permitting employees to serve in a group that handles issues related to their government work.

"Government employees [have a] . . . duty to 'avoid any actions creating the appearance that they are violating the law ... or ethical standards,' " the Justice office's opinion said.

"If an outside organization in which an employee is a director has been advocating its views directly to the federal government on a matter that the organization has identified as especially significant, there is a significantly heightened risk that the employee ... will at least appear less than independent in his judgments," the legal counsel stated. "And that risk ... calls for serious consideration by the employee's agency."

Federal law requires government employees to recuse themselves from work activities when a nonprofit on which they serve has a financial interest in the matter. But just because nonprofits spend money advocating a position does not necessarily mean they have a financial interest in an agency action, according to the opinion.

The case leading to the opinion originated in July 2004 when a senior executive at the Education Department was told by the Office of Government Ethics that election to the Senior Executives Association board of directors would result in a criminal conflict of interest due to his service on his department's Executive Resources Board.

An executive resources panel, among other things, makes recommendations on the senior executive pay system to the Office of Personnel Management. The SEA is a nonprofit professional association that advocates in the interest of career federal executives.

According to SEA President Carol Bonosaro, the association appealed the case in August 2004 and is pleased with the Office of Legal Counsel's decision.

"Employees who want to serve on boards like this should not have to worry about being charged under a criminal statute," Bonosaro said. "To us, [the opinion] essentially puts the matter to rest. It's up to the agencies, where individual decisions will be made by ethics officers."

Bonosaro said that since the opinion was released, a federal executive was approved by his agency's ethics officer to serve on the SEA board, which has 15 members serving staggered three-year terms.

The Office of Government Ethics' verbal opinion had made several members of the association hesitant about running for a board of director position because they didn't want to put themselves at risk, according to Bonosaro.

Had the 2004 opinion been permitted to stand, it could have eliminated some federal employees not only from consideration for the SEA board but for the boards of other organizations, such as the International Personnel Management Association or the American Society of Public Administration, according to Bonosaro.

Bonosaro said the decision was a long time in coming and added that the association's lawyers are working to issue a statement carefully laying out what the appearance standard means.

"Appearance is often in the eye of the beholder," Bonosaro said.

The Justice opinion also addresses a situation where National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration employees were serving as councilors of the American Meteorological Society, a position equivalent to a member of a board of directors.

Despite the fact that the society spent money advocating positions on matters such as hurricane research, the opinion found that the organization did not have a financial interest in the matter and NOAA employees could serve with the group.

The American Meteorological Society did not return calls for comment and NOAA was not able to comment in time for publication of this article.

Senators Debate Details Of Lobbying Rules (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — After weeks of calls for restrictions on how lobbyists influence Congress, lawmakers began Wednesday to grapple with the thorny details of just how to do it.

At the first congressional hearing on revamping the rules, lobbyists argued against proposals to ban privately financed trips for House and Senate members and their aides, saying travel helps them make good policy decisions in an era of globalization.

Some senators rejected calls for more restrictions, saying problems illustrated by the scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff are rooted in lawmakers' own behavior, the way Congress operates and a failure to enforce rules already on the books.

“I don't believe lobby reform is the problem. Congress is,” said Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., a member of the Senate's governmental affairs committee.

At the same time, Senate leaders clashed over how to go about writing the new rules. Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., proposed a bipartisan task force to handle the job. Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., rejected the idea, saying the legislation should be drafted through the Senate's regular committees.

At the hearing, former senator Dick Clark, D-Iowa, who runs educational trips for members of Congress through the non-profit Aspen Institute, said a total ban on privately sponsored travel would be “foolhardy.”

He said his group, which has sponsored more than $3.5 million in trips since 2000, accepts only foundation funds and does not allow lobbyist participation. That should be the standard for future trips, he said.

Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins said drawing distinctions among groups that sponsor travel would be difficult. Many non-profits that sponsor travel are backed by interests that lobby Congress, and their boards are heavily sprinkled with lobbyists.

“Today, lobbying too often conjures up images of all-expense-paid vacations masquerading as fact-finding trips,” the Maine Republican said.

There is broad agreement on Capitol Hill for greater disclosure of lobbyists' activities, limits on gifts and travel paid for by special interests, and a longer “cooling-off period” — currently one year — before members of Congress and staff who take lobbying jobs can lobby their former colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0011983

Contentious proposals also are on the agenda, including limiting lobbyists' ability to raise campaign funds for lawmakers, banning or limiting the use of corporate aircraft for lawmakers' travel, and making it tougher for members of the House and Senate to “earmark” tax dollars for pet projects.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said corruption stems from the growing cost of campaigns and the constant chase to raise funds for re-election. He proposed limiting members of Congress to raising money only from their home states, and not from Washington lobbyists. In the House, Reps. David Obey, D-Wis., and Barney Frank, D-Mass., proposed a new system to publicly finance congressional elections.

For Would-Be Lobbying Reformers, Money Habit Is Hard To Kick (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Paul Miller had the bad luck to ascend to the presidency of the American League of Lobbyists just as Jack Abramoff was descending from the profession. And so it was that the young and earnest Wisconsinite found himself before the Senate governmental affairs committee yesterday explaining why "this is not a widespread scandal."

"Our government is not corrupt, lobbyists are not bribing people, and members of Congress are not being bought for campaign contributions," pleaded Miller, wearing a boyish hairdo and the gray pinstripe suit, French-blue shirt and wingtips of his profession. "I don't think we can say with certainty that the current system is broken."

To the Abramoff-panicked lawmakers, Miller might as well have been asserting the airworthiness of pigs.

Miller and his cohort -- the ones in the gallery with the leather portfolios -- were about the only ones in the room who thought everything was hunky-dory. The senators seemed virtually unanimous in their view that, when it came to influence peddling, "the status quo stinks," as Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the recipient of more than $2 million from lobbyists and lawyers in recent years, succinctly put it.

As the hearing kicked off the congressional debate on lobbying reform, the lawmakers had no difficulty conceding they had a problem. But there was yawning disconnect between the problem and the proposed remedies. While most everybody agreed that Congress was being subverted by lawmakers' reliance on lobbyists for campaign cash, the proposals getting the most serious consideration yesterday were relatively minor: whether to ban lobbyist-paid lunches or a few million dollars' worth of privately funded congressional trips.

"I don't believe lobbying reform's the problem; I believe Congress is," committee dissident Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) lectured his colleagues. "We ought to be real frank with the American people. We're going to do a lot of window dressing, but in the long run we're not going to change anything till we change the motivation that the next election is more important than anything else."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, found himself in a rare convergence with Coburn. "We are carping on trifles here," he testified. "Why is it that we warm up to all these lobbyists? It isn't for a meal. . . . We know when it comes time to finance our campaigns, we're going to be knocking on those same doors."

Registered lobbyists have served as treasurers of at least 868 political committees, according to the Center for Public Integrity, including the campaign committees or leadership PACs of at least 39 sitting members of Congress. And virtually all members benefit from lavish fundraisers arranged by lobbyists or contributions from lobbyists that have exceeded $100 million in recent years. This money frightens challengers out of the race -- a main reason 98 percent of incumbent House members won reelection in 2004.

The senators yesterday sounded like addicts, powerless to overcome their reliance on lobbyist cash. "It's out of control," lamented Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), a recipient of $573,000 from lobbyists and lawyers over five years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. "We all hate it. And it's about time we collectively think about how we can get off the treadmill."

"I'm afraid nobody will take me seriously unless we can also find some way to do something further about campaign spending and fundraising," fretted Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.), recipient of $314,000.

New Mexico Republican Pete V. Domenici ($196,000) proposed limiting fundraising to a lawmaker's home state. Alaska Republican Ted Stevens ($229,000) suggested a constitutional amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0011984

But these cries for help fell on the deaf ears of Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the man designated by Senate GOP leadership to draft a lobbying reform bill. Santorum, in a tough reelection race, ranked fifth out of the 535 members of Congress in receipts from lobbyists and lawyers ($519,000 last year alone).

"We need to look at a variety of different things -- look at gifts, we need to look at meals, we need to look at travel," Santorum testified. He didn't say a peep about campaign financing.

Instead, he delivered a campaign speech. "I have a long history of being involved in congressional reform," he said, boasting that "those of you who frequent the Senate restaurant and barbershops now know that they are no longer taxpayer-subsidized."

If Santorum's presentation lacked details, it didn't seem to matter. Only two of the 16 senators on the committee sat through the entire hearing. National Association of Manufacturers chief John Engler, missing when called to the witness table, explained later that he had been taking "a quick break."

Engler, like Miller, assured the nervous lawmakers that all was well. "Additional rules and laws weren't needed" to catch the bad guys, he advised. And besides, he said, "working meals" are legitimate. "A hamburger, I don't think, is going to change the mind of members of this committee."

Engler didn't say what might happen if that hamburger came with a side of campaign cash.

Senators Say Ethics Issue Goes Beyond Lobbying Reform (GFH)

By Jim Abrams

The Grand Forks Herald, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Members of Congress must look at their own behavior as well as lobbyists' if they are to regain the trust of the American public, senators said Wednesday.

At the same time, lobbyists and those who sponsor trips for lawmakers warned against overreacting to the headlines on the influence peddling activities of Jack Abramoff. In particular, they said, banning all privately funded travel could isolate lawmakers from the knowledge they need to write law.

What's clear, said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chair of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, is that Congress can't tackle the big issues facing the nation without the trust of the public. "And the public's trust in Congress is perilously low."

"Frankly, the status quo stinks and cries out for us to clear the air," Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's top Democrat, said at the first hearing following the Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Leaders from both parties in both chambers have promoted measures to tighten rules and laws governing lawmaker contacts with lobbyists. There are several common themes: restricting or banning the giving of gifts to lawmakers, prohibiting lobbyists from arranging or funding trips, lengthening the time between when a lawmaker leaves office and takes a job as a lobbyist and requiring greater disclosure of lobbyist activities.

But speakers at the hearing also said members of Congress must look at how they do business and get elected, larger issues that could complicate quick passage of the first lobbying reform bill in a decade.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., co-sponsor of one of the major lobbying bills, said Congress must tackle the problem of earmarks, special interest projects that get inserted in larger pieces of legislation, often with the help of lobbyists. "We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks," he said. "It's disgraceful, this process."

Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., who is preparing legislation at the behest of the Senate GOP leadership, said his bill might also look at spending by tax-exempt partisan groups known as 527s, a touchy subject because Democrats relied heavily on such groups in the last election.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., also noted, in a broader sense, that Congress must look at how lawmakers finance their political campaigns. "Unless and until we address this in an honest fashion, we are carping on trifles here."

In the House on Wednesday, Democrats David Obey of Wisconsin and Barney Frank of Massachusetts said they would introduce legislation to eliminate all private money for House elections, turning instead to public financing. "The problem with politics is more fundamental than meals or trips with lobbyists," Obey said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0011985

Taking a different approach, Sens. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., Wayne Allard, R-Colo., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., unveiled a plan to create an independent commission, similar to the 9/11 Commission, to recommend ethics reforms. "What is at stake here is clearly the credibility of the institution," Coleman said at the hearing.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., separately wrote Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., asking him to join in establishing a bipartisan Senate lobbying reform task force to explore the various proposals.

Reid, who has linked the lobbying scandal to GOP control of Congress, declined. "We don't need a task force to study what's wrong. We know what's wrong," he said at a news conference.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, urged Congress not to respond to the actions of a "few unscrupulous operatives" by impeding the rights of citizens, including lobbyists, to petition Congress and keep members of Congress informed.

John Engler, former governor of Michigan and current head of the National Association of Manufacturers, told the panel that the current system was working, noting that a lobbyist was going to jail and a member of Congress was going to be sentenced. He was apparently referring to Abramoff and former Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., who recently pleaded guilty to bribery.

"Whatever occurs, I think it is imperative that you do not overreact," he said.

Dick Clark, a former senator from Iowa who established the Aspen Institute program for Congress, said it was right for Congress to reject lobbyist involvement in trips. But a total ban on privately funded travel "would be a disservice to members of Congress," he said.

Aspen arranges seminars both inside the country and around the world where members of Congress are required to attend conferences that last six hours a day over four days. It does not pay for recreational activities.

"Foreign travel is essential in an era of globalization," he said. "Insularity is not an option for the world's only superpower."

McCain Calls To Reform Pork Barrel Politics (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

A Senate committee reviewing proposals to reform lobbying today heard calls for Congress to reform its pork barrel politics by ending the practice of quietly adding pet projects known as "earmarks" to appropriations bills.

Appearing as a witness on the opening day of a Senate hearing on lobbying reform, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) was one of several senators to denounce earmarking, a practice he called "disgraceful." He outlined one of several proposals to tighten rules and require greater disclosure of lobbying activities. But he told the committee, "We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks."

McCain made the comments before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, which convened to discuss lobbying reform proposals amid a scandal surrounding the activities of Jack Abramoff, a once-powerful Republican lobbyist. Abramoff pleaded guilty earlier this month to federal charges including bribery of a congressman. His cooperation with investigators as part of a plea deal has stoked concerns on Capitol Hill that other legislators could be implicated, and Congress has responded with a flurry of legislative proposals to reform the system.

However, representatives of lobbying organizations urged the committee today not to overreact to what they described as the unscrupulous activities of one corrupt lobbyist.

And Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), the Senate minority whip, said the problem goes beyond earmarks and that solving it must start with reducing the "outrageous expense" of political campaigns.

The chairman of the committee, Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Me.), said the actions of Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Fla.), who resigned from the House in November after pleading guilty in a separate case to federal bribery and fraud charges, "have prompted a much-needed review of legal lobbying activities that raise questions of improper influence."

As part of reform efforts, she said, "We must end the practice of allowing members to slip earmarks that have received neither scrutiny nor a vote in either the House or the Senate into the final versions of legislation."

DOJ_NMG_0011986

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the top Democrat on the committee, said he and McCain have proposed legislation -- the Bipartisan Lobbying Transparency and Accountability Act of 2005 -- that would require more frequent and detailed disclosure of lobbying activities "and, for the first time, full disclosure from grassroots lobbying firms paid to conduct mass television or direct mail campaigns to influence members of Congress." One such firm was used by Abramoff to conceal millions of dollars in payments that he received from overcharging Indian tribes, Lieberman said.

Other lobbying reform bills have been introduced by Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the Senate minority leader, and by Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.). Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is separately working on lobbying reform legislation on behalf of the Senate GOP leadership.

Lieberman said differences among the proposals are "reconcilable" and that "we now have a once-in-a-generation opportunity to reach agreement on a broad set of lobbying reforms that will reduce the cynicism" of many Americans toward their government. "Frankly, the status quo stinks," he said.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) backed the call to end earmarking, saying, "The problem is us." In the long run, he said, "we're not going to change anything 'til we change the motivation that the next election is more important than anything else."

McCain said his reform bill, among other things, requires lobbyists to disclose their involvement in congressional travel and report gifts worth more than $20. Members of Congress would be required to pay the fair market value of charter flights for travel on private airplanes and would have to file reports of meetings, tours, events or outings in which they participated while on official travel.

McCain also said that "if we don't stop the earmarking, we're not going to stop the abuses of power here in Washington." He suggested that his own party was largely responsible.

"In 1994, when the Congress was taken over by Republicans, there were 4,000 earmarks on appropriations bills," he told the committee. "Last year there were 15,000. It's disgraceful, this process."

McCain said he was especially bothered that at the end of the last congressional session, various extraneous appropriations were "larded onto the money that was supposed to be devoted to the men and women in the military and their ability to conduct the war on terror."

Citizens Against Government Waste, a fiscal watchdog group, estimates that earmarks last year cost taxpayers $27.3 billion, up from $10.1 billion in 1995, the year that Republicans took office as the majority in Congress.

McCain, who uses a broader definition of earmarks, calculates that the pork barrel projects amounted to $47 billion last year.

In testimony to the committee, lobbyists stressed that the practice of petitioning the government is protected by the Constitution.

Dick Clark, a former Democratic senator from Iowa who now heads the Aspen Institute's congressional program, expressed support for some reforms on congressional travel. "However, a total ban on privately funded travel would be a disservice to members of Congress," he said in prepared testimony.

John Engler, a former Republican governor of Michigan who now is president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said, "Whatever occurs, it is imperative that you do not overreact."

Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, told the committee, "Members of our profession are as disgusted and appalled by what Mr. Abramoff has done as you are. But we should not allow the actions of a few unscrupulous operatives to paint our entire profession as 'crooks' or unscrupulous scoundrels who will stop at nothing to have their way with members of Congress."

Miller added in his prepared testimony: "Our government is not 'corrupt.' Lobbyists are not 'bribing' people; and members of Congress are not being 'bought' for campaign contributions. One man broke the law by lying, cheating and stealing from his clients. Unfortunately, he was a lobbyist."

He said he wanted to assure the panel that Abramoff was "not the norm in our profession," but "truly the exception." Any profession has "bad apples" no matter what rules are in place, he said.

"Unfortunately, we often find our bad apples on the front page of every newspaper, because frankly, scandal sells," Miller said.

DOJ_NMG_0011987

Earmark Reform Requires Oversight And Accountability (RC)

By Rep. Jerry Lewis

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

In the early morning hours, in a remote tribal area of Afghanistan, a gathering of al Qaeda leaders is interrupted by the explosions of Hellfire missiles launched from a Predator unmanned aerial vehicle. The UAV has become one of the most effective weapons in the global war against terrorism. Its development came not from war planners within the Pentagon, but from a Congressional earmark.

Some have suggested that Congressional earmarking should be eliminated. But this course of action cedes to the executive branch Congress' Constitutionally based spending prerogatives.

The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency. Teach for America, The Points of Light Foundation, and America's Promise are just a few examples of unauthorized, limited-scope initiatives that routinely receive a line-item request in the president's budget. Yet elected representatives know more about local, state or national priorities than the Beltway bureaucracy. It would be a mistake to ignore this expertise when determining how to allocate scarce federal dollars.

Another misguided proposal would give Member project funding the force of law by requiring all earmarks to be listed in statute. This would eliminate a federal agency's flexibility in allocating federal spending, particularly in time of national emergency or crisis, while doing nothing to improve the transparency and accountability of the appropriations process. Thoughtful, timely and orderly consideration of individual appropriations bills would be replaced by partisan one-upmanship. The increased delays would make it inevitable that Congress would revert to the fiscal mischief fostered by wrapping these bills into a massive end-of-session omnibus.

In 2005, House Republicans began taking tangible steps to restore accountability, increase transparency and reform the annual budget process. But few outside of Congress have taken notice of the considerable progress that's been made over the past year.

We reduced non-security discretionary spending for the first time since the Reagan administration, eliminating 53 low-priority programs and saving taxpayers more than $3.5 billion. We got our work done on time: The House passed all 11 individual appropriations bills by June 30, the earliest that each of the bills has been passed in 18 years. We reduced Congressional spending on Member requested projects by more than $3 billion.

Most importantly, this progress set the stage for an even larger success: eliminating, for the first time in years, a massive, year-end, omnibus spending bill. Just one year earlier, Congress wrapped nine appropriations bills into one colossal, 3,500-page spending package.

Though it's been less noticed, the committee also has taken positive steps toward strengthening transparency of the appropriations process by Webcasting all full-committee markups, requiring open House-Senate Conference Committee sessions and making Appropriations Committee conference reports publicly available at least one day prior to House consideration. Important progress was also made to ensure that an unprecedented degree of oversight is provided for taxpayer dollars spent on federal programs as well as necessary hurricane relief on the Gulf Coast.

These are critical first steps to reforming the budget process and restoring confidence in Congress. Unfortunately, this solid record of reform has been largely overshadowed by the criminal, self-serving actions of a few individuals who violated both the public trust and the law.

The next step involves further curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and making the appropriations process more open and transparent. In order to succeed, the House and Senate must jointly embrace these efforts. Specifically, the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee recommends the following:

1) Sharply limit the number of Member project requests. Curtailing the number of Member requests per Appropriations subcommittee would dramatically improve oversight and lead to a reduction of earmarks. Last year, the House Appropriations Committee received nearly 35,000 individual project requests. In the Labor-HHS appropriations bill, 417 Members requested 10,272 projects, or nearly 25 per Member.

DOJ_NMG_0011988

2) Require increased accountability, disclosure and transparency by requiring that Member request letters be made public prior to House consideration of each appropriations bill. These letters would be provided by the Members' offices to the Clerk of the House and printed in the Congressional Record.

3) Require that all project requests be submitted in writing to the appropriations subcommittee of jurisdiction via a Member-signed request letter or form.

4) Establish clearly defined criteria for all project requests and require Members to specify how each project meets the criteria. Member requests would also be required to be strictly germane to the spending bills in which they are contained.

5) Increase the proportion of projects that have a dollar-matching requirement. Economic development initiative grants from the Department of Housing and Urban Development are among those that ought to be considered for a local matching requirement.

6) Require all Congressionally approved projects to go through a formal executive branch contracting and auditing process.

7) Finally, require that all other committees adopt similar earmarking reforms. Earmarks are not unique to the House Appropriations Committee. The most notable earmark in recent history — the "Bridge to Nowhere" — had its origins elsewhere.

Senators Want Outsiders For Ethics Overhaul (LAT)

By Mary Curtius, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Convinced that Congress cannot overhaul its rules on ethics and lobbying in the politically charged atmosphere of an election year, two senators called Wednesday for the creation of an independent commission to do the job.

Sens. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said an outside panel was more likely to come up with a sweeping package of changes than a Congress riven by partisanship.

But their proposal faced quick resistance from two senators leading the reform push — Democrat Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Republican John McCain of Arizona. They have proposed legislation that would require lobbyists to provide more detailed reports about their contacts with lawmakers and other business activities.

Both said Wednesday that they feared creating an independent commission and that waiting for it to act would slow the momentum for change that had been building since former lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty this month to corruption charges.

"I don't want to wait," McCain told reporters. "We've got to act quickly."

The call for an independent panel also was likely to face opposition from Senate veterans who zealously guard the institution's prerogatives and are loath to allow outsiders to help drive its decision-making.

The commission proposal and the hurdles to it underscore the difficulties lawmakers face as they attempt to rewrite the guidelines that govern the dealings between themselves and lobbyists.

Proposals for tightening ethics and lobbying rules have proliferated in the House and Senate. They include measures that would ban trips by lawmakers and their aides that are financed by outside groups. GOP leaders of both chambers have vowed to push through an overhaul by the middle of the year.

Some members of Congress say the packages go too far, arguing the efforts to rein in travel would prevent them from getting firsthand information about domestic and international problems.

Others complain the reform proposals fail to address what they say are the roots of the problem spotlighted by the Abramoff case — private funding of campaigns and the common practice of lawmakers inserting money for pet projects and programs into government spending bills. Lobbyists offer help to lawmakers on both fronts.

Coleman said he believed the creation of an independent commission offered the best hope for Congress to grapple with such issues and to "overcome the stain" caused by the Abramoff scandal.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) said he supported the idea because it would provide "a whole lot more credibility" to the reform process.

DOJ_NMG_0011989

Only by bringing in outsiders to make recommendations, he said, could Capitol Hill achieve "real reform based not on political reaction but on what is best for the institution and best for the republic."

The proposal received no support from Senate leaders in either party, who engaged in their own squabble about how to proceed with carrying out reforms.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) offered to create a bipartisan task force with equal numbers of Democratic and Republican senators to rewrite ethics and lobbying rules — a proposal quickly rejected by Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Such a task force, Reid spokesman Jim Manley said, would hamper the process. "Legislating is hard work," Manley said. "We know what the problem is and we know what needs to be done. We should just do it."

Coleman and Nelson said the independent panel they wanted would be modeled on the commission appointed after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to investigate failings by the U.S. intelligence community. That panel, divided evenly between Democrats and Republicans, produced a report that spurred Congress to restructure the workings of intelligence-gathering agencies.

But former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission, noted that lawmakers rebuffed the panel's recommendations for reorganizing congressional oversight of the intelligence community.

"They didn't pay any attention to us at all," Hamilton said. "They reformed the executive branch, but on the whole question of robust oversight they just totally ignored those recommendations."

Hamilton, who served on the House Ethics Committee, said he believed Congress was incapable of policing itself. He advocates the creation of a permanent, independent commission to oversee congressional ethics, a proposal supported by some watchdog groups.

To be effective, Hamilton added, the commission would "have the power to initiate investigations, hold hearings, hear complaints and … make recommendations about punishment."

Lobby Battle Splitting Parties (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

House Democratic leaders are preparing to offer the toughest lobbying reform package yet, with a measure that would in some ways be more stringent than other bills offered so far.

On Wednesday, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.) circulated principles of the plan to their Democratic colleagues and asked for their support. Included in the measure will be provisions that force lawmakers to report when they are sponsoring earmarks, require them to pay fair market value for travel on private jets and create an office of public integrity to oversee these and other new lobbying rules.

Details of the plan emerged after a day in which lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol traded barbs, with each party claiming to want a bipartisan solution, but finding no partner across the aisle. Though the House isn't even in session yet, both chambers of Congress have been absorbed this month by responding to the scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Meanwhile, momentum appears to be growing for reforming the earmarking process. Beyond the new disclosure requirement House Democrats are planning to push, several GOP Senators on Wednesday expressed support for cracking down on the practice. And in an op-ed in today's issue of Roll Call, the spending chief of the House, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), laid out a plan for cleaning up the budget process (see Guest Observer, p. 8).

"The next step involves further curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and make the appropriations process more open and transparent," Lewis wrote.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is trying to round up as much bipartisan support as possible for his own plan, said he is adamant that some form of earmark reform be included in the bill as a way to get at the "root cause" of lobbyist corruption. "I'm going to fight as hard as I can to get it in," said McCain, who added Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) to his plan Wednesday.

Sen. Bob Bennett (Utah), a member of both the GOP leadership and the Appropriations Committee, expressed support for more "transparency" in lobbying reform, but he did not endorse a broad prohibition on earmarks. Bennett said he would support the idea of each earmark being identified with its sponsor and that each one appear in the Congressional Record.

DOJ_NMG_0011990

Wednesday's action kicked off in the Senate, where the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee convened in the morning for its first look at the lobbying reform proposals offered so far. At that event, bipartisanship was the buzzword, as Senators from both parties insisted that only cooperation would yield a solid solution to the systemic problems highlighted by the Abramoff scandal.

As the day wore on, however, the early détente on the politically charged issue began to disappear as both parties dug in their heels over the best way to move forward.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), in a letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), asked for the two leaders to agree to a bipartisan task force to develop any reforms. But Reid shot back by calling on Frist to instead assign the Homeland Security panel — led by Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) — to work on a bill he introduced that has already gathered wide support from Democrats.

"Lobbying and ethics reform should not be a partisan issue," Frist wrote Reid. "The rules apply equally to every Senator and every staffer, regardless of political party. The rules are bipartisan and the reforms should be bipartisan."

Reid said that instead of another task force to look into the chamber's ethics, the bipartisan Senate panel should consider his lobby reform bill, which has attracted 39 Democrats but no Republicans. Among other things, the measure calls for a ban on lobbyist travel and gifts.

With little agreement over how to proceed, it remained unclear Wednesday whether and how the Senate will move ahead.

As one GOP Senate aide characterized the hope of togetherness: "The Republican door is always open about working together on a bipartisan basis, even after Harry tossed a hand grenade into it."

Across the Capitol, the parties were no more friendly. House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.), the Member tapped by GOP leadership to lead the chamber's reform drive, is focusing on the "really good feedback" a spokeswoman said he has received from some Democrats, despite being rebuffed by several.

Among those unwilling to work with Dreier is his panel's ranking member, Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.). She said when the California Republican asked for her help constructing a reform package, she replied, "I don't see how you people can clean this up. I think it's our job.

"The people who got us into this swamp are not going to be able to get us out," she added. "This is, in my view, the worst scandal that has ever fallen on Congress."

Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said the Democrats' position is typical of their "just-say-no obstructionist tactics."

"For them, it is a partisan political exercise with the hopes of winning in November," he said.

Despite the partisan rancor, there were a few signs of bipartisanship. Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) teamed up to unveil a bill that would establish an independent commission to examine and report a range of reform proposals.

McCain dismissed that idea as taking too long, but he expressed hope for some new Democratic support on his own measure, indicating that his longtime partner in past reform efforts, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), may eventually come aboard his bill. "Russ and I will work things out. I am confident," he said.

And in the House, Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), himself a partner of McCain's from the fight to reform campaign finance laws, said that he thinks there is still room for the parties to work together.

"I think there are many Republicans and many Democrats who want to see Congress as a whole clean up its act," he said.

GOP Freezes Jobs List, A Vestige Of The K Street Project (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Republican lawmakers yesterday ended their long practice of routinely summoning lobbyists to the Capitol to try to persuade them to hire their aides and colleagues, in the wake of the Jack Abramoff political corruption scandal.

GOP lawmakers for years have regularly presented lists of job openings on K Street to lobbyists to encourage them to hire Republicans over Democrats. The program is a remnant of the K Street Project once championed by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.)

DOJ_NMG_0011991

as a way to coerce trade associations and companies to hire Republicans as their top lobbyists and to warn firms that hired Democrats that they would not be welcome.

Yesterday, the staff director of the Senate Republican Conference said that a K-Street-job-vacancies memo -- the heart of Congress's remaining involvement in the effort these days -- will no longer be distributed during high-level meetings hosted by the conference on Capitol Hill between lawmakers and lobbyists. Responsibility for the listings migrated from the House to the Senate several years ago, according to lobbyists.

While lobbyists and others could still obtain the information elsewhere, the change removes the formal involvement of lawmakers from the process and any implied encouragement by them to transform K Street into a Republican bastion.

In addition, the decision could provide a public relations benefit to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the conference head and the person who has long chaired the lobbyist meetings. He is facing a tough reelection fight this year that has been made even tougher by Democratic accusations that he is too close to lobbyists and the GOP's K Street jobs operation.

In recent years, the effort has become less aggressive and now includes in its non-congressional component a job listing service on the Internet.

Participants describe the meeting as an information exchange at which Santorum and other GOP senators discuss their priorities and collect intelligence from lobbyists. Toward the end of the meetings, which begin at 8:30 a.m. every other Tuesday, a representative of the Republican National Committee distributes the document that lists who in Congress is looking for work and what jobs are available. A discussion of jobs sometimes ensued.

Asked whether the document will continue to be passed out during those meetings, Mark D. Rodgers, the conference's staff director, said, "Since the RNC is already widely distributing the jobs list, we have decided it is duplicative to hand it out and will no longer do so." But Brian Jones, a spokesman for the RNC, said the data were not easily obtainable. "It's not public information," Jones said.

The decision to drop the list comes as Santorum is being disparaged by his opponents in Washington and at home as the "liaison to the K Street Project." Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) last week said Santorum is "as responsible as anyone in the world for the K Street Project." He added that Santorum was unsuited to serve in his current role as the Republicans' point man in the effort to overhaul lobbying laws.

Those sorts of assertions are "one of a series of problems" Santorum has in his race this year against Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., said Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan election analyst. "Santorum at the moment is the No. 1 most vulnerable Republican senator seeking reelection," Rothenberg added.

A Republican Conference aide said there is "no connection" between Santorum's meetings and the K Street Project, and Santorum has said that everything he has done in the meetings is appropriate. Last week, Santorum characterized the meetings as a way for Republicans to get their points of view disseminated in Washington.

"If you're going to affect public policy in a positive way, you've got to get your message out," Santorum said. "That's what the project that I've been involved with has been about, period."

Democrats have also been passing around jobs memos of their own during Monday meetings between lobbyists and congressional chiefs of staff. A spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said the "job bank" document -- as the Democrats called their listing -- has not been distributed for months and "there's no plan to put it back in place."

But Democratic attacks on Santorum and the K Street Project will continue, lawmakers said. Yesterday, Reid and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) wrote Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs, to ask for an investigation of the project. "What we seek to do is just shine a little sunlight on this K Street Project and have one of our committees investigate what happened so that we can see if there's legislation needed," Schumer said.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, said that he pioneered the project in the late 1980s and continues to urge companies and associations to hire free-market advocates via a Web site called the K Street Project. But when Democrats and others refer to the project, they speak more generally about the efforts of DeLay and his colleagues on Capitol Hill after the Republican takeover of the House in 1994. The House ethics committee privately warned DeLay in 1998 about threatening the Electronics Industry Alliance with retaliation for hiring a prominent Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0011992

Yesterday, Collins's committee held a hearing on lobbying legislation that highlighted the range of opinions Congress will have to bridge if it is to pass a bill that deals with abuses of travel, fundraising and other matters. Former senator Dick Clark (D-Iowa), director of the nonpartisan Aspen Institute Congressional Program, urged a ban on lawmakers' trips that include "in any way, shape or form the participation of lobbyists."

But John M. Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said information-gathering trips are essential for lawmakers. Private groups should be allowed to fund some of them, within ethical guidelines, he said.

Reform Talk May Spur Hill Exodus (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

Democrats and Republicans might not agree on all things lobbying, but they seem united on doubling the current one-year cooling-off period for newly minted advocates. And that has Congressional staffers, who already had an eye toward employment on K Street, stepping up their job-seeking efforts.

Lobbyists, headhunters and Capitol Hill aides speculate that a mini-exodus of staffers from both sides of the aisle may be coming as a result. The lobby ban may not be the only potential reform drawing staffers downtown, either. Congressional aides and lobbyists say that the ongoing discussion of other bans, or tougher restrictions, on free travel and entertainment will make working on Capitol Hill less appealing.

Nels Olson, managing director of the Washington, D.C., office for search firm Korn/Ferry International, said in recent days he's been fielding calls from Democratic and Republican Hill aides who are quickening the pace of looking for work downtown.

"For obvious reasons, there's been a heightened interest for those who were thinking about leaving anyways, about leaving potentially a bit earlier," Olson said. "There is some concern about the potential of their livelihood going forward. It tipped the balance toward leaving."

Olson said the volume of staffers looking to quickly jump ship is small for now, but "as the legislation moves forward, you could see a greatly increased number as it becomes more real."

Because discussion of staffers' future employment options tends to be deeply personal and secretive, most lobbyists and Congressional aides would talk only on the condition of anonymity. But in interviews with 24 high-level lobbyists and Congressional aides, it is clear that discussions about job opportunities off the Hill have increased as Members of Congress have stepped up their talk of tightening lobbying rules.

Steve Phillips, a partner at DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary and a former legislative director to then-Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), said he has heard from many staffers who are thinking about leaving the government payroll — fast.

"This has definitely expedited their decision-making process, no doubt about it," Phillips said. "They think their value is greatest now, whether that's real or perceived. We have definitely had a spike in conversations about this."

Ralph Hellmann, the chief lobbyist at the Information Technology Industry Council, said Hill aides were looking toward K Street even before Members began introducing reform measures after former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea in a bribery scandal earlier this month.

"This is now going to speed up that effort," Hellmann said. "The morale up there is awful."

A senior-level GOP leadership aide added, "I have heard some of my senior staff indicate that they would have to consider" leaving now because of the likelihood of reforms.

This longtime staffer added, "What does a two-year ban accomplish? ... So I'm going to be punished for something somebody else did? Do I really want to stay now for another year, and then tie my hands for an extra year" in the private sector?

The kind of travel experiences that could soon be eliminated, the staffer said, "are nice benefits to the job. It's going to get to the point where this just isn't a great place to work anymore."

Rich Gold, who heads the public policy group for Holland & Knight, said he, too, expects a rise in movement off the Hill.

"There's definitely going to be a swing, and not just on the two-year thing," Gold said. "I've definitely heard staff say if there's no travel, I'm out of here. It's one of the main things they love about the job."

DOJ_NMG_0011993

Gold said people don't take the jobs for the perks, but he added that those comforts have been part of the employment package of working for Members.

"It's the equivalent of somebody coming to me and saying we're no longer going to have the cafeteria in the basement and we're getting rid of parking spots," he said. "The folks work long hours and these were all the little things that made it bearable sometimes. If you don't think staff are telling Members that, you're mistaken."

A Democratic head of a lobbying practice said that some senior Republicans on the Hill have reached out to his firm, in some cases using the reform proposals as a starting point.

"A couple of them have said this whole thing, in their judgment, is out of control and they're going to start looking around. They're just perplexed and if they're talking about two-year bans, then they may go now," this lobbyist said.

House Republican Conference Chief of Staff Andrew Shore, who has already told his boss that he plans to head to the private sector, said impending reforms are not the reason why.

"It's not a factor that has played into my thinking," Shore said. "This is about my family."

A senior GOP aide said that while his colleagues are giving careful consideration to leaving before more expansive restrictions could take place, they won't jump for just any job.

"It's a double-edged sword," this staffer said. "People don't know that lobbying will be what it has been, so it might not be the same job that it has been. Most of the people I know have pretty high [salary] expectations and probably won't be met in this environment."

One Hill aide flat-out questioned why his colleagues would eye K Street in the current climate. "The industry is sort of tainted," he said.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, said that extending the one-year ban amounts to penalizing people for government service "and that's not fair."

Miller said he has personally heard from one senior staffer who told Miller that he was considering leaving the Hill because of the reforms.

Of course, there are at least a few people on K Street who think a two-year ban could be a good thing.

Juleanna Glover Weiss, a former aide to Vice President Cheney and a former Senate staffer, said a two-year ban might encourage people to stay in Hill jobs longer, enabling Congress to keep employing individuals who have significant experience in their area of expertise.

"The majority of staffers go up there because they want to make a difference," said Weiss, who lobbies at the Ashcroft Group. "They want to work in government, they want to do that job."

Trevor Potter, president of the Campaign Legal Center, said he supports expanding the cooling-off period to two years, and he hopes that and other new lobbying regulations take effect quickly — leaving little time for would-be lobbyists to line up new jobs on K Street.

"Congress is talking about doing something in the next couple of weeks, so it would seem to me to be unlikely that people would have enough time to go through the process" of finding a private-sector job, Potter said.

Under the current ban, former senior staffers aren't allowed to lobby their old offices, and ex-Members are barred from directly lobbying the entire Congress for one year. These budding lobbyists, though, can strategize and work issues from behind the scenes.

"I can tell you for an absolute fact that the year when people are banned is a year when some of them are unproductive," said a Democratic lobbyist.

Headhunter Olson said it's hard enough "for them to be sitting on the sidelines for a year. Two years is a long time."

And Michael Fulton, a lobbyist with Golin/Harris, said the former Congressional staffers "we have hired here view that one-year ban as practically an eternity."

But, he said, from the firm's perspective the ban isn't much of a hardship. "We don't sell access," Fulton said. "Our clients have all the access they need. We sell process, and timing and extra arms and legs and strategy and creativity."

Ivan Adler, a lobbyist headhunter for the McCormick Group, said that an extension of the lobbying ban would likely have zero impact on the salaries and job opportunities of former Members and senior-level Congressional aides. But expanded bans could deeply hamper junior and mid-level staffers, he said. “I think their value will go down because of their inability to reach out to a particular Member or committee,” Adler said.

DOJ_NMG_0011994

Of course, some existing lobbyists see the ban’s extension as good for their own business.

Stewart Van Scoyoc, who runs the firm Van Scoyoc Associates, said the two-year ban would give big firms like his an advantage when trying to lure people off the Hill because it will be more difficult for an ex-staffer to set up his or her own shop. Instead, they will need the extra resources of a firm. “We can absorb the cost,” he said.

One established GOP lobbyist said he was rooting for a 50-year ban to cut down on the competition. “I’m kidding,” he quickly added.

Dodd Out, Link In (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Larson Dodd Stewart & Myrick is now Larson Stewart Myrick and Link, with co-founder Quin Dodd having left after being appointed by President Bush to the Consumer Product Safety Commission and with the addition of veteran lobbyist and GOP congressional staffer James Link .

Link moves over the lobby shop from Fleischman and Walsh , bringing his clients, including Barcardi and some hospitals, according to Dave Larson . Larson Stewart has a roster of more than 30 clients, Larson said, including Fannie Mae and the Grocery Manufacturers Association.

Earlier, Link was deputy director of the Senate Republican whip's office, as well as an aide to then-Rep. Richard B. Cheney (R-Wyo.).

While the lobby shop is now all-GOP, Larson, a former health policy adviser to Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), said he is talking to some Democrats about joining the team. "We don't look at the party; we look at the person," he said.

Hammering Away (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Tex. -- Out here, where the tendrils of Houston's growing exurbs reach for open ground, sits Rio Bend, a cluster of new houses and other facilities for parents having difficult times with troubled foster children -- difficulties like those Tom and Christine DeLay experienced with several teenagers they took into their home. Rio Bend was built by the DeLays, with help from friends, of sorts.

She, an acerbic realist from south Texas, says more houses are planned by their charitable organization, but: "I hated to lose the leadership position because it helps me to raise money for those kids." Note her agreeably guileless acknowledgment that some friends of Rio Bend may not have been seized by simple altruism. She shares her husband's credo -- power is useful and should be used -- and knows the moral ambiguities it can involve.

He strides like a bantam rooster into the living room of one of the Rio Bend bungalows, having just been buoyed by an appreciative luncheon of 400 Realtors to whom he read a list of earmarks -- personally directed spending, aka pork -- he has delivered to his district. Most people, battered as he recently has been, would be curled up on the carpet in a fetal position. But DeLay is as direct and uncomplicated as the tool that supplies his nickname -- "The Hammer" -- and his faults do not include being a whiner.

Furthermore, he is not about to plea-bargain in the court of public opinion. He chafes under prudential reticence: His attorneys tell him not to trumpet the fact that the Justice Department told them he is not a target in the Jack Abramoff investigation. But about other matters, the bantam is belligerent.

Earmarks? Although recently "they got out of hand," they are, he says, necessary and proper because it is best to have spending dictated by a politician who knows his district's needs: "We are an equal branch of government -- why should we let a bureaucrat decide?" He says that in a state such as Illinois, which is dominated by Democrats "who play hardball," earmarks are the only way even House Speaker Dennis Hastert can get highway money spent in his district.

DOJ_NMG_0011995

The K Street Project? That is, getting interest groups to hire Republican lobbyists, and to make such hirings fruitful by transactions using, among other things, earmarks? The author of this insists: "I'm very proud of it." In 1994 "we were coming as a Republican majority into a Democratic culture" in Washington. For 40 years, he says, the media had hired people congenial to sources who controlled Congress. And K Street -- the lobbyists' habitat -- hired Democrats to ensure access to Democrats. K Street Republicans "never got to see John Dingell or [Dan] Rostenkowski," two Democratic chairmen of crucial committees.

So, DeLay asks: In 1995, what do you think Democratic-dominated K Street was interested in? "Helping us get our work done? Secure our majority?" Those are rhetorical questions.

DeLay's Democratic opponent this fall will be Nick Lampson, a former congressman who in 2004 lost his seat in another district, partly because of the redistricting DeLay engineered that resulted in five additional Republican seats. DeLay won in 2004 with only 55 percent of the vote, partly because he thought that "to set an example" he should consent to making his district more Democratic in order to make others less so.

Referring to his trial on campaign finance charges brought by a notoriously political Democratic prosecutor, DeLay says, with a confidence that might be misplaced but clearly is unfeigned, "I'll be acquitted by the end of April." Then he says he will secure a 12th term, winning "the most expensive congressional race ever ." The national Democratic Party and several liberal groups -- already running ads and phone banks -- spend, well, liberally.

Because undecided voters are thin here -- he estimates they are about 13 percent of the district -- this election will be about mobilizing the faithful. So the piling on by his critics -- their wretched excesses in response to what they perceive to be his -- may help him.

Congress under Republican control has increased earmarks 873 percent in a decade and validated the axiom that the more solicitous government becomes, the more servile it seems and the more scorn it receives. Congress has not been so unpopular since 1994, when Democrats lost their 40-year grip on the House. But here on the east bend of the Brazos River, unlike on the Potomac, the fever for reform is not high. To a visiting columnist who waxes censorious about earmarks for highway projects, DeLay responds with a notable lack of repentance: "You just drove out on one."

GOP Will Regain Trust (USAT)

By Roy Blunt

USA Today, January 26, 2006

House members cannot ignore recent scandals that have many questioning the credibility of our system.

Republicans will regain Americans' trust by enacting tough penalties for those who break the law and focusing on our agenda of limited government, personal responsibility and growing the economy by returning money to the Americans who earned it.

Lobbying reforms should include new rules governing travel and disclosure and regulations subjecting shadowy, tax-exempt "527" political groups to the same standards as others who attempt to influence the process. Then the credibility of honest public servants will be not be questioned — even when some try to paint them with the same brush as those who break the law.

I personally adhere to the strictest policy on Capitol Hill regarding interactions with lobbyists. I insist my staff does the same.

A top priority of mine is to retain and grow our Republican majority. I visited more than 100 congressional districts last campaign season. It's not glamorous, but it's important work that often puts me in three towns in one day. Private travel, in accordance with the law and House rules, has enabled me to reach multiple events for members, often in remote locations, in a single day.

Republicans, as we consider lobbying reform, will address proposals that would enhance the immediacy and transparency of disclosure — critical to the democratic process — and are another step in earning the American people's trust.

Rep. Roy Blunt, of Missouri, is House majority whip. He has been acting majority leader since September.

Proven Record (USAT)

By John Boehner

USA Today, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011996

House Republicans need leadership that will help provide a vision and a plan for renewal. We need a leader who will stand up to Democrats when they're wrong, but who has credibility to work with them when it's in the country's best interests.

I have a proven record of bringing together members of both parties to support bills rooted in Republican principles, such as stronger accountability, fiscal responsibility and greater competition. Recently, I managed a bipartisan overhaul of our nation's pension laws, strengthening worker retirement security and protecting taxpayers from a massive bailout of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. And when it comes to reform credentials, actions speak louder than words:

• I've never requested pork money for my Ohio district.

• I've never taken a dime from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

• Every trip I've taken has been within the rules.

• Every relationship I have with a contributor or a lobbyist is an ethical one.

In the early 1990s, I exposed the corrupt practices of the Democrat-controlled House and have worked ever since to strengthen ethics rules under the Republican majority.

As of now, I am the only candidate who has released a detailed plan that would help House Republicans regain the spirit and energy of 1994, embrace real reform and reclaim the vision responsible for our success.

Rep. John Boehner, of Ohio, is chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce and a former chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Looking For Mr. Clean? Not In This House Race. (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Republicans in the House of Representatives need a new leader and a new image.

The former majority leader, Tom DeLay, stepped down after he was indicted in a Texas fundraising case and linked to crooked lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

So where is the GOP seeking this fresh face and new start? With two lawmakers — Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio — who have cozy relations with lobbyists and a penchant for accepting perks from corporate friends.

A third candidate for majority leader, John Shadegg of Arizona, is less enmeshed with the lobbying establishment and high-powered fundraising. That's one reason he's given virtually no chance of winning. Politicians who don't raise big money and spread it around to colleagues don't often find themselves in line to be congressional leaders.

We don't presume to tell House Republicans which of their colleagues to pick when they vote next Thursday, but the public has a big stake in the outcome. The majority leader, second only to the House speaker on the leadership ladder, has a key role in setting Congress' agenda. DeLay, for example, was the driving force behind the impeachment of President Clinton.

The leadership race demonstrates how Congress' corrupt culture extends beyond DeLay and Abramoff. Those who rise to the top tend to be the smoothest practitioners of the system: corporate lobbyists provide money and perks to gain access and legislative favors, and lawmakers use the money to win campaigns and earn colleagues' fealty.

It's a seamy game Republicans certainly didn't invent, but one at which the two leading contenders for majority leader excel. Blunt and Boehner are both calling for changes, but it's hard to take them seriously when they're so much a part of the problem:

• Blunt, 56, is a DeLay protégé who came to Congress in 1997 and quickly learned that money paves the path to power. In the past decade, he has raised $9.2 million for his own campaigns, half of it from political action committees run by a who's who of business. He hardly needs the money: He clobbered opponents, taking 70% of the vote in 2004.

In November 2002, Blunt was involved in a particularly noxious episode: He quietly inserted a provision to benefit cigarette-maker Philip Morris in a bill on the verge of passage. When other House leaders discovered the provision, they got rid of it.

It was just the kind of thing that makes the public believe — with good reason — that Congress is for sale. Adding to the odor: One of Blunt's sons was a lobbyist for Philip Morris on Missouri state matters. And months later, Blunt married a lobbyist for Altria, Philip Morris' parent. A wedding present from colleagues: a waiver of House rules so he didn't have to disclose the gifts the couple received from lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0011997

Blunt also punched another leadership ticket. Since 1999, he has raised $4.7 million and doled most of it out to colleagues facing tougher election battles. He campaigns for them, often on private jets loaned by friendly corporations. That, too, is legal under House rules.

• Boehner, also 56, came to Congress in 1991 in a class of reformers. As one of the "Gang of Seven," he pushed the House to name names in one of that era's scandals — a House bank that let members overdraw their accounts.

Since then, however, Boehner has grown comfortable with Congress' looser ways. In 1995, he distributed campaign checks from tobacco-run political action committees to colleagues on the House floor — an event so unseemly it made headlines. He has cultivated lobbyists, raised $14.3 million for himself and colleagues and avails himself of one of Congress' favorite perks. Since 2000, Boehner has taken $157,000 worth of "fact finding" trips, many to resorts and European capitals, paid for by special interests and non-profit groups — the 9th highest ranking in Congress.

As chairman of the House committee that oversees students' loan program, he has forged close ties with industry giant Sallie Mae. Since 2002, Sallie Mae executives have given $132,000 to a Boehner political committee, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Meanwhile, with help from Congress and taxpayers, Sallie has prospered.

To his credit, Boehner has consistently opposed "earmarks," legislative favors that lobbyists love, and he voted last year against the pork-laden highway bill.

Both Blunt and Boehner have one point right: Voters are clamoring for change. That requires recognition of what's wrong and the will to do something about it. Lawmakers who've spent their careers accepting perks and raking in special-interest campaign cash don't make for credible reformers.

Message Efforts May Boost The Messenger (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

With President Bush and Republicans struggling to regain their standing in public opinion as Senate Democrats hammer away daily at every perceived foible or folly committed by the ruling majority, one man has made it his mission to strike back.

Over the past year, Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) has become a self-appointed public relations man for Republicans in Congress and the White House, filling a communications void that has developed in the Senate GOP leadership.

“I saw it as addressing this quick-response need that I don’t think we had been set up for before, and really didn’t need before the Democrats created their war room,” said Cornyn, referencing Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid’s (D-Nev.) highly effective press operation. “It’s not enough to come back later on, a week later, two weeks later, and respond. ...

A charge unrebutted is a charge believed.”

A veteran of the Texas Supreme Court, Cornyn will undoubtedly have a high profile this week during Senate deliberations over Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito, reprising a role he has frequently played in the highly partisan judicial confirmation battles of the past few years.

Cornyn hasn’t limited himself to judicial battles, however, expanding his scope in recent months to lead an aggressive effort among his colleagues in directing staff to send out partisan press releases, opposition research papers and talking points reacting to just about every major policy issue and every major Democratic attack that is made in the Senate, and sometimes in the House.

His efforts include issuing rebuttals to Democrats speaking on the Senate floor even before the Member in question has finished his or her remarks, as well as releases pointing out inconsistencies in the Democratic message and noting when Democrats backtrack on previous statements.

But the role Cornyn is filling may be about more than party loyalty. He’s also running against Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) for the low-profile but still influential post of vice chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, which just happens to be the No. 2 “message” position.

“I’m just trying to do as good of a job that I can do, and if people think that is a benefit to the Conference and would benefit by having me in their vice chair position, then so much the better,” said Cornyn in a recent interview.

Others acknowledge that Cornyn’s PR strategies are putting him in a good position to win the vice chairman race.

DOJ_NMG_0011998

"Obviously, that's one of the things that I think he can point to," said current Senate Republican Conference Chairman and top Conference message man Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.).

Even Ensign concedes that he thinks "John would do a good job in leadership," but added, "I offered myself up to my colleagues, and if they think I'll do a better job, then I hope they'll support me."

Careful to stress he is not criticizing the current Senate GOP leadership, Cornyn said he thinks he fills "a niche" more than a void in the GOP message operation.

But other Republicans said a gap in messaging definitely existed, particularly prior to the creation last week by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) of a rapid response "peace room" intended to counter Reid's war room.

"Clearly, he does fill a void. He's willing to go out there and do the press work when other Members are busy with other things," said one Senate GOP leadership aide.

There has been no lack of evidence that the Senate GOP leadership has appeared to be without a rudder in its message efforts prior to last week's unveiling of the peace room.

Most notably, Santorum has been scheduling fewer GOP agenda and message events since last year while he concentrates on a tough re-election battle back home.

Frist, never regarded as a dynamic public speaker, has been dealing with legal and ethical questions surrounding his decision to sell stock in a health care company owned by his family. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and Senate Republican Policy Committee Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) often shy away from media appearances, and both are known to have a distaste for dealing with the press.

That leaves current Vice Chairman Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), who as the lowest-ranking member of the leadership team doesn't yet command major media attention.

Santorum has "done a pretty good job at messaging," noted one senior Senate Republican staffer. "But with all his attention focused on his own re-election bid, it doesn't seem that we have many members of the leadership that are willing to step in and fill that vacuum."

Santorum acknowledged that he has been somewhat distracted by his campaign, but said, "I think I still do a fair amount." But he praised Cornyn's efforts.

"I'm constantly asking him to go out [to do message events], because he's so good," Santorum said. "I'm always recruiting him, in addition to the work he does on his own."

And even with the advent of the peace room, Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said Cornyn's efforts would continue to be welcomed and encouraged.

"Sen. Cornyn is such an active voice for the Republican Conference that there will always be a need for him," Call said.

Over the past few months Cornyn has taken a lead in scoring points for the GOP in debates over reauthorization of the anti-terrorism USA PATRIOT Act, controversy over Bush authorizing the National Security Agency to spy on Americans without a warrant, lobbying and ethics reform, and the war in Iraq.

On Iraq, Cornyn said he felt the need to defend the Bush administration from Democratic attacks on the president's policies.

"I'm not the first one to observe this, but I don't think the administration was doing a very good job of defending its policies or successes in Iraq," Cornyn said. "My attitude is, Republicans are all in this together When the president does well, we do well. When the president doesn't do well in terms of public opinion, we don't tend to do as well."

Cornyn also has gone after Senate Democrats' decision last week to release a report questioning the ethics of 33 Republican Senators.

"It's beyond ironic that in an attempt to smear the ethics of others, the Democrat 'war room' chose to use taxpayer-funded staff and equipment to compile a blatantly political attack on Republican Senators," Cornyn said in a release that was widely publicized because it was one of the few GOP responses to the Democratic attack. Reid subsequently apologized for the tone of the report.

DOJ_NMG_0011999

Still, Democrats don't appear to be taking Cornyn's efforts lightly. Just this week, a war room press release accused Cornyn of blindly following the administration's talking points when he accused Democrats of supporting "special rights for those who are suspected of plotting terrorism."

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) called some of Cornyn's criticisms of Democrats "hyperbolic" and reiterated that Democrats view him as simply an extension of the White House press office.

"He has been acknowledged to be very closely linked to the White House press operation," Durbin said.

Despite such criticism and regardless of whether he is elected Conference vice chairman, Cornyn shows no sign of stopping. "I'm happy to help whether I'm in the leadership or not," he said.

Just In Time For Valentine's Day (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

All of them were laughing, some were horrified and a few were undoubtedly secretly delighted. When they found their boss' name on the front of thongs for sale on the Internet, aides to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) couldn't keep it a secret.

"This is just bad," read the subject line of an e-mail from one Reid staffer to another. The missive, which eventually wound up in HOH's inbox, had a link to a Web site selling "I [heart] HARRY REID" thongs for $15.99.

"Panty-minimalists love our casual thong that covers sweet spots without covering your assets — putting an end to panty-lines," the online retailer, cafepress.com, boasts. "This under-goodie is 'outta sight' in low-rise pants. Toss these message panties onstage at your favorite rock star or share a surprise message with someone special ... later."

Hmmm. Harry Reid thongs being tossed at a rock star? Impressing your boyfriend with the notion that you love Harry Reid and keep him in a very special place, not just in your heart? For goodness sakes, what is Mrs. Reid going to think?

Reid aides wouldn't dare go there. And none would admit whether she (or he) would be ordering a Harry Reid thong. But one aide, giggling as she asked that her name not be used, said, "We're just happy Sen. Reid's popularity stretches across all types."

HOH agrees with the other Reid aide: This is just bad!

Oui, ou Non? Will he, or won't he? We're talking about the newly appointed chairman of the House Administration Committee and the question, of course, is: Will he change freedom fries back to french fries?

Everyone is dying to know, but Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) is keeping tight-lipped about how he'll handle the trés, trés delicate issue, now that Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), the creator of freedom fries, has been forced out as chairman of the panel that oversees Capitol Hill eateries.

It seems like ages ago that Ney banned the term "french" from the menus in response to France's opposition to the Iraq war. A masterful move that accomplished, well, absolutely nothing as far as we can tell. So now, with the drumbeat of reform resounding throughout the land, the torch is Ehlers' and fries, be they freedom or french, are his responsibility.

Speculation is running rampant, especially on the House side, where the Rayburn cafeteria may be the only place where fries are still listed on the menu as "freedom fries." One House GOP aide said "anyone named Vern is sure to know his way around a potato farm," so he'd be happy to defer to the new chairman. "If there is a change, I think that Vern's spud fries will now be readily available in all Hill cafeterias much to the disappointment of [Sen.] John Kerry (D-Mass.) and other French loyalists."

Ehlers spokesman Jon Brandt won't say which way his boss is tilting on the freedom/french spectrum. And HOH got the feeling that he didn't want to be bothered with such nonsense, though, let's face it, Ehlers' predecessor made it a serious issue.

"The bottom line is, it is not one of our top priorities ... and it's not anything we're going to be dealing with in the near future," Brandt told HOH. "We have many other items on the agenda that are going to need to be dealt with over the near course. This is not one of the things that's on our front burner."

No pun intended.

Still the One. Despite a recent spate of bad publicity, Vice President Cheney is still a big draw for GOP fundraising.

The vice president is slated to be the headline attraction this evening at a fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). Anyone can attend for a simple $1,000. But the most generous donors may have a picture snapped with the veep: Going for that

DOJ_NMG_0012000

"max out" opportunity before Ohio's primary in May, the DeWine re-election campaign is charging political action committees $5,000 per photo op.

The fun starts at 5 p.m. at the Capitol Hill Club.

Sen. Clinton: Bush Ignoring Needs Of US Cities (REU)

By John Whitesides

Reuters, January 26, 2006

Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused the Bush administration on Wednesday of ignoring the needs of cities in its politically driven zeal for tax cuts and told U.S. mayors "you are on your own."

Clinton, a potential White House candidate in 2008 who is seeking Senate re-election this year in New York, said that since the September 11 attacks President George W. Bush had reneged on his obligation to states and cities to pay for crucial security and social programs.

"Across the board, federal budget cuts are leaving states and cities struggling to make up the difference," Clinton told a meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

"We know the money is going to tax cuts," she said, adding those cuts are desirable in the right political and economic climate but "it is hard to square with the challenges we face at this time of terrorist threat."

At the federal level, "the sense of urgency that marked the months after the 9/11 attacks has largely given way to politics as usual," she said.

Bush's message in his State of the Union speech to the U.S. Congress next week "can be summed up in three words: on your own. We are shifting costs and we are shifting risks onto individuals and families and local governments," she said.

"Mayors, you are on your own to protect your cities," she added.

Clinton's comments were the latest in a series of blasts at Bush in recent weeks. She said earlier this month his presidency would "go down in history as one of the worst" and accused him last week of playing down the Iranian threat.

Talking to reporters after her speech, she criticized Bush's defense of the legality of his domestic surveillance plan, saying "their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after al Qaeda is far-fetched."

In an indirect reference to her husband, former President Bill Clinton, she told the mayors Bush had squandered the federal budget surpluses of five years ago.

She said Bush had slashed community development block grants, school improvement funds, Medicaid and foster care while not delivering the money to hire, train and equip local emergency and security personnel.

"There is hardly a program that is part of the social safety net that hasn't been slashed," Clinton said.

Hillary Has A Wobble Over Wal-Mart Days (Daily News)

By Michael McAuliff

Daily News, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Hillary Clinton easily pointed at Wal-Mart yesterday as not doing enough about health care but found it a little tougher when asked if she had ever suggested the retailer do more when she was on its board of directors.

"Well, you know, I, that was a long time ago, I have to remember," she stammered, before pointing to her work on health care while First Lady.

She sat on the Wal-Mart board from 1986 to 1992. Her spokesman insisted it's "a very different company now."

Many Faces Of Hillary -- None A Winner (LAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

LIBERALS ARE sizing up Hillary Clinton for the umpteenth time, and they don't like what they see.

To be honest, I never understood what they saw in her in the first place. The amazing thing about Clinton is that she's so unappealing. She isn't a particularly gifted speaker. She's smart, but in a conventional and lawyerly way. She doesn't connect well with audiences. Her idea of improvisation seems to be leaping from the prepared text to prepared note cards.

DOJ_NMG_0012001

However, she has defied the rules of nature and gotten better looking over the years, which, along with her soap-opera marriage, probably explains some of her success with supermarket checkout-aisle publications.

Indeed, her greatest success has been at exploiting expectations others have for her. For some fans, she was the struggling career woman who could bring home the bacon. For some detractors, she was "Lady MacBeth," cold and calculating in an obviously political marriage. She was also the apotheosis of the 1960s, for friends and foes alike. For the Children's Defense Fund crowd, she was the baby boomer idealist who worked her way through the system. For the American Spectator gang, she was the former Black Panther sympathizer and acolyte of Chicago radical Saul Alinsky who finally achieved power. After the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Hillary — who was no stranger to her husband's weaknesses — suddenly became the victim in a culture with a fetish for victims.

At every turn, Hillary Clinton's Zelig-like public persona has been a fabrication — either by her fans, her enemies or herself. One telling episode came when she published her massively successful autobiography, "Living History." The book tour was nothing short of a coronation, confirming her gravitas and commitment to "the issues." She portrayed herself as resigned to the fact that she'd have to answer Barbara Walters' questions about her personal life, but she always made it seem like she'd rather wrestle with the hard issues of public policy. But when the Washington Post actually tried to ask her about something other than how she cried over her husband's sexcapades with an intern, the senator from New York "declined to be interviewed about the political content of her book."

Hillary Clinton's latest reinvention paints her as a moderate, even an Iraq war hawk. Few people buy it. Reporters regularly assume her motives are opportunistic rather than sincere, focusing on how every pronouncement will position her for the 2008 presidential race. National Public Radio's Mara Liasson, for example, recently observed, "She certainly sees it in her interest to get to the right of the president on many issues, especially in the area of national security."

Whatever the reason, some liberals have had enough. "I will not support Hillary Clinton for president," wrote Molly Ivins, the voice of conventional thinking on the left. "Enough. Enough triangulation, calculation and equivocation. Enough clever straddling, enough not offending anyone." The segment of Democrats who sanctified Cindy Sheehan can hardly countenance a presidential candidate who unapologetically voted for the war and positioned herself to the right of President Bush on foreign policy.

The New Republic offers perhaps an even more devastating critique of Clinton for Democratic pragmatists: She can't win. Marisa Katz dismantled the myth that Clinton can appeal to "red state" voters because she won in upstate New York. Turns out former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry each did better in upstate New York than she did. And Gore, a Southerner, couldn't even win his home state of Tennessee. Meanwhile, a recent Gallup poll showed that 51% of Americans won't even consider voting for Clinton.

All of this could change. But there's a great irony here. Hillary Clinton's success over the last decade and a half has been in pretending to be her own woman while really playing one part or another for the benefit of the media, her husband or various feminist constituencies desperate for a role model to confirm all of their comfortable stereotypes.

That's why there's something oddly satisfying in the possibility that Clinton being herself is politically disastrous. And, if she's really just playing one more role according to some classically Clintonian political triangulation, there's something equally satisfying to the prospect that even her fans aren't falling for it anymore.

Obey Seeks Public Financing Debate (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

For the record, Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) doesn't have anything nice to say about Jack Abramoff: "He's a leech and a parasite on the system, and for the life of me I don't even know what he delivered for anyone."

But Obey, a Capitol Hill veteran who's played a prominent role in four decades worth of debates over Congressional ethics, thinks the legislative response to the Abramoff scandal is missing the point entirely.

"Right now, this is going to come down to who's got the tighter limits on trips, or who's got the tighter limits on meals. With all due respect, I don't care what happens with either one of those," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0012002

The real issue, Obey says, is the source of campaign funds.

"In general elections, there should not be a dime of private money," he said.

To that end, Obey is joining with Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to propose full public financing of all House elections. They announced Wednesday that they will introduce the plan, which would bar all candidates from fundraising and self-financing in their campaigns, when the House reconvenes next week.

"Instead of dialing for dollars, Members could actually be in their committees, learning what their bills would actually do," Obey said. "You could actually have a Congress that's 50-50 between politics and legislating. Right now it's 90 percent politics and 10 percent legislating."

Many Congressional Democrats have long embraced the principle of public financing — House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), for instance, is a longtime backer of the idea — and Obey has pushed similar plans in the past. But concern that the public would be uneasy with the idea of taxpayer money going to political campaigns, lampooned as "welfare for politicians" by Republicans in the past, consistently undercut Democratic efforts to push such plans in the years before they lost their House majority. And it seems unlikely that even many of Obey's Democratic colleagues will be cheering his new proposal.

While freeing Members from the pressures of raising money, Obey's plan would radically curtail the financial advantage most incumbents now enjoy, even making it difficult for some of them to pay for television ads. And even if Democrats were to unite behind it, the prospect on a vote in the GOP-controlled House is less than remote.

"I didn't offer this because people would flock to it and swoon," Obey, the ranking member on the Appropriations Committee, said. "I'm introducing it so we can expand the discussion."

Beyond that, the plan also faces an almost certain constitutional hurdle, in the form of the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision that equated campaign spending with free speech.

Under the Obey-Frank plan, citizens would voluntarily contribute to the "Grassroots Good Citizenship Fund" through a "check-up" — as opposed to the current check-off that helps fund the presidential public financing system — on their federal tax return. The Federal Election Commission would then allocate funds to each of the 435 Congressional districts, based on median family income. The wealthiest districts would be allocated about $1.5 million, and the poorest about $750,000. Within each district, the money would then be distributed to general election candidates in direct relation to each party's showing in the previous two elections; if the Democrats have averaged 60 percent, their candidate would get 60 percent of the money.

The program would be mandatory for all candidates, and spending by any outside groups would be barred. Candidates would also be prohibited from opting out and dipping into their own wallets to finance their races. State and national parties could only contribute money, goods and services equal to 5 percent of their candidate's expenditure cap.

The rules would apply to general elections only, and not primaries.

Far from protecting incumbents, a criticism leveled at some of his past public financing efforts, Obey notes that the plan would increase the bankrolls of challengers in more than 80 percent of districts. He said it's more than enough money for candidates to run credible campaigns, but Members who equate a strong campaign with television saturation might not agree.

For instance, the 5th and 13th districts in New Jersey both sit in the New York media market, where airtime is pricier than anywhere else in the country. The wealthy, suburban 5th (median income: $72,781) would likely be eligible for the full $1.5 million. Once divvied up, that could be enough for both candidates to finance modest television campaigns. But that might not be the case in the gritty 13th (median income: $37,129). By the same token, the cash allocated to Nebraska's impoverished 3rd district, home of the poorest county in America, might be enough to flood the comparatively cheap airwaves there.

And limiting the program to the general election could produce an unbalanced playing field, not to mention some significant loopholes. Incumbents in safe Democratic or Republican districts might not find much relief from the pressures of fundraising, since the main threat to their re-election is usually the primary — not the November election. And multimillionaires would be able to indirectly pay their way into office, if their money was enough to win a primary, especially in a district where their party is the favorite in the fall.

Obey warned against nit-picking, stressing that his goal is to launch a debate about real reform, saying, "I've been doing this a long time and I've heard every doggone argument against everything that everyone's said."

DOJ_NMG_0012003

He also has an answer to the constitutional questions about the plan. In its 1976 ruling, he said, the court left the door open for the kind of regulation he's proposing — if it was necessary in order for Congress to protect itself. As such, Obey is including in the legislation a Congressional finding that brands the current campaign finance system "a fundamental threat to the integrity of the national election process."

That, he said, might be enough for the court to reconsider Buckley v. Valeo. And if it doesn't, the legislation also calls for "expedited consideration" of a constitutional amendment.

"I don't anticipate anyone's action," Obey said. "This comes from my gut and Barney's gut. Both of us have some goals. We're trying to get people to focus on the fundamentals."

House Republicans To Get Presentation On 'Suburban Agenda' (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

A different kind of agenda — different from the president's State of the Union address and the anticipated Democratic election year document — is scheduled to be unveiled early next month to House Republicans: "The Suburban Agenda."

It's the work of a group of 22 GOP Members from across the party's ideological spectrum and led by moderate Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who's also tried to sell it to President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

Instead of a laundry-list policy agenda, Kirk told me in an interview, this agenda is designed to answer the problems faced by a suburban family as it moves through its day.

Kirk represents Chicago's northern suburbs, and other members of the "suburban strategy caucus" represent the suburbs of such cities as New York, Philadelphia, Seattle, Cleveland, Atlanta and Denver.

There's clearly strategic political intent behind trying to build the 2006 GOP legislative strategy around the suburbs: More than half of U.S. voters live in the 'burbs, and these places, formerly Republican strongholds, have been trending Democratic in recent years.

As Fred Barnes pointed out in the Weekly Standard earlier this month, what Kirk calls the "inburbs" of major cities — as opposed to the more-distant exurbs — are increasingly Democratic.

Kirk's district was represented in the 1960s by current Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and for two decades by GOP Rep. John Porter. Kirk carried it with 64 percent of the vote in 2004 — far better than the 47 percent President Bush won in the district.

In the 2005 Virginia gubernatorial race, Democrat Tim Kaine won the close-in Washington, D.C., suburbs of Arlington, Alexandria and Fairfax by huge margins.

Of the 14 districts held by GOP representatives but carried by Democratic nominee John Kerry (Mass.) in 2004, virtually all are suburban. At the same time, there are 12 suburban districts held by Democrats that Bush carried. So it's not a stretch to say that suburban voters will decide who controls the House after this year's elections.

Kirk and others in the suburban caucus are scheduled to make the case for their agenda at the House GOP Members' retreat Feb. 9, which follows leadership elections Feb. 1.

Kirk had 20 issues of concern to suburbanites tested in his district and rated by GOP pollster John McLaughlin. McLaughlin is currently in the field with a more sophisticated poll of other suburbs to determine, for example, whether voters are willing to pay for proposals in the package.

At the end of the day, there is a "laundry list" of proposals — "20 defining issues to win the suburbs and keep our Republican majority," Kirk calls it. But he insists that he got there simply by tracing a day in suburbia.

"You wake up in the morning and you might turn on the radio and hear about Iraq and the war on terror and you want it solved, but then you think, 'OK, I've got to get to work,'" Kirk said.

"'How long does it take to get there? Am I going to drive by strip malls the whole way? Can't we have more open space?'" McLaughlin found that 83 percent of Kirk's constituents support limits on the lawsuits that delay Superfund environmental cleanups. Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) is the caucus' open spaces presenter.

DOJ_NMG_0012004

"I get to work," Kirk continued. "The average American has five jobs in a working life. If I switch, I don't want to be left high and dry without health insurance. Current COBRA regs allow me to pay for only 18 months of coverage? Why not indefinite?"

Portability of health insurance and expansion of health savings accounts got overwhelming support in McLaughlin's poll. Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) is the caucus expert in that area.

"Meanwhile, my kids went to school. My wife has probably looked up to see whether there's a pedophile in our neighborhood, but why shouldn't our school district be able to pay the federal government $50 to background check on new teachers and coaches?

"Also, the suburbs have an increased presence of youth gangs. In my district, Lake County, the 16th wealthiest in the country, has identified 3,000 members of international gangs. Why shouldn't the federal Bureau of Alchohol, Tobacco and Firearms not also be the Bureau of Gangs to help localities?

"We also need to clarify the 4th Amendment, so that privacy rights do not extend to school lockers, to make sure there are no weapons or drugs in school." Rep. Dave Reichert (Wash.), former sheriff of King County (Seattle), is the caucus' lead advocate on youth crime, which is also a theme of first lady Laura Bush.

Other items on the suburban agenda include a federal requirement that all medical records be made electronic by a certain date and a "401-Kids" tax-benefited savings plan allowing parents to set up accounts that children could use for purposes other than college tuition, which is now covered by 529 plans.

Kirk's poll found strong support for several kinds of tax credits — for first-time homebuyers, for computers and tutors for children and for new-career training for adults. Respondents also favored eliminating the estate tax.

Significantly, the entire suburban agenda has not been costed-out and matched against the Republicans' stated goal of closing the federal budget deficit.

The agenda is designed to keep Republicans in power, but many of the items — electronic health records and anti-gang measures, for sure — ought to be bipartisan. It wouldn't be surprising if there's a bidding war for the support of the suburbs.

Postal Service Goes On Offensive In Fight With Senators Over System To Set Mail Rates (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The U.S. Postal Service headquarters launched a blitz yesterday to block a Senate bill, contending that the legislation, in combination with White House demands, could trigger a 20 percent increase in stamp prices in the near future.

The bill's sponsors, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), said they were "outraged that the Postal Service would mislead senators." In a statement, they said, "Nothing in the bill would lead to rate increases."

Government agencies rarely risk incurring the wrath of committee chairmen who oversee their operations, as is the case with Collins. As head of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, she has made the overhaul of postal operations one of her priorities.

Her bill would create a system of setting mail rates that she believes would give the post office greater pricing flexibility and would prevent it from raising rates each year in excess of inflation as measured by the consumer price index.

The Postal Service faces a bleak future if e-mail and Internet services continue to expand and erode first-class mail volume. Although the post office has stabilized its finances in recent years, efforts continue to reduce labor costs and consolidate operations.

As the word spread this week that Collins planned to bring her bill to the Senate floor, postal officials distributed a letter from the postal Board of Governors reaffirming the board's objections to the proposed overhaul, the first in more than 30 years.

Yesterday, postal officials stepped up their effort to block the bill, contacting Senate staff members and providing each Senate office with a copy of the board's objections.

"We need meaningful reform, and this is not it," Tom Day , senior vice president for government relations, said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0012005

Senate leaders plan to bring the Collins bill to the floor for speedy approval, called unanimous consent, that does not require a roll-call vote. Postal lobbyists were on the hunt for a senator who would object to the maneuver and put a hold on the bill.

The House has approved a postal overhaul, and once the Senate clears the Collins bill, it will go to a House-Senate committee that will reconcile differences between the two versions. The White House has announced opposition to any compromise that would increase the federal deficit.

Postal officials fear that a compromise bill could leave it on the hook for two major financial obligations and would allow postal regulators to intrude on internal operations and override business decisions.

Day said mail rates could soar by as much as 20 percent if Congress and the White House agreed to extend a 2003 law that requires the post office to pay for military retirement benefits earned by employees before their postal careers, and if the post office also is ordered to prepay health benefits for employees in the Civil Service Retirement System. Such costs are usually covered by the Treasury Department, using taxpayer dollars.

In the worst scenario, he said, the post office would have no choice but to keep raising postal rates, which would set off a "death spiral."

Although the Postal Service has worked with Congress and the White House on proposals to overhaul operations, Day said postal concerns over accountability and management control have been in contention since 1996.

Collins and Carper, however, said, "We are extremely troubled and disappointed that at the very last minute, the Postal Service is attempting to block action on our bill."

They added, "It is ironic that the Postal Service -- which has been forced to raise rates four times in five years because of its inability to control its costs and respond to the new economic landscape -- is accusing us of putting the health of the postal system at risk."Helping Enrollees

Two House members wrote the Office of Personnel Management yesterday to "strongly urge . . . seamless health care coverage" for enrollees in the discontinued Postmasters Benefit Plan.

OPM dropped the plan Monday from the federal health insurance program because of concerns about its financial solvency and management.

Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Jon Porter (R-Nev.), who oversee civil service matters, asked OPM to provide information on whether benefit counselors will be made available to affected employees and what steps will be taken to ensure that the enrollees do not experience a break in coverage.

OPM has said it will move enrollees into the Blue Cross and Blue Shield standard option unless individuals opt for a different plan.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

'Nightline' accused

The Federalist Society yesterday called on ABC to investigate a report by its news show "Nightline" that suggested Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia had done something unethical by participating in a legal seminar sponsored by the group.

"The report grossly misled viewers about a recent trip Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia took to teach a 10-hour course on the Constitution and separation of powers. 'Nightline' suggested that Justice Scalia's trip was a 'judicial junket,' and even strained to manufacture a link with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff," Federalist Society President Eugene B. Meyer said in a letter yesterday to ABC News President David Westin.

The program, which aired Monday, emphasized that Justice Scalia had missed the September swearing-in of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. because of his commitment to attend the legal seminar at a Colorado resort, suggesting that the jurist spent most of his time playing tennis and engaging in other frivolous pursuits.

"Rather than taking a recreational trip with hours of tennis and going fly-fishing, as ABC would have its viewers believe, Justice Scalia was honoring an agreement made nearly a year in advance with the Federalist Society to teach a serious scholarly program to more than 100 lawyers from 38 states that required considerable work and advance preparation," Mr. Meyer said in his letter.

DOJ_NMG_0012006

"Prior to the course, Justice Scalia produced a 481-page course book that attendees were expected to review in advance. The course was approved by at least 30 state bars for most of the attending lawyers' continuing education requirements. Justice Scalia was there to share his knowledge and experience and received only reimbursement for travel and lodging."

As reported in this column yesterday, the ABC program strained to link Justice Scalia to disgraced lobbyist Abramoff, saying the jurist attended a cocktail reception partly funded by a legal and lobbying firm where Mr. Abramoff once worked.

"We call on ABC to launch an independent investigation into the circumstances surrounding the development and production of this story," Mr. Meyer said.

Ney seeks re-election

Undaunted by speculation within his own party that he may have to quit Congress because of a corruption probe, Rep. Bob Ney announced yesterday he's running for re-election.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign, and I am ready for the fight," said Mr. Ney, Ohio Republican. He planned to hold his first formal campaign event today.

Mr. Ney's popularity has hardly dimmed in his expansive rural district even after he was identified in disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea as the central figure in Abramoff's scheme to bribe members of Congress, the Associated Press reports.

Spanish response

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will give the Spanish-language response to President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, Democratic congressional leaders announced.

Mr. Villaraigosa has been seen as a rising Democratic star since his election in May as the first Hispanic in 133 years to lead Los Angeles, the country's second-largest city. He will deliver his remarks from his Los Angeles office, said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

The Democrats' English-language response will be given by newly inaugurated Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine.

New name, game

An advocacy group that fought President Bush's Social Security reforms and Republican efforts to cut entitlement spending is now changing its name and going after Republicans on corruption charges.

Americans United to Protect Social Security -- an umbrella organization for about 200 liberal advocacy groups -- is retooling as Americans United. "We are shortening our name and expanding our scope," the group said yesterday in announcing a $1 million ad campaign focusing on the legal troubles of various Republicans, including Rep. Tom DeLay and lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The National Republican Congressional Committee noted the change and said Democrats are outsourcing their agenda. "National Democrats are at it again," read an NRCC statement. "Before Thanksgiving, they punted on presenting voters with their agenda for 2006. Now, they are hiding behind a shadow group that can accept unlimited donations to advance Democrat ideals, whatever those are."

Gloomy prognosis

Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell says the United States is losing its edge in the global economy and needs to spend $100 billion to recover its advantage, reports Donald Lambro of The Washington Times.

Mr. Rendell, the Democratic Governors' Association's finance chairman, presented a lengthy list of economic reforms on trade, education, health care and energy at a National Press Club news conference Tuesday. On behalf of the DGA, Mr. Rendell hoped President Bush will consider including the reforms in his State of the Union proposals next week.

"Sadly, America is losing its competitive edge," Mr. Rendell said, pointing to U.S. dependence on foreign oil, a declining number of engineers and science graduates, skyrocketing health care costs and a mushrooming trade deficit.

DGA proposals call for increased spending for higher teacher salaries, alternative sources of energy, a health care tax credit for businesses who offer worker health care coverage, and a "level playing field" in global trade.

DOJ_NMG_0012007

But when a reporter asked how the United States could be losing its edge when it has stronger scores in technology development, employment, incomes, economic growth and trade exports than the rest of the major industrialized nations, Mr. Rendell dismissed those factors. "The trend line is getting worse," he said.

Hillary's numbers

Only 16 percent of voters say they would vote for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for president in 2008, while 51 percent said they definitely would vote against the New York Democrat, according to a CNN-Gallup poll.

Thirty-two percent said they might consider voting for Mrs. Clinton.

However, the poll offered Mrs. Clinton little encouragement in seeking crossover votes: 90 percent of Republicans said there was no chance they would support her.

Bennett to CNN

William J. Bennett, radio talk-show host and former secretary of education, will join CNN as an analyst and commentator for various programs, the network announced yesterday.

CNN-U.S. President Jon Klein said Mr. Bennett will be one of CNN's political commentators as part of the network's continuing effort to bring a broad range of perspectives to its viewers. The network in recent days also hired former Rep. J.C. Watts, Oklahoma Republican, to do analysis and commentary.

Dead To The World (NYT)

By Felix G. Rohatyn

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DURING my four years as the American ambassador to France, I discovered that no single issue was viewed with as much hostility as our support for the death penalty. Outlawed by every member of the European Union, the death penalty was, and is, viewed in Europe as a throwback to the Middle Ages. When we require European support on security issues — Iran's nuclear program; the war in Iraq; North Korea's bomb; relations with China and Russia; the Middle East peace process — our job is made more difficult by the intensity of popular opposition in Europe to our policy.

Several years ago, Justice Anthony Kennedy spoke to the senior staff of our embassy in Paris on this issue to help them explain our position to a very hostile French audience. I was agreeably surprised when he indicated his belief that sooner or later, we would have to take into account the views of Europeans in determining what constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment."

Last March, the Supreme Court, in a 5 to 4 decision, abolished capital punishment for juvenile offenders, concluding that the death penalty for minors is indeed cruel and unusual punishment. "Our determination," Justice Kennedy wrote in the majority decision, "finds confirmation in the stark reality that the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty."

While, unsurprisingly, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented, it is notable that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor agreed with Justice Kennedy that international trends affect the meaning of "cruel and unusual punishment." Justices Scalia and Thomas, on the other hand, took the majority to task for taking "guidance from the views of foreign courts and legislators."

This attitude, reflecting a narrow and parochial view of the issue, is also found in Judge Samuel Alito's testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on his nomination to the Supreme Court: "I don't think it appropriate or useful to look to foreign law in interpreting the provisions of our Constitution. I think the framers would be stunned by the idea that the Bill of Rights is to be interpreted by taking a poll of countries of the world."

To the contrary, globalization has made it not only "appropriate or useful" but vital to look at foreign laws. It is in our interest to be aware of their impact whether they concern antitrust, food safety or the death penalty. Contempt for the laws of our allies is a major factor in our increasing isolation in the world; our present posture in Iraq reflects that reality. That is why is it is deeply troubling that the next member of the Supreme Court will most likely share Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas's point of view.

The Supreme Court is our most respected institution. Whether it is conservative or liberal is important; but it is even more important that it be enlightened. It must show understanding, if not respect, for other peoples' beliefs and laws, and occasionally be willing to support reasonable changes. Our Constitution, itself, was an extension of Enlightenment ideas that were incubated on the Continent. It certainly did not spring up in a vacuum, but was affected by strains of political thinking in Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0012008

"That our understanding of the Constitution does change from time to time has been settled since John Marshall breathed life into its text," Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last year, concurring with Justice Kennedy. Taking the views of 450 million Europeans into account is not a sign of weakness on our part, nor is it a commitment to change our views. It is simply recognition that the laws of our most important allies, our biggest foreign investors, foreign employers, foreign customers and trading partners are worthy of our attention. That is a sign of enlighten- ment.

OTHER NEWS:

Home Sales Drop 3rd Month In Row Market Cooling Off Faster Than Expected (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third-consecutive month, in a surprisingly sharp drop that signaled the housing market is cooling off faster than expected.

Home resales declined 5.7% from November to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.6 million, the slowest since March 2004, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Western states, notably California, suffered the worst, with home sales in the region skidding 11.4% from November and from December 2004.

"We got to 6.6 sooner than I expected. I hadn't expected that for two or three months," said David Lereah, chief economist for the NAR, who conceded that his forecast for 2006 might now be too optimistic. He had predicted sales of existing homes would drop 5% this year, from a record 7.07 million in 2005. The rise in home prices, meanwhile, will slow to 6% this year from 12.7% in 2005, he projected.

Home buyers shelled out $211,000 for a median-priced home in December, an increase of 10.5% from the year before. But rising mortgage rates are pricing many would-be buyers out of the market, Lereah said.

The average rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage was 6.27% in December, up from last year's low of 5.53% in July. The Mortgage Bankers Association predicted Wednesday that the average 30-year fixed loan would hit a high of 6.4% in the second half of this year and stay there until the end of 2007.

That's bad news, in particular, for buyers in California, where prices have skyrocketed. The median price there for a single-family home was $548,430 last month, up 15.6% over a year earlier. Many buyers can afford to buy a home only with a riskier adjustable-rate or interest-only mortgage.

Leslie Appleton-Young, chief economist for the California Association of Realtors, had been projecting over the past 18 months that the market would slow. Now that it has, the drop is deeper than she expected.

In addition to higher mortgage rates, Appleton-Young blamed high oil prices and weak consumer confidence for the cooling of California's housing market.

But after the feeding frenzy in the California market for most of last year, the recent trend has restored sanity to the home-buying process, said Lisa Strong, an agent for Lyon Real Estate in Sacramento. "There are no fights anymore" among competing buyers and their agents, she said.

In the South, sales of existing homes dropped 7.2%, and sales slipped 2.6% in the Midwest, from November levels. Sales were flat in the Northeast.

"They were disappointing, clearly, but not a catastrophe," said Phillip Neuhart, an analyst for Wachovia. "You have to put this into perspective: 6.6 million is historically a high level. We're expecting a soft landing. We're not expecting a crash."

Homes Sales Fell In December; A Record Still Set (WSJ)

By Joi Preciphs

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Sales of existing homes fell in December to their lowest level in three months, but they still set a record for the year.

DOJ_NMG_0012009

The National Association of Realtors said nationwide sales of previously owned homes fell 5.7% to an annual rate of 6.60 million last month from November's revised annual rate of 7.0 million. Analysts had projected a 6.87 million sales rate in the existing-home market, which includes single-family residences, condominiums, townhomes and co-ops.

The national median price for existing homes of all types in December was $211,000, down from an unrevised $215,000 in November, but up 10.5% from December 2004. The inventory of homes on the market increased slightly to a 5.1 months' supply last month, compared with 5.0 months in November.

The pattern was mixed regionally, with sales falling 11.4% in the West, 7.2% in the South, and 2.6% in the Midwest. Sales in the Northeast were unchanged.

Patrick Newport, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight in Waltham, Mass., said in a statement that the movement of interest rates is cooling the housing market and will continue to do so in 2006.

Read the complete text1 of the National Association of Realtors report on December existing-home sales and analysis2 from Briefing.com.

"Interest rates have eased in recent weeks, but we are expecting them to drift back up over the first half of 2006," he said, adding that if the Federal Reserve raises interest rates two more times before pausing, the increases "will cool off the housing market and deflate many local housing bubbles."

Mr. Newport doesn't expect the market to collapse anytime soon. The first casualties might come in places like the condo market, where the inventory of unsold homes jumped 8% last month. Sales of existing condominiums and co-ops increased a modest 1.6% in December, according to the NAR report.

Financial institutions have been keeping a watchful eye on the condo market and in some cases have scaled back lending for new condo developments. "We see risk of a substantial condo-price decline in certain frothy markets, based on record high inventory levels and the recent rapid price appreciation in condos," said Banc of America Securities analyst Daniel Oppenheim.

Despite the apparent slowing, existing-home sales for the year reached 7.072 million units, setting their fifth successive annual record, the NAR said. Home prices still remain strong, despite some softening. Given these factors, NAR Chief Economist David Lereah said in a statement that there is a "soft landing in sight for the housing sector."

"The level of home-sales activity is now at a sustainable level, and is likely to pick up a bit in the months ahead," Mr. Lereah said, adding that he expects the 2006 housing market to "remain historically high but lower" than 2005.

The recent boost in mortgage applications might suggest a "partial rebound in sales is directly ahead," Banc of America Securities economist Gary Bigg said. Mortgage giant Freddie Mac said the average 30-year fixed-rate mortgage was 6.27% last month, down from November's 6.33%.

Write to Joi Preciphs at joi.preciphs@dowjones.com3

Home Sales Fell Again In December (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third consecutive month, a trade group reported yesterday, even as the housing market registered a fifth consecutive year of increased sales.

The data appear to suggest that the era of rapidly increasing sales may be coming to a close. Sales in December fell 5.7 percent, to an annual pace of 6.6 million homes, after a 1.3 percent dip in November and a 2.7 percent drop in October. It was the lowest level of sales since March 2004.

Sales of existing homes fell or stayed flat in all four regions of the country, while the total inventory of homes for sale dipped slightly, the National Association of Realtors reported. Median prices — half the homes sold for less, half for more — were up 10.5 percent, to $211,000, from a year earlier.

For the year, home sales grew 4.2 percent, to 7.07 million, setting another record. The nation's long housing boom is almost a decade old, with the exception of 2000, when sales fell by 0.4 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0012010

"The housing boom in the United States is over," said Lynn Reaser, the chief economist for Bank of America's investment strategies group. "It at this point appears to be on the soft-landing plane, with sales slowing, some growth of inventory and sellers not receiving their full asking price."

The economy has become increasingly dependent on the growth generated by home sales, mortgage refinancings and related spending. A housing slowdown is figuring prominently into many analysts' forecasts for slower economic growth in 2006.

But forecasters have pronounced an end to the boom before and were proved wrong. Mortgage interest rates, though higher than a year ago, remain near historical lows, making home ownership more affordable for many. The average interest rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage was 6.1 percent last week, up from 5.71 percent in January 2005, according to Freddie Mac.

Economists say the sharpness of the current slowdown, and whether it will become more severe, will not become clear until the peak spring and summer home-buying season.

Prices in markets on the coasts that have experienced sharp increases will be an important barometer for the housing market this year, along with mortgage delinquencies and foreclosures, said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research. Prices, though still higher than a year ago, did not rise as fast in December as they did earlier in 2005.

Officials with the Realtors' group said a fundamentally strong economy and housing demand would help keep home sales generally steady, but even they acknowledged that the market had changed. "Clearly the air is coming out of the balloon," David A. Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors association, said, according to Bloomberg News. "We're transferring from a sellers' market to a buyers' market." The association expects sales to drop 4.4 percent in 2006.

December sales dropped the most in the West, 11.4 percent, followed by the South at 7.2 percent and the Midwest at 2.6 percent. Sales activity in the Northeast was unchanged from November.

Nationwide, the number of homes available for sale dropped to 2.8 million at the end of December, from 2.9 million, but because of the slower pace of sales, that represented 5.1-month supply of homes, up from a five-month supply in November.

Weaker Outlook For Homes And Oil Profits End A Rally (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

By Bloomberg News

Stocks ended a two-day rally yesterday as a worsening profit outlook for oil companies and homebuilders, two of the market's best performers during the last 12 months, sent prices lower.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 2.18 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1,264.68, its first drop this week. The Nasdaq composite index lost 4.60 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,260.65. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 2.48 points, or less than 0.1 percent, to 10,709.74, helped by a gain in General Motors.

Some 1.93 billion shares changed hands on the New York Stock Exchange, 20 percent more than the three-month average, as investors dealt with a flurry of earnings reports. About six stocks fell for every five that rose on the Big Board.

About 37 percent of the companies that have reported earnings so far have failed to surpass analysts' estimates. For the same quarter last year, 34 percent missed or met forecasts, according to a Bloomberg analysis of Thomson Financial data.

"Earnings are not bad, but they're just not as good as they have been," said Robert C. Doll, who oversees $539 billion as president and chief investment officer of Merrill Lynch Investment Managers in Plainsboro, N.J. "We've gotten so used to them being better than expected, and now that they've returned to normal, the market is struggling with that."

More than 140 companies in the S.& P. 500 release results this week, the busiest period for fourth-quarter earnings. The S.& P. 500 is down 2.3 percent from a four-year high reached on Jan. 11, just before the bulk of the index's members began reporting.

United States Treasuries fell the most since November after the government's $22 billion two-year note sale drew the weakest demand in nine months. By late in the day, the price of the benchmark 10-year note fell 21/32, to 1006/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.48 percent, from 4.39 percent on Tuesday.

Crude oil for March delivery lost 1.2 percent, to $65.85 a barrel, after an Energy Department report showed that supplies of gasoline and distillate fuel rose for a fourth consecutive week.

DOJ_NMG_0012011

Shares of the oil company ConocoPhillips fell 94 cents, to $63.54, even after the company reported that its profit last quarter jumped 51 percent, to $3.68 billion, or $2.61 a share.

Amerada Hess, another oil company, gained $1.86, to $148.47. The company said fourth-quarter profit increased 97 percent, to $452 million, or $4.31 a share.

Exxon Mobil, which is set to report earnings on Jan. 30, fell 75 cents, to $60.21. The S.& P. 500 Energy Index lost 1.8 percent, cutting its 12-month advance to 41 percent.

Sales of previously owned homes declined for a third consecutive month in December, sliding 5.7 percent to a 6.60 million annual rate, the National Association of Realtors said.

"The housing news was the big setback," said Jack A. Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank, which manages $44 billion in Chicago. "While we suspect that housing is likely to slow and thereby take the primary catalyst away from consumer spending, the number came in worse than expected and forced investors to face reality much sooner."

A gauge of homebuilding stocks in S.& P. indexes dropped 2.4 percent, paring its 12-month rise to 15 percent.

Toll Brothers, the nation's largest builder of luxury homes, lost 59 cents, to $34.02. D. R. Horton, the country's No. 1 homebuilder over all, fell 78 cents, to $37.20.

Here are the results of yesterday's auction of two-year Treasure notes:

Concerns Of Slowdown (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Lower oil prices and signs of a softening housing market battled for control of the market Wednesday, sending stocks on a string of sharp jumps and sudden drops that left the major indexes where they began the day.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, which at times was up as much as 48.45 points and down as much as 39.62, finished off just 2.48 at 10709.74. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 2.18 to 1264.68 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 4.60 to 2260.65.

Also worrying equity investors: A steep jump in bond yields after a weak reception to an auction of two-year Treasury notes. Analysts said buyers were shying away from bonds ahead of next Tuesday's meeting by the Federal Reserve. The jump in yields came as especially unsettling news on a day that investors were jittery about the housing market.

At first, it appeared stocks would rack up a third-consecutive day of gains since last Friday's 200-point gut check in the Dow. But a report by the National Association of Realtors said existing home sales fell a steeper-than-expected 5.7%, the third straight decline in a row. That took the wind out of stocks, since the housing market has been a big driver of the economy, said Jay Suskind, director of trading at Ryan Beck. The Philadelphia Housing Sector Index fell 1.6%, led by steep declines by components Centex and Hovnanian Enterprises.

The market righted itself after a government report showed a build in inventories of distillate fuels, including heating oil used to warm many homes in the Northeast U.S. Light, sweet crude-oil prices tumbled $1.21 to $65.85 on the New York Mercantile Exchange, on top of yesterday's $1.04 slide. Housing versus oil "caused the market to rollercoaster," Mr. Suskind said.

There could be a bright side to housing news, though. The Fed, which has had the housing market on its radar, could be encouraged by coolness in housing sales, said Stuart Freeman, chief investment officer of A.G. Edwards. "It's good to see a little weakness in housing here," he said. "It makes it more likely that the Fed will stop raising rates soon."

Policy markers meet Tuesday to decide whether to raise rates from their current level of 4.25%. It will be the last meeting chaired by Alan Greenspan, who's set to be replaced by Ben Bernanke.

Among major stock movers: Boston Scientific slumped 1.5% on news that its $27 billion bid for Guidant won out over Johnson & Johnson's $24.2 billion offer. J&J's shares finished down by 1.5% and Guidant fell 2%. Walt Disney fell 2.1% on news it sealed a deal to buy Pixar for $7.4 billion, though the stock ran up gains of 6.2% this year on previous reports of the deal. Pixar's shares, which were flat Wednesday, have gained about 10% this year on the deal talk.

Bristol-Myers Squibb shares rose 2.6% after reporting earnings that, excluding items, topped Wall Street's expectations. Xerox slid 1% after it posted net income of 32 cents a share for the fourth quarter, meeting analyst expectations, but revenue of $4.25 billion fell short of the $4.42 million Wall Street expected.

DOJ_NMG_0012012

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed8. On the Big Board, where 1.9 billion shares traded, 1,555 stocks rose and 1,814 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.1 billion shares traded, 1,262 rose and 1,762 declined.

Bonds declined9. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note lost 22/32 point, or $6.88 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.477%. The 30-year bond fell 1 11/32 to yield 4.656%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar gained.10 It traded at 114.71 yen, up from 114.59 yen late Tuesday, while the euro fell to $1.2245 from $1.2282.

Weak Earnings Reports Soften Stocks (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

NEW YORK — U.S. stocks ended slightly lower Wednesday, hurt by signs of slackening corporate profit growth and a slowdown in existing home sales.

Shares of copier company Xerox and candymaker Hershey both declined after the companies each reported revenue that fell short of Wall Street estimates, overshadowing gains in profit.

"The market has focused on disappointing earnings or disappointing guidance about future earnings of just a handful of companies," says Brian Gendreau, strategist at ING Investment Management. "When there's any hint that we're at the peak of earnings growth, the market gets pummeled."

The Dow Jones industrial average was down 2.48 points at 10,709.74. The Standard & Poor's 500 fell 2.18 points to 1264.68. The Nasdaq composite was down 4.60 points at 2260.65.

The market has struggled since last Friday, when U.S. stocks suffered their biggest loss in nearly three years after several earnings reports missed estimates and crude oil prices surged.

Data showing softer-than-expected U.S. existing home sales also sparked some caution and dimmed hopes of a strong market rebound after U.S. stocks' slide last week. U.S. Treasury bond prices fell for the second-consecutive day on unusually heavy volume, driving the yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note up to 4.48% in its biggest one-day gain in six months.

Shares of Xerox fell 15 cents to $14.31, while Hershey lost $1.80 to $52.30 as investors focused on their disappointing revenue. They followed other big companies, including Johnson & Johnson, IBM, Motorola and General Electric, that have delivered sour sales news in their earnings reports.

Norfolk Southern jumped $1.84 to $47.64 after it became the latest railroad to deliver stellar results with a 37% gain in fourth-quarter earnings. U.S. railroads have seen demand and revenue soar in the past two years and last year significantly raised prices for the first time since rail freight was deregulated in 1980. Among other rallying railroads, Burlington Northern Santa Fe rose 88 cents to $75.68, and CSX gained $1.65 to $52.40.

•CNF skidded $5.41, or 10%, to $50.51 after the trucking company posted weaker-than-expected results and forecast a disappointing quarter.

•Colgate-Palmolive climbed $1.90 to $55.65. The consumer products company reported 26% higher fourth-quarter profit — the first time in two years it has topped expectations.

•St. Jude Medical fell $3.27 to $50.03. The medical device maker said fourth-quarter sales of its devices to treat irregular heartbeats were lower than expected.

Greenspan To Set Up A Consulting Firm (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan plans to set up a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, in Washington, D.C., after he leaves the Fed at the end of the month, according to people familiar with the matter.

In addition to consulting, Mr. Greenspan plans to give speeches and write a book, these people say.

One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said yesterday will leave her job as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. Ms. Smith joined the Fed as communications director in 2001 after serving as press secretary to Clinton Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers. She served in effect as Mr. Greenspan's chief of staff, advising him on relations with the public, politicians and the media, Fed insiders say. She has also advised Fed policy makers on monetary-policy communications, such as the postmeeting statement and meeting minutes, though not on the formulation of monetary policy itself.

DOJ_NMG_0012013

In addition, the Fed said David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesman and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities.

Greenspan Opposes Bank Loophole (WSJ)

By Bernard Wysocki Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan is opposing a regulatory loophole that allows corporations to own banks, thrusting himself into the middle of an effort by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to establish a bank.

Mr. Greenspan's salvo, outlined in a 12-page letter to Congress that was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, is the latest in a controversy over the separation of commerce and banking. Wal-Mart, the Bentonville, Ark., retailer, is trying to obtain a state banking charter in Utah, using precisely the exemption in the banking laws opposed by Mr. Greenspan.

His remarks, reiterating and expanding on previous comments, could be Mr. Greenspan's last major statement to Congress as Fed chairman. The 79-year-old Mr. Greenspan, who took office in 1987, is scheduled to step down Jan. 31.

Wal-Mart officials say the Utah bank would be a back-office processing center, handling debit-card, credit-card and electronic check-transfer payments by customers at its stores. A third party currently processes the transactions -- estimated at 140 million a month -- and bringing the work in-house would save Wal-Mart money. Company officials repeatedly have said they don't plan to establish bank branches. Under current law, these state-chartered banks, many incorporated in Utah, may open branches in more than 20 states and the District of Columbia.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation must rule on Wal-Mart's application for deposit insurance for the proposed bank. In the past six months, more than 1,500 comments have been filed with the FDIC about Wal-Mart's application. Last week, in a letter to members of Congress, the FDIC said it would wait for a full board, including a new chairman, before voting, and would probably hold hearings beforehand.

THE FULL LETTER

Read Greenspan's letter1 to Congress. (Adobe Acrobat required2.)

In his letter, sent Jan. 20 in response to questions from Rep. Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican and member of the House Financial Services Committee, Mr. Greenspan doesn't single out Wal-Mart's application for criticism but mentions it along with the names of other big companies that have established industrial-loan corporations -- or industrial banks, as these state-chartered financial institutions are sometimes called.

General Electric Co., Volkswagen AG, General Motors Corp., Merrill Lynch & Co. and Pitney Bowes Inc. all own industrial-loan corporations. Mr. Greenspan cited in his letter the sharp growth in such corporations, known as ILCs, noting that assets have grown to $140 billion in 2004 from $3.8 billion in 1987 when the current law created the industrial-loan exemption.

"The ILC exemption is now the primary means by which commercial firms may control an FDIC-insured bank engaged in broad lending and deposit-taking activities and thereby breach the general separation of banking and commerce," Mr. Greenspan's letter said. He warned that the growing use of the loophole is "undermining the prudential framework that Congress has carefully crafted and developed" to oversee financial institutions.

Mr. Greenspan's letter noted that the parent companies of these industrial-loan entities escape the regulatory scrutiny of bank holding companies, which must operate under the supervisory authority of the Fed. In uncharacteristically blunt language, Mr. Greenspan urged Congress to close the loophole, which he said "provides the corporate owners of exempt ILCs a significant competitive advantage over other types of banking institutions, and creates an unlevel competitive playing field among banking organizations."

In an interview, Mr. Leach, the former chairman of the House banking committee, said he considered Mr. Greenspan's letter significant.

DOJ_NMG_0012014

"It's very comprehensive. It is a very considered Federal Reserve position on the issue. And it is a stark warning to the Congress" about the need to separate commerce and banking, Mr. Leach said. "This is not primarily a Wal-Mart issue. It is a 'nature of the American economy' issue."

Mr. Leach, the co-author of landmark 1999 banking legislation breaking down Depression-era laws separating securities and banking, has long warned against emulating Japan, where the lax lending of bank-centered industrial groups, called "keiretsu," contributed to the 1980s economic bubble and the sharp economic downturn of the past 15 years. The 1999 Gramm-Leach-Bliley law allowed linkups among banking, securities and insurance but largely ruled out combinations involving nonfinancial institutions' ownership of banks.

In coming out against the ILC loophole, and by implication against Wal-Mart's bid for a bank, Mr. Greenspan has parted company with some free-market advocates who believe that a Wal-Mart bank, if it did turn into a retail-banking powerhouse, would encourage competition in the financial-services field, and would ultimately lower costs to consumers.

To some experts, Mr. Greenspan's opposition to the industrial banks is largely based on maintaining the Fed's power amid constant inside-the-Beltway turf battles.

The FDIC, which regulates the industrial banks, says it has all the tools it needs to supervise these entities for safety and soundness. The Fed, which oversees bank holding companies, says that loophole leaves the banking system exposed to risk since no financial regulators have oversight of the parent company.

"If Wal-Mart acquired an Industrial Loan Company, its primary prudential banking regulator would be the FDIC, not the Fed," Charles Calomiris, a professor at Columbia University's business school, wrote in a recent paper. "This could lead to a major incursion on the Fed's regulatory turf if nonfinancial firms entered in significant number and were regulated by the FDIC, a form of regulatory competition that would be welcomed by historians of bank regulation, but not by the Fed."

A spokesman for the Fed said it couldn't comment on whether incoming Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke would endorse every word of Mr. Greenspan's comments. However, the spokesman said other Fed officials have made similar comments, as official Fed positions, during the time Mr. Bernanke was a Fed official.

Many banking organizations oppose Wal-Mart because they fear its strength, and believe it would compete unfairly. "The Wal-Mart bank would have no incentive -- in fact it would have a disincentive -- to lend to businesses that compete with its parent company," said David Hayes, president of a small bank in Dyersburg, Tenn., and chairman of the Independent Community Bankers of America, in testimony before a congressional committee in October.

Wal-Mart has made numerous efforts to get into banking. In 1999, the company tried to buy a savings and loan in Oklahoma, but failed. Four years ago, the retailer struck a partnership with a Canadian bank to open branches in 100 U.S. Wal-Mart stores. The U.S. Office of Thrift Supervision rejected the application, claiming it crossed the line between banking and commerce. Two years ago, Wal-Mart tried to buy the Franklin Bank, an industrial bank in California, only to be thwarted when the state passed a law barring bank purchases by nonfinancial companies.

Skepticism Greeted Greenspan, Too Bernanke's Fed Chief Tenure Begins Similarly To Predecessor's (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors jittery about how incoming Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke will pan out can take some solace — folks weren't sure some guy named Alan Greenspan was up to snuff either.

Investors didn't take the news so well on the day in June 1987 when Paul Volcker announced he was leaving the Fed after eight years and Greenspan was named to his position. Bond markets took their worst one-day beating in more than five years, and the dollar fell.

“The new chairman cannot just pick up Mr. Volcker's wealth of experience or his worldwide network of trust and respect,” The New York Times said in an editorial at the time.

“Mr. Greenspan faces a daunting challenge in proving to the financial markets that he is a worthy replacement for the outgoing Fed chief,” The Wall Street Journal said in an article.

DOJ_NMG_0012015

"Greenspan … will soon get his turn on the monetary tightrope," an article in U.S. News and World Report said. "If he keeps his cool, it could be a great act. But the risks of a nasty spill are also considerable."

Bernanke, a former Fed governor and current head of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, will take over at the Fed next week after Greenspan presides over his last policymaking meeting on Tuesday.

In many ways, Bernanke — although widely respected in economic circles — is more of an unknown to the public than Greenspan was in 1987. Greenspan in the early 1980s was chairman of a widely watched panel on reforming Social Security. He also served as chairman of the CEA for 21/2 years in the mid-1970s during President Ford's public "Whip Inflation Now" campaign. Greenspan also did numerous media interviews as head of a successful economic consulting firm.

Bernanke has served as chairman of the CEA only since June. Before that, he was a Fed governor for nearly three years and head of Princeton University's economics department. His only other public service was on a local school board.

But no matter how well they knew Greenspan, people in 1987 were still nervous about him taking over the Fed. The concerns:

•International. Although Greenspan had a solid reputation as an economist, some worried that he lacked experience on the international stage. Although calling Greenspan an "excellent choice," BusinessWeek magazine in an editorial said he "lacks Volcker's worldwide stature."

•Political. Still others questioned whether Greenspan was too political. He, like Bernanke, had served as CEA chairman. With an election a little more than a year away, some commentators in 1987 questioned if Greenspan would not take the necessary steps to squeeze out inflation in an attempt to juice up the economy to keep a Republican in the White House.

•Mythical. And some questioned if Greenspan could fill the shoes of Volcker, who had become so revered and trusted that one economist in a Wall Street Journal article referred to him as a "financial demigod."

"We were nervous for all the reasons we're probably nervous about Bernanke," says Hugh Johnson, chairman of Johnson Illington Advisors, a money management company in Albany, N.Y.

"Paul Volcker was something of an icon for the financial markets," Johnson recalls. "The financial markets are always uncomfortable with change. … Just as we were nervous about moving beyond Volcker, we're nervous about moving beyond Greenspan."

Several economists even warned Greenspan's appointment raised the risk a recession would hit the U.S. economy. As an economic consultant, Greenspan himself had predicted just a few months before his appointment to the chairmanship that a recession was likely coming in the not-so-distant future.

Marshall Vest was one of the economists who was quoted as saying Greenspan's arrival raised the chances of a recession in a USA TODAY article. Eighteen years later, Vest, now director of economic and business research at the Eller College of Management at the University of Arizona, says it's hard to imagine being worried about Greenspan's talents.

"I would give him very high marks," he says. "The economy has been much less volatile and much more predictable under his watch."

Former San Francisco Fed president Robert Parry says it's quite possible Bernanke, like Greenspan, will develop the larger-than-life reputation enjoyed by the two chairmen before him.

"I don't know if I would have said in August of '87 that Greenspan would have developed this aura as well," Parry says. "You just didn't know that at the time. … In some respects, if you were to base it on training and area of expertise, experience … you'd have to say Bernanke has a real shot of continuing to receive that kind of aura."

Said Princeton University economists Alan Blinder and Ricardo Reis in a paper delivered at a conference on Greenspan's legacy in August: "Back in 1987, the financial markets viewed the impending retirement of Paul Volcker as tantamount to the end of civilization as they knew it. But they got over it, as they will in 2006."

Dow Chemical Is Ordered To Pay In 'Janitors' Case (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012016

A federal appeals court ruled Dow Chemical Co. is liable for $22.2 million in back taxes and interest for claiming tax-income losses on thousands of life-insurance policies it took out on its employees.

The decision Monday by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, reverses a district-court ruling in 2003 that Dow Chemical's company-owned life-insurance plans were legitimate business transactions. The ruling is a victory for the Internal Revenue Service, which for the past decade has been cracking down on companies that take out life-insurance policies on their executives and employees, often without their knowledge, in order to reduce their corporate-tax bill. Of employers contesting the IRS stance, only Dow Chemical had prevailed in court, and a spokeswoman said the Midland, Mich., chemicals manufacturer continues to weigh its options for a possible appeal.

With such company-owned life insurance -- known as "janitors insurance" because it covered everyone including the janitors -- employers aimed to generate tax deductions with minimal cash outlay. They did this by taking a tax deduction for the interest they paid on loans taken out against the insurance policies, while allowing the policy to build value tax-free. The tactic was the subject of a series of articles in The Wall Street Journal in 2002.

Several companies using janitors insurance have settled or lost cases brought by the IRS, including Winn-Dixie Stores Inc., CM Holdings Inc. and American Electric Power Co. In these cases, the courts ruled that the company-owned life-insurance policies had no other economic value other than creating a tax loss.

The IRS disallows these types of tax shelters in part because it wouldn't make financial sense to engage in them without the tax implications.

Dow Chemical's plan worked much like the others, but the company chose not to settle with the IRS.

"We believe that Corporate Owned Life Insurance policies had economic substance, as the District Court held. We are currently reviewing the opinion with our legal counsel," said Terri F. McNeill, a Dow Chemical spokeswoman. "Once we better understand the basis of the decision and have gauged its implications, we will decide on the most appropriate course of action going forward."

Dow Chemical could appeal this decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

From 1988 to 1991, Dow Chemical purchased life insurance on 21,112 employees. The company was both the owner and beneficiary of these policies. It paid the premiums using a complicated system of loans that used the policies as collateral, taking cash withdrawals from some of the policies.

In the tax years 1988-1991, the chemical company claimed deductions totaling $33 million for interest paid on the loans used to pay the janitors-insurance-plan premiums and for fees related to the administration of the policies.

The IRS, arguing that the policies were a sham and purchased explicitly to create income-tax losses, disallowed the deduction. It assessed back taxes and interests totaling $22.2 million.

Many large companies throughout the 1980s and 1990s purchased janitors insurance policies. Congress started to phase out the interest deduction on many of the janitors-insurance policy plans beginning in 1996.

Embattled Rep. Ney To Seek Re-Election (AP-Y2)

By David Hammer

AP2, January 26, 2006

Undaunted by speculation within his own party that he may have to quit Congress because of a corruption probe, Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record) announced Wednesday he's running for re-election.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign and I am ready for the fight," said Ney, R-Ohio. He planned to hold his first formal campaign event Thursday.

Ney's popularity has hardly dimmed in his expansive rural district, even after he was identified in disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea as the central figure in Abramoff's scheme to bribe members of Congress.

Supporters of Ney have been unfazed by Ohio party chairman Bob Bennett's pronouncement last week that Ney should resign if he's indicted.

Bennett attempted to soften his nationally televised comments Friday by noting Ney hadn't been charged with a crime, but he later reiterated that Ney should leave Congress if the Justice Department files criminal charges against him.

DOJ_NMG_0012017

Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who also had ties to Abramoff, stepped down temporarily as majority leader last year when he was indicted on unrelated charges in Texas, then made it permanent after the Abramoff guilty plea. But he has not relinquished his House seat.

Earlier this month, Ney temporarily stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee. He acknowledged that his ties to Abramoff were a distraction from his duties, particularly as Republicans push an ethics reform agenda — part of which must be implemented by the Administration Committee.

But Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said no such distraction has affected Ney's work for his district, where he's known for hands-on constituent service and independence from GOP trade and labor policies.

Two Republican members of Congress have moved early to dissociate themselves from Ney. Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida gave away $2,500 he had received from Ney and Rep. Charles Boustany of Louisiana shed $10,000 Ney gave him. Ney's political action committee gave money to both lawmakers shortly before the 2004 elections.

Congressman Tied To Lobbying Inquiry To Seek Re-election (NYT)

By Christine Hauser

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Representative Bob Ney, a lawmaker from Ohio who became a target of the broad Justice Department inquiry into corruption and influence-peddling in Washington, said today that he will seek re-election.

A spokesman said Mr. Ney planned to make an official announcement on Thursday when he kicks off his campaign.

"He is filing the petitions to be on the ballot tomorrow and holding an event with a few hundred supporters tomorrow evening," a spokesman for Mr. Ney, Brian J. Walsh, said by telephone.

Mr. Ney said in a statement today that the campaign this year promises to be a "vigorous" one "and I am ready for the fight."

"I look forward to joining my friends and supporters, including the many state and local officials backing my re-election bid, as we kick off the 2006 campaign this Thursday and Friday," he said.

Mr. Ney is referred to as "Representative No. 1" in court documents filed in connection with the corruption scandal surrounding the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Democrats have attacked Mr. Ney over accusations that he assisted Mr. Abramoff in exchange for gifts and travel.

Mr. Ney temporarily relinquished his chairmanship of the House Administration Committee, acknowledging that his association with Mr. Abramoff was becoming a distraction for the Republican Party. As chairman, he would also be at the center of efforts to revise Congressional ethics rules, which members of both parties are proposing.

Mr. Ney and his lawyers say they will offer evidence to counter the accusations by Mr. Abramoff, who agreed to testify in the corruption case in exchange for a reduced sentence.

His supporters have been unfazed by the pronouncement by the Ohio party chairman, Bob Bennett, last week that Mr. Ney should resign if he is indicted, The Associated Press reported today.

Mr. Ney represents the mainly blue-collar district in eastern Ohio.

The statement from his office said he would announce his re-election bid at a campaign rally in Dover tomorrow evening and then travel to the southern part of the district for a second rally in Chillicothe on Friday at noon.

West Virginia: Late Senate Race Entry For GOP Media Mogul (RC)

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

With the filing deadline for federal candidates set to pass Saturday, Senate Republicans finally have lured a potentially top-tier challenger into the race against Sen. Robert Byrd (D).

Millionaire media mogul John Raese (R) filed candidacy papers Wednesday and will announce today that he is trying to unseat Byrd, who is set to become the longest-serving Senator in history later this spring.

Raese, who splits his time between homes in Palm Beach, Fla. and Morgantown, W.Va., is a former West Virginia Republican Party chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0012018

He currently serves as chairman of West Virginia Radio Corp., president and CEO of Greer Industries Inc., which produces steel and limestone, and vice president of West Virginia Newspaper Publishing Co. He is expected to spend personal resources in the contest.

"John has a great opportunity to become the next Senator from West Virginia," National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) said in a statement. "He will represent the state's mainstream values and bring fresh leadership to the United States Senate."

He is also no stranger to campaigning.

Raese ran for Senate in 1984, losing an open-seat contest to now-Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D) 52 percent to 48 percent. Raese was outspent by a 12-1 margin in that contest.

He later challenged then-Gov. Arch Moore (R) in the 1988 GOP primary, losing to the incumbent 53 percent to 47 percent.

Since the beginning of the cycle National Republicans have been desperately trying to generate a competitive race for Byrd, suffering several recruiting setbacks in the process.

— Lauren W. Whittington

MINNESOTA

All Eyes on Ciresi, Who Is Expected to Enter Race

A wealthy trial attorney may be about to pick the lock that Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar appears to have on the Democratic Senate primary.

Mike Ciresi, who sought the 2000 nomination, said he will announce whether he will try again next week, The Associated Press reported.

Minnesota political observers believe that Ciresi, who has been mulling a Senate bid for a year, will pull the trigger this time.

If he was disinclined to run, he would have just said so, they reason. Instead he told the AP: "I'm very close to announcing what those plans may be."

Ciresi would be wise to enter the race now, as child safety advocate Patty Wetterling dropped her bid last week and is likely to run for lieutenant governor instead. That leaves only under-funded veterinarian Ford Bell to challenge Klobuchar, who seems assured of the Democratic nod unless another heavy-hitter jumps in and mixes things up.

Wetterling endorsed Klobuchar, as did Rep. Betty McCollum (D), after Wetterling withdrew.

Ciresi also said that he "learned the last time around that you don't need to get in too early."

In 2000, now-Sen. Mark Dayton (D) waited until April to decide that he wanted to challenge then-Sen. Rod Grams (R).

Spending lavishly from his personal fortune, Dayton bypassed the state party's nominating process and forced the state party-backed candidate into a primary.

Dayton, who is retiring, will not be in the mix, but Ciresi has the ability to finance a campaign largely from his own wallet. He was the lead lawyer in Minnesota's successful $6.6 billion 1998 settlement with the nation's largest tobacco companies.

No one is seriously challenging Rep. Mark Kennedy for the Republican nomination.

— Nicole Duran

FLORIDA

Castor Has Wide Lead Over Miller in New Poll

A new poll released this week by the campaign of Hillsborough County Commissioner Kathy Castor showed her well-positioned to win the Democratic nomination in the 11th district race to succeed Rep. Jim Davis (D).

The poll, conducted by The Feldman Group Inc., found that Castor led state Sen. Les Miller (D) 46 percent to 29 percent. The contest also features three lesser-known candidates, who registered a combined 8 percent in the poll.

The survey of 606 likely Democratic primary voters was taken Jan. 10-12. It had a 4 percent margin of error.

Castor, the daughter of 2004 Democratic Senate nominee Betty Castor, has raised $465,000 for the race so far.

"Castor is a popular member of the Hillsborough County Commission with a strong base of her own and also benefits from her mother, Betty Castor's, widespread popularity," pollster Diane Feldman wrote in a polling memo.

The poll also showed that Miller, who has a base in the black community, enjoys some crossover support, as does Castor.

The primary winner is almost certain to win the general election in the Democratic stronghold.

DOJ_NMG_0012019

— L.W.W.

OHIO

Ney to Start Re-election Bid With Rally Today

Embattled Rep. Bob Ney (R) will formally kickoff his re-election campaign today at a rally in his district.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign and I am ready for the fight," Ney said in a statement.

Ney has faced increased scrutiny in recent months for his involvement in the scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. His office has acknowledged that he is the "Representative #1" cited in Abramoff's plea bargain agreement.

Under pressure from party leaders, he recently temporarily relinquished the chairmanship of the House Administration Committee. Ney has said repeatedly that he has done nothing improper.

Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer and Dover Law Director Zack Space are vying in the May 2 Democratic primary for the chance to face Ney, who has held the expansive 18th district seat since 1994.

— L.W.W.

MAINE

Key Unions Back Snowe, Who Has No Major Foe

In a move that could dissuade any big-name Democrat from entering the race, Sen. Olympia Snowe (R) secured the endorsement of two major labor groups Wednesday.

The AFL-CIO and the International Federation of Professional & Technical Engineers announced that they would back Snowe in her bid for a third term.

Snowe's work to save the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard during the most recent round of base closings went a long way to help her win the endorsements. Kirk Miller, president of the local engineers union, called Snowe an effective leader on workers' issues.

"Her around-the-clock efforts ... to successfully protect the shipyard from closure last year will never be forgotten," Miller said in a news release.

The moderate Snowe is already a tough target for Democrats, but the AFL-CIO's decision could make it even harder for a top-tier Democrat to raise money.

Snowe had more than $1.6 million in the bank as of Sept. 30.

So far only Bangor lawyer Eric Mehnert and local activist Jean Hay Bright are vying for the Democratic nomination.

State Senate Majority Leader Michael Brennan (D) is still mulling the race.

One Republican, retired high school teacher S. Charles Tamboia is challenging Snowe in the Republican primary.

— N.D.

MICHIGAN

State Right to Life Group Backs Walberg Challenge

Tim Walberg (R) finally got the Michigan Right to Life endorsement he wanted so badly in the 7th district race — he just got it two years late.

In the previous cycle, six Republicans vied for the open 7th district seat. Five, including Walberg, a former state Representative, were social conservatives who desperately wanted the Michigan Right to Life endorsement. Then-state Rep. Clark Bisbee secured the endorsement instead.

Joe Schwarz, then a former state Senator, went on to win the GOP primary and the seat.

Now Walberg is the only Republican challenging Schwarz. With the backing of the Club for Growth and now Michigan Right to Life, Walberg hopes to merge the conservative primary vote, which splintered in 2004 across the five other GOP candidates and take Schwarz down in the primary.

The district is heavily Republican.

— N.D.

PENNSYLVANIA

GOP Hopes Alito Stance Hurts Casey With Base

DOJ_NMG_0012020

State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D) announced late Tuesday that he supports the confirmation of Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court, after weeks of calls from Republicans to take a position on the controversial nominee.

Casey, who is trying to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R) in November, is the first Democratic Senate challenger to come out in support of Alito's confirmation.

The announcement came on the heels of Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell's (D) announcement that he, too, is supportive of Alito, who serves on the Philadelphia-based 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals with Rendell's wife.

Casey's position puts him at odds with abortion-rights advocates, who strongly oppose Alito. Casey does not favor abortion rights and Republicans are hopeful that his Alito position could hamper his fundraising within the party's base.

"It will make his job more difficult in the state of Pennsylvania as he tries to appeal to progressive voters, and it should make his job harder," Kate Michelman, former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, told the Harrisburg Patriot-News this week.

Meanwhile, a new GOP poll out this week showed Casey with a 10-point lead over Santorum. The Strategic Vision survey of 1,200 likely voters found Casey ahead of Santorum 50 percent to 40 percent. It had a 3 percent margin of error.

— L.W.W.

TEXAS

Dallas Paper Endorses Anderson Over Taylor

Van Taylor (R) might have the money and tacit backing of the Washington GOP establishment in his bid to take on Rep. Chet Edwards (D), but former Congressional aide Tucker Anderson (R) has the support of the 17th district's biggest newspaper.

The Dallas Morning News endorsed Anderson, who used to work for Rep. Pete Sessions (R), over Taylor, a wealthy businessman and Iraq war combat veteran, in their Republican primary fight to determine who gets to take on Edwards this November.

"His opponent, Van Taylor, is a Harvard-educated Marine-turned-businessman. The 33-year-old served courageously in Iraq, volunteering for the military after college. And we greatly respect that commitment," the Morning News staff editorial, published Wednesday, said.

"But when it comes to representing the 17th District, the recent transplant to West, Texas, doesn't have the same history as Mr. Anderson. And the private equity investor wouldn't know Capitol Hill as well as his opponent."

Taylor has already begun running television ads in advance of the March 7 primary.

— David M. Drucker

ARIZONA

Ex-State GOP Chief Joins Race in Kolbe's District

The 8th district Republican primary plot has thickened, with former state GOP Chairman Mike Hellon entering the race to replace retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R), the Arizona Daily Star reported this week.

Hellon, 63, who like Kolbe is considered a moderate Republican, describes himself as a "moderate conservative," and told the Daily Star he has what it takes to keep the Tucson-area seat in GOP hands.

"A vote for Randy Graf (R) in the primary is a vote for [Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as Speaker of the House," Hellon said.

Graf, a conservative former state Representative, received 43 percent of the vote when he challenged Kolbe in the 2004 8th district Republican primary and was running before the Congressman announced his retirement plans in the fall.

Mike Jenkins (R), a Marine Corps veteran and small business owner, is also running in the primary. Hellon dismissed his candidacy as lacking the broad support needed to win.

The leading candidates in the Democratic primary are former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords, who per Arizona law was forced to resign her Senate seat in order to run for Congress, and longtime Tucson television news anchor Patty Weiss.

— D.M.D.

Ehrlich Alters Landscape Of Stem Cell Funding Debate (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012021

Yesterday's hearings on stem cell research in Maryland had a familiar ring: Advocates touted the potential for treating Parkinson's disease, juvenile diabetes and other conditions, and opponents raised the same ethical objections they made a year ago when lawmakers proposed spending $25 million a year on the emerging science.

But it was a voice legislators did not hear, neither yesterday nor a year ago, that could alter this year's debate -- that of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.

After remaining mostly silent on a bill that was killed last year by a Republican-led filibuster threat, Ehrlich (R) is pushing a plan to spend $20 million next year on stem cell research.

But Ehrlich is not committing himself on the question that has stirred the most controversy: whether the money should be used primarily for work on stem cells derived from human embryos or from less controversial adult stem cells.

Although the move has drawn some criticism, Ehrlich argued in an interview that he is acting prudently, given the evolving nature of the science.

"I wasn't that good of a biology student. I'm not going to make that decision," Ehrlich said. "The point here is that the decision should be a function of the science. These are fundamentally science questions, not political questions."

The governor would leave it to a state-founded technology corporation to decide whether to provide grants for work on adult stem cells or work on embryonic stems cells, which many scientists say holds greater promise but some in his party consider tantamount to abortion.

Ehrlich, who has supported stem cell research since his days in Congress, said that his public silence last year masked a behind-the-scenes effort to develop an alternate approach that would both bolster the state's biotechnology sector and depoliticize a difficult issue for Republicans.

"The strong pro-life members know the administration does not share their views on this issue, but we wanted to try to lower the temperature on the politics," he said. "I wanted to try to keep everyone's eye on the ball, and I believe this approach accomplishes that goal."

Ehrlich's involvement has scrambled the politics surrounding the issue, making it all but certain Maryland will join the growing number of states subsidizing the research, either with the legislation considered at yesterday's hearings or a provision Ehrlich has inserted into his budget.

Ehrlich said his budget-based approach makes additional legislation unnecessary.

Some advocates of the research say Ehrlich's plan has merit and view it as more likely to withstand opposition in the Senate.

"As long as there's no preference for adult, that's fine," said Robert Johnson, a lobbyist for Maryland Families for Stem Cell Research, a coalition formed during last year's debate that has primarily supported embryonic work.

But the governor's posture drew criticism yesterday from sponsors of the stem cell bills.

In an interview, Sen. Paula C. Hollinger (D-Baltimore County) was adamant that money be spent on work on embryonic stem cells, which is controversial because it involves the destruction of human embryos. Hollinger's bill would restrict research funded with state money to embryos discarded at fertility clinics and establish other rules for funding the science.

"The only reason we're doing this bill is that the president has refused to allow the research to be done," Hollinger said, referring to a 2001 executive order by President Bush that set limits on the embryonic stem cell research that can be funded with federal money.

Her view was echoed by Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), the lead sponsor of the House bill, which passed similar legislation last year earmarking $23 million for embryonic work.

Other lawmakers questioned why a compromise could not have been worked out last session. "We wasted a year, and people still suffer," said Sen. James Brochin (D-Baltimore County).

Some advocates have questioned whether there are enough university and private-sector researchers geared up to spend $25 million on embryonic stem cell research. But that view was rebutted yesterday by Curt Civin, a stem cell researcher from Johns Hopkins University, who was among several scientists to testify at yesterday's hearing.

"Yeah, we can spend this tomorrow," Civin said. "We would be all over this."

DOJ_NMG_0012022

Republican leaders signaled this week that they would put up a vigorous fight against any bill that steers money only to embryonic work, which they consider "killing unborn babies," said Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus (R-Somerset).

"We're going to be opposed to the bill," he said. "We're going to be as aggressive as we can to kill it."

Under the governor's approach, grants would be made by the Maryland Technology Development Corporation, overseen by a 15-member board appointed by the governor. Although money could still go to embryonic stem cell projects, Stoltzfus said Republicans are more comfortable with the approach.

Supporters of the Democratic bill say they fell two votes short last year of gathering enough to end the threatened filibuster, which kept the bill from the Senate floor the final day of the session. Lobbying this year will focus on two Republicans who voted for the bill in committee last year but agreed to stick with their party in a filibuster effort.

In interviews this week, both Sen. Sandra B. Schrader (R-Howard) and Sen. Allan H. Kittleman (R-Howard) said they support the governor's approach but declined to say whether they would back a filibuster of Hollinger's bill.

Because Ehrlich's plan is included in the budget bill, debate over the measure will play out among a different set of lawmakers.

Some members of both parties have suggested they might attempt to use the budget process to limit the type of stem cell work permitted -- a move Ehrlich said he would oppose.

"I would discourage both sides from impacting this thoughtful approach that we've developed," he said.

Republicans Pledge Bipartisan Filibuster Of Stem-cell Bill (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

The Maryland Senate is facing a showdown over stem-cell research, with Republicans and a few Democrats vowing yesterday to stop a bill that would promote the creation of embryos for research.

"If [Senate President Thomas V. Mike] Miller wants to do this extraordinary thing, he will get a filibuster that lasts as long as he wants it to last," said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican.

Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus said he had more than the minimum 19 votes to filibuster.

"We think we have 20," said Mr. Stoltzfus, an Eastern Shore Republican. "We support stem-cell research. We just don't support embryonic. We don't believe in killing a baby, and that's what we believe embryos are."

There are 14 Republicans in the 47-member Senate, which means six Democrats have agreed to filibuster.

Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, is sponsoring the Senate bill in support of embryonic stem-cell research for the second year and supports the House version, sponsored by Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, a Baltimore City Democrat.

Mrs. Hollinger wants a Senate vote as early as next week -- the fourth week of the 90-day General Assembly session.

"I'm sure they will filibuster, and I'm sure we will round up the votes," she said.

Mrs. Hollinger also said she would fight for the bill and against the filibuster for "as long as it takes."

Her bill would give $25 million a year for five years, starting in fiscal 2008, to embryonic stem-cell research.

The bill also allows the legislature to appoint a committee of scientists and representatives from business and biotechnology industries to award grants through the state's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene.

Some scientists hope embryonic stem cells will eventually produce cures and treatments for such chronic and degenerative illnesses as Parkinson's disease and diabetes.

Opponents of the research say there have been no proven results that embryos can yield positive results, while adult and umbilical cord stem cells are now used to treat 65 medical conditions.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, announced his proposal to fund stem-cell research on Jan. 11, the second day of the session.

President Bush in 2001 restricted the use of embryos for federal stem-cell research. So scientists who want to conduct such research are looking to state governments for funding.

DOJ_NMG_0012023

Mr. Ehrlich's plan would provide $20 million for one year toward stem-cell research, with no specifics on whether the money would fund embryonic stem-cell research or only research using adult stem cells and stem cells from umbilical cords.

Mr. Ehrlich's plan also would allow a committee of scientists, business representatives and biotechnology representatives to make the decisions on where the funding goes.

However, the committee in the governor's proposal would be selected by the Maryland Technology Development Corporation, created in 1998 by the state legislature.

The committee is governed by a 15-member board, appointed by the governor with advice and consent of the Senate, according to its Web site.

"Mr. Ehrlich's proposal depoliticizes the situation," said Henry Fawell, a spokesman for the governor. He also said Democratic lawmakers are publicly saying what are the best scientific decisions, but "they need to stay out of that and let the scientists decide."

Gerald Ford Returns Home From Hospital (LAT)

By Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

Former President Gerald R. Ford returned home from the hospital Wednesday morning after a 12-day stay while being treated for pneumonia, his spokeswoman said.

"He is doing well," Penny Circle, Ford's chief of staff, said in a brief statement Wednesday.

Ford, 92, originally had been scheduled to leave Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage on Jan. 19, but doctors kept him for additional treatment.

"Obviously, we're delighted that he's doing well," said Ford's son, Mike, director of student development at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C.

Circle has described Ford during the last week as out of bed, reading the newspaper and eating well.

The 38th president was hospitalized briefly last month for a bad cold when undergoing routine medical tests. Ford suffered two small strokes in 2000 and a dizzy spell on a golf course in 2003.

The former chief executive served in the White House from 1974 to 1977, taking the oath of office after Richard M. Nixon resigned during the Watergate scandal. Nixon had appointed Ford as vice president in 1973 when Spiro T. Agnew resigned.

Ford has lived in Rancho Mirage with his wife, Betty, for nearly three decades.

Hard Line State (WSJ)

By Steve H. Hanke And Stephen J.k. Walters

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BALTIMORE -- In Big Labor's war against Wal-Mart, "collateral damage" -- in the form of lost jobs and income for the poor -- is starting to add up. Of course, since the unions and their legislative allies claim that their motive is to liberate people from exploitation by Wal-Mart, these unintended effects are often ignored.

Here in Maryland, however, that's getting hard to do. The consequences of our legislature's override of Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich's veto of their "Fair Share Health Care Act" on Jan. 12 will be tragic for some of the state's neediest residents. The law will force companies that employ over 10,000 to spend at least 8% of their payroll on health care or kick any shortfall into a special state fund. Wal-Mart would be the only employer in the state to be affected.

Almost surely, therefore, the company will pull the plug on plans to build a distribution center that would have employed 800 in Somerset County, on Maryland's picturesque Eastern Shore. As a Wal-Mart spokesman has put it, "you have to take a step back and call into question how business-friendly is a state like Maryland when they pass a bill that . . . takes a swipe at one company that provides 15,000 jobs."

Unfortunately, in Somerset, the new law looks more like a body blow than a "swipe." The rural county is Maryland's poorest, with per capita personal income 46% below the state average and a poverty rate 130% above it. Somerset's enduring problem is weak labor demand that greatly limits its 25,250 residents' economic opportunities.

DOJ_NMG_0012024

There are just 0.8 jobs per household in Somerset, barely half the 1.5 figure that applies to the rest of the state. Somerset's top-10 list of employers features sectors like food services (average annual compensation per employee: $9,637), poultry and egg production ($14,320) and seafood preparation and packaging ($19,190).

It is hard to exaggerate how much the planned distribution center might have meant to Somerset's economy. Using an input/output model, we forecast the "ripple effects" of the new income and spending which could have emanated from Wal-Mart's facility as follows:

• The center's 800 employees would have created an additional 282 jobs among "upstream" suppliers and "downstream" retailers and service establishments; all told, the center would have boosted county employment by 14% and private-sector employment by 20%.

• Total annual employee compensation in Somerset would have risen by $46.5 million, or 19%.

• Annual output (or "gross county product") would have risen by $128.3 million, or 19%.

• State and local tax receipts would have increased by $19.2 million annually; this would include $8.5 million in property taxes, $5.6 million in sales taxes and $1.4 million in personal income taxes.

Those losses, though dramatic, probably understate the full extent of the damage in this case. They do not include foregone employment and income from construction of the facility and related infrastructure improvements. What is more, Wal-Mart's tentative plans for a second distribution center in Garrett County, in mountainous western Maryland, also appear dead. Garrett, with a poverty rate that is 70% above the state's, is only slightly better off than Somerset.

How could our legislators turn a blind eye to such areas? Partly, of course, they are simply eager for Big Labor's votes and money and therefore subservient to its interests. The Service Employees International Union actually helped draft what became known as the "Wal-Mart bill." Unable -- so far -- to organize workers at the company, the union's immediate national strategy is to limit Wal-Mart's competitive reach by raising its costs. Maryland was a shrewdly chosen place to kick off this campaign.

Some estimate that as much as a third of the state's economic activity stems from federal employment and purchases. Over 150,000 Marylanders -- six times the population of tiny Somerset -- are on the federal (non-military) payroll; they are concentrated in central Maryland, near the nation's capital. Nearly 268,000 more Marylanders draw checks from state and local government.

With so many workers in a sector where revenues appear to arrive automatically and inefficiency never leads to bankruptcy, our state's resulting political culture is quite predictable. Many Marylanders are simply unmindful of the necessities of survival in the private sector: pleasing customers, controlling costs and satisfying shareholders. Thanks to the federal tax dollars collected from the rest of the country and spent in Maryland, the prevailing view of economic reality is inverted: The public sector is seen as the engine of prosperity, with the private one along for the ride.

Reflecting this culture, our legislators often behave as if business is a problem to be solved. On Jan. 17, they also overrode a gubernatorial veto of a $1-per-hour increase in the state's minimum wage. Like the health-care mandate, the hike is a job-killer -- though not in affluent areas of the state, where strong labor demand long ago pushed the going wage above the minimum. In those areas, the law is largely symbolic and enables well-meaning voters and legislators to conclude that they are "doing something for working families." Safely out of their view, however, at Maryland's impoverished margins, already-weak labor demand will be further diminished.

What remains to be seen is whether Maryland will be a leading political indicator or an anomaly, for Wal-Mart bills have been drafted in 33 other states. Emboldened by success here, lawmakers in some states have set the threshold for companies to be hit with mandated health benefits as low as 1,000 workers.

In these upcoming battles, legislators should be mindful that companies like Wal-Mart are not the enemy but rather front-line soldiers in a real war on poverty. The profit motive leads them to seek out areas where there is much idle labor and put it to work. Where they are prevented or discouraged from doing so, the alternative job prospect is rarely a cushy spot in the bureaucracy. Rather, it is continued idleness and hardship.

Mr. Hanke, a professor of applied economics at Johns Hopkins University, served as a member of the Governor's Council of Economic Advisers in Maryland (1976-77). Mr. Walters is a professor of economics at Loyola College in Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0012025

Palestinian Premier, Cabinet Resigns (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and his Cabinet ministers submitted their resignations Thursday as the Islamic militant group Hamas appeared to have captured a large majority of seats in the Palestinian elections — a shocking upset sure to throw Mideast peacemaking into turmoil.

"This is the choice of the people. It should be respected," Qureia said. "If it's true (the results), then the president should ask Hamas to form a new government. For me, personally, I sent my resignation."

Under the law, Abbas must ask the largest party in the new parliament — presumably Hamas — to form the next government. Abbas was elected separately a year ago and remains president.

Hamas said before the election it does not want to govern alone, and would prefer to bring Fatah into a coalition. Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar said Thursday that the group will declare its intentions after official results are announced later in the day.

Israel and the United States have said they would not deal with a Hamas-led Palestinian government. Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas has said he would step down if he could no longer pursue his peace agenda with Israel.

Palestinian election officials said on condition of anonymity that Hamas had won a large majority of the 66 seats up for grabs in electoral districts in the West Bank and Gaza. Half the seats in Wednesday's parliament vote were chosen on a national list and the other half by districts.

The Central Election Commission said the vote count had not been completed and that it would make an official announcement at 7 p.m. Thursday.

Hamas' top candidate Ismail Haniyeh earlier said the group had won about 70 total seats in the 132-seat parliament, based on reporting by Hamas activists who observed the counting in the polling stations. Later in the day, another Hamas official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the number had risen to at least 75.

Officials with Fatah conceded that Hamas had won about 70 total seats. They also spoke on condition of anonymity because counting in some districts was continuing.

Initial exit polls on Wednesday night had forecast a slight edge for Fatah, with Hamas coming in a strong second. The polls predicted that neither Hamas nor Fatah would have enough seats to form a government alone, and would have to rely on smaller parties to form a coalition.

The discrepancy between the exit polls and the results provided by officials on Thursday was apparently due to voting in districts, where Hamas was apparently able to capitalize on divisions within Fatah.

A senior Fatah member, Saeb Erekat, said he could not confirm the unofficial results, but blamed Israel's refusal to resume peace talks with a Fatah-led government for the party's poor showing.

"Israel has declared us non-partners about four years ago and they were not speaking to our elected president," he told Israel Army Radio. "Everybody was blaming Fatah for every mistake in the world. Everybody was tying our hands and our legs and throwing us into the sea. And now I think all these things, including our mistakes in Fatah, led to this result."

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Wednesday, before Hamas claimed victory, that Israel cannot trust a Palestinian leadership in which the Islamic group has a role, according to a statement by his office.

"Israel can't accept a situation in which Hamas, in its present form as a terror group calling for the destruction of Israel, will be part of the Palestinian Authority without disarming," Olmert told U.S. Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record) in a meeting, according to Olmert's office. "I won't hold negotiations with a government that does not stick to its most basic obligation of fighting terror."

Israel is willing to help the Palestinians and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "a great deal" but only if they crack down on militants, Olmert said.

Israel has repeatedly asked Abbas to force Hamas and other militant groups to disarm but Abbas has refused, warning such an act could cause civil war. Hamas has committed dozens of suicide bombings against Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0012026

President Bush told The Wall Street Journal in an interview Wednesday that the United States will not deal with Hamas until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel.

The election Wednesday was the Palestinians' first truly competitive vote, with Hamas contesting a parliamentary vote for the first time and winning considerable clout. Hundreds of thousands of Palestinians flooded polling stations throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip for a vote that would determine how Palestinians wanted to be governed and whether they would pursue negotiations or confrontation with Israel.

Long lines formed at polling stations, and 77.7 percent of 1.3 million eligible voters cast ballots. Under a compromise with Israel, some Arabs in east Jerusalem were allowed to cast absentee ballots at post offices in the disputed city, and voting was extended there by two hours because postal workers were slow.

Routine power cuts in the Gaza Strip town of Khan Younis forced election workers to count ballots by candlelight.

"Whoever is the winner, it's a great victory for the Palestinians in general because partnership starts from this minute," said Samer Lulu, 29, a merchant who voted in Gaza City.

Hamas' success has alarmed Israel and the West, but Abbas has argued that luring the group, which has been behind dozens of deadly attacks on Israel, into politics would tame it and increase the chances for peace. The election will usher in a new parliament and Cabinet, but Abbas, who was elected president last year, will remain head of the Palestinian Authority regardless of the results.

"We are coming into a new phase. In this phase, we are calling for the international community to help us return to the negotiating table with the Israelis, conclude the peace process and implement it," Abbas said after the voting ended.

Palestinians were given the day off to vote, and the election was held in a celebratory atmosphere that was rare in the recent years of fighting with Israel. Some activists covered their cars with red carnations and others blasted campaign songs from car stereos and storefront speakers.

Campaign posters hung on nearly every wall, dangled from electric lines over the street and were plastered to the hoods of cars. Some children ran through the streets wearing the green flag of Hamas as a cape. Others wore the black-and-white checkered scarf of Fatah.

Some 13,500 police officers guarded the 1,008 polling stations to prevent gunmen from disrupting the vote, and there were no reports of major violence. In the West Bank's Balata refugee camp, militants who had threatened to burn down polling stations checked their assault rifles at the door with a flourish and peacefully voted.

Hoping to harness a wave of discontent with Fatah, Hamas ran an anti-corruption campaign, calling its party Reform and Change.

"We've reached the worst. The most important thing now is change," said Raed Abu Hamam, 35, a construction worker in Gaza's Beach camp who said he has lost faith in Fatah.

Fatah appealed for another chance to clean up the government and expand an economy shattered by nearly five years of fighting with Israel. Many Fatah voters said they were grudgingly supporting the party out of old loyalties.

"The Palestinian Authority did nothing for us. People here have no jobs, while people in the PA got millions of dollars," said Ali Taha, 35, a laborer in the Amari refugee camp in Ramallah, who voted for Fatah anyway.

Though the election appeared likely to turn on internal issues, the results will have deep implications for future peace efforts with Israel.

Abbas said Wednesday he is prepared to resume peace talks, even if Hamas joins his government. Hamas is expected to ask for service ministries — health, education and welfare — and to leave diplomacy to others.

"We are ready to negotiate," Abbas said. "We are partners with the Israelis. They don't have the right to choose their partner."

Israel says it will not deal with Hamas until it disarms. But Haniyeh said the group had no intention of laying down its arms after the elections. Another candidate, Mahmoud Zahar, said his group is "not going to change a single word" in its covenant calling for Israel's destruction.

Palestinian Government Resigns In Wake Of Hamas Win (CNN)

CNN.com, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012027

RAMALLAH, West Bank (CNN) -- In a stunning development ahead of official election results, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qorie said he and the rest of the Palestinian Authority government will resign in the wake of militant group Hamas' apparent victory in historic elections.

The announcement was an acknowledgment that election results showed Hamas had won a majority of seats in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council, supplanting the ruling Fatah party.

Qorie's office said it will be up to Hamas to form a new government.

"It's the choice of the people and it should be respected," Qorie said. "I think, if the majority is approved and has been reached, I think Hamas should form a new government, it's true. The president should ask Hamas to form a new government.

"For me personally, I sent my resignation to the president to enable him to choose a new prime minister," Qorie said.

Initial election results are scheduled to be released Thursday at 7 p.m. (noon ET).

Exit polls earlier had shown Hamas thrusting itself into the center of Palestinian politics but had not indicated an outright majority win by the group.

The exit poll from Bir Zeit University, a respected Palestinian school, showed Fatah garnered 46.4 percent of the vote and Hamas won 39.8 percent in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council. That translates into 63 seats for Fatah and 58 for Hamas, according to the exit poll.

But other polls showed Hamas claiming a slim majority, a claim echoed by some Hamas officials, prompting a warning from Jerusalem.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel could not accept a situation in which Hamas in its current configuration -- committed to the destruction of Israel -- was a part of the Palestinian Authority.

"I will not negotiate with a government that does not meet its most basic obligations -- to fight terrorism. We are prepared to assist the Palestinians and Abu Mazen (Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas) very much but they must meet their commitments," Olmert said, according to a statement released by his office.

The European Union, meanwhile, said it was prepared to work with any government -- to a point.

"We are prepared to work with any Palestinian government, if this government seeks peace, using peaceful means," said Benita Ferrero-Waldner, EU external relations commissioner.

Hamas, which boycotted the last election in 1996, capitalized on widespread dissatisfaction with what is seen as corruption within the Palestinian Authority and Fatah, and a perceived inability by the authority to manage the affairs of the Palestinians.

Fatah was formed in 1965 by longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who died in November 2004, and dominated Palestinian politics for decades as the mainstream Palestinian nationalist movement.

"Mostly, they were voting for opposition and voting against Fatah -- against corruption, against nepotism, against the failure of the peace process, and against the lack of leadership," said Mustafa Barghouti with the Palestinian National Initiative, a democratic opposition movement.

He added: "Today (Wednesday) was a great day for Palestine. This is the best democratic practice ever in the Arab world." (Watch Gaza residents talk about why election day is so important -- 2:32)

Hamas has called for the destruction of Israel and carried out numerous terrorists attacks that have killed scores of Israelis over the years. The group is listed as a terrorist group by the U.S. State Department.Turnout near 78 percent

Election officials estimated about 77.7 percent of the eligible 1.3 million voters turned out to cast their ballots at more than 1,000 polling stations. Voting closed around 7 p.m. (noon ET) in Gaza and the West Bank, and it was extended in predominantly Arab east Jerusalem for two hours to accommodate heavy turnout. (Watch how preliminary results divide up seats -- 3:05)

Among those who joined the voters were Abbas and Mahmoud Zahar, the leader of Hamas. Militant Palestinian groups had agreed to a cease-fire during the voting, and there were no reports of major violence.

"We are embarking on a new era, and we call on the international community to help us return to the negotiating table with the Israelis, to conclude a peace agreement and implement it," Abbas said at the end of the election.

Palestinian Foreign Minister Nasser al-Kidwa told CNN: "It's a happy day. There is no doubt about that. And I think that the Palestinian people are generally happy because of this." (Read how the vote demonstrates Palestinians' will to flex their political muscle)'Monopoly ... is finished'

At polling sites in Gaza, many voters jubilantly waved the green flag of Hamas and expressed anger at Fatah.

"Fatah hasn't done anything for us, for our children," said one Hamas voter at a polling site in Gaza.

Another said: "Fatah only helps itself. We want to see what Hamas can do for us."

Naila Ayesh and her husband, Jamal, said they are worried about the message Hamas is sending to Palestinians. Naila said Hamas told women if they didn't vote for the militant group that "at the end, God will punish you."

The couple voted for Third Way, a secular, pro-reform party. Jamal said the days when Fatah called the shots are over.

"Monopoly of the political system is finished," he said.

The results of the election were being closely monitored by the United States and European Union, both of which have threatened to cut aid if Hamas becomes part of the government.

The U.S. State Department was blunt.

"We view Hamas as a terrorist organization. We don't deal with Hamas. And under the current circumstances, I don't see that changing," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan was more cautious: "We'll see what the election results are. I'm not going to play a what-if scenario here."Impact on the peace process?

There have been talks about a power-sharing coalition, in which Fatah maintains the more political posts and Hamas has lower-level ministry positions.

Asked how Palestinians could move forward with peacemaking with Israel, al-Kidwa told CNN, "Maybe this is one of the reasons why we prefer not to have it in the government at this stage."

He added: "We have to maintain making peace with Israel as a priority. Actually, this is in our interest, in the interests of the Palestinian people. We need to reach final settlement with Israelis."

Zahar, the head of Hamas, earlier in the day left open the possibility of forming a coalition with Fatah, as well as the possibility of future negotiations with Israel, under certain conditions. (Watch Hamas attempt to redefine its image -- 2:51)

Zahar said his goals include reconstruction of areas he said have been destroyed by years of Israeli occupation and corruption, and the rebuilding of the Palestinian infrastructure.

He said he would be open to negotiations with Israel, but only if the Israelis enter into talks with good will and respect for the rights of Palestinians.

"We are not going to meet them just for meeting," Zahar told a throng of reporters after casting his own ballot. Previously, he said, many meetings have been held but "ended with nothing."

Asked if Hamas would ever recognize Israel, Zahar replied: "Never."

On the eve of the voting, Israel's Olmert had this message for Palestinians: "Do not choose extremists who have led them from tragedy to tragedy and to misery."

No Clear Victor In Palestinian Vote (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

JERUSALEM -- After a strong showing by the militant Islamic group Hamas in yesterday's Palestinian legislative election, the U.S. and Israel vowed again to have no contact with any of its members who are blacklisted as terrorists.

The reality on the ground suggests a more nuanced -- and pragmatic -- policy may loom, though.

Yesterday's vote by more than 70% of the 1.4 million eligible voters proceeded without violence or other major disruptions. According to Beir Zeit University's exit poll, the ruling Fatah party emerged victorious with 46% of the vote and Hamas captured about 40%, making its Reform and Change party the second-most popular among voters. Independent parties accounted for the difference. Final results are expected today.

The balloting marks a watershed for Palestinians, Israel and the U.S. -- and a pivotal moment in a conflict that has roiled the Middle East for decades. The legislative election was the first for Palestinians since 1996 and opens a new era of multiparty politics. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas now has the opportunity to appoint a new prime minister and government cabinet. The effort is expected to be marked by intense coalition negotiations among his Fatah party, Hamas and the scattering of independent parties.

DOJ_NMG_0012029

If Hamas joins Mr. Abbas's new government, it will have an enormous impact on the future contours of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and any resolution of it. The group's official manifesto calls for the destruction of Israel and the creation of an Islamic state in its place. Yesterday, Hamas's top two leaders repeated their strident positions, saying the group has no intention of laying down its weapons after the vote and that its core goals remained unchanged.

Though the U.S. and Israel acquiesced in Hamas's participation in the election, their response to its possible role in Palestinian government has been far chillier. Yesterday, President Bush said in an interview with The Wall Street Journal that he won't deal with any Hamas leaders until the organization renounces its call for the elimination of Israel. Similarly, Israeli officials have vowed to have no official contact with Hamas members. For the U.S., the situation is complicated by a law banning U.S. individuals from providing any form of material support to terrorist groups and their members.

Even so, Israel, and to a lesser degree the U.S., may find the no-contact policy difficult to maintain. In addition to the Palestinian legislature, many West Bank cities are now managed by Hamas officials voted in over the past year. Because Israel supplies many of these cities with electricity and sewage, informal and low-level ties already exist in many areas.

Consider the case of Hisham al-Masri, the new deputy mayor of Qalqilya, a city of 45,000 Palestinians just a short drive from Tel Aviv. A devout Islamist who says Israel has no right to exist, Mr. al-Masri was elected on a platform of clean and efficient government. When he took office last year, he inherited some $4 million of debt owed to Israel's state-owned electricity company. In the months that followed, Mr. al-Masri met regularly with executives from the power company to discuss repayment.

"There is no choice but to speak with them. Our city needs electricity, and we have to pay for it," Mr. al-Masri says. To facilitate the delicate process, Mr. al-Masri and his counterparts hold most of their meetings at the city's edge near an Israeli liaison office staffed by Israel Defense Force personnel.

Though purely administrative, such encounters could become a model for extended contacts in the future. Ehud Yaari, a prominent Israeli political commentator, argues that such contacts could presage a broad policy shift down the road. "Maybe it will be called the political Hamas or Hamas inside the parliament, but the day is approaching when Israeli representatives will sit and talk with Hamas representatives," he said in a recent TV commentary.

Mr. Yaari and other political analysts say the need for an eventual dialogue with Hamas reflects a less-noticed reality. Amid the stark chaos that has enveloped the Palestinian Authority and Fatah in recent years, Hamas emerged as a model of discipline and order on the street, able to mobilize and corral its supporters in ways Fatah no longer can match. That discipline, many analysts say, means Hamas could prove more useful than Fatah in upholding any future cease fire that both sides have been gently speculating about in recent weeks.

The emphasis on internal discipline was reflected across the West Bank yesterday. At polling stations, Hamas supporters set up tents with computers and offered training to voters on how to check the ballots. In the run-up to the election, some Hamas members had talked about their possible ambitions in government, saying they would like to focus their efforts on revamping and improving aspects of government, such as welfare and education, that have the maximum impact on daily Palestinian life and little to no contact with Israel.

Write to Karby Leggett at karby.leggett@wsj.com1

About 1 Million People Vote For Palestinian Parliament Terror Group Hamas Takes On Ruling Fatah Party In Elections (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — About 1 million Palestinians voted Wednesday in parliamentary elections that threaten to end the ruling Fatah Party's decade-long monopoly over Palestinian politics.

The elections for 132 seats in the Palestinian Legislative Council pitted the terrorist Islamic Hamas group against Fatah, founded by Yasser Arafat and President Mahmoud Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0012030

About 78% of the 1.3 million eligible Palestinians cast their ballots for one of 11 parties, according to the Palestinian Central Elections Commission.

Participation was higher than the 75% turnout in the last parliamentary elections in 1996. Hamas boycotted that vote.

Hamas, which rejects the existence of Israel and is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations, wants to get members into parliament to press the Palestinian Authority to take a tougher stance against Israel.

In an interview Wednesday with Al-Jazeera, the Arabic satellite network, top Hamas candidate Ismail Hania hailed the dawn of "a new reality after five years of (a Palestinian uprising)."

Hania said "Oslo was killed," referring the accord reached in that city in 1993 that led to peace talks with Israel and created the Palestinian Authority.

But Hamas' No. 2 candidate, Mohammad Abu Teir, said last week his group does not "rule out negotiations" with Israel.

Hamas focused its campaign less on fighting Israel than on Palestinian issues, such as government corruption.

Last week, the European Commission announced it would suspend half of its aid to the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Authority, citing a lack of budgetary discipline. Abbas' party, in control for 12 years, also has failed to stem increasing lawlessness in Gaza and the West Bank.

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, who was among a team of international observers monitoring the vote, warned that "if Hamas becomes part of the executive branch with government portfolios … then it precludes us doing business with the Palestinian Authority."

In a reference to Hamas after the polls closed, President Bush told The Wall Street Journal, "Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

Speaking to reporters in Ramallah in the West Bank, Abbas tried to assuage concerns about a politically empowered Hamas.

"We are ready to negotiate" with Israel, the Palestinian president said.

Whatever the outcome, Abbas — elected a year ago — will remain president. However, the composition of the parliament and Cabinet could change dramatically.

Lines of voters curled outside polling stations in the West Bank and Gaza. In East Jerusalem, voters cast absentee ballots at six post offices that served as polling centers.

After voting at the an-Najah Girls School in Ramallah, which served as a polling station, Muntasser Hamdan, 23, said, "We must vote Fatah because this is the party that has led this people for 40 years."

A few feet away, clad in the emerald green that symbolizes Islam and Hamas, Fadi Ahmad, 28, said he voted for Hamas because "it gives us everything: religion and truth."

Undaunted by his party's historic antagonism toward Israel, Ahmad said, "If Israel doesn't bother us, we won't bother it."

Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 25 -- Hamas won a large share of the vote Wednesday as Palestinians selected their first new parliament in a decade, but appeared to fall short of deposing the governing Fatah movement as the leading party in the legislature, according to an exit poll conducted in coordination with the Palestinian election commission.

The poll showed that neither Fatah nor Hamas achieved a majority in the 132-seat legislature, meaning that the next Palestinian cabinet will be made up of a coalition of parties. But by gaining near-parity with Fatah in the parliament, Hamas -- formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement -- will have a major role in the Palestinian Authority and complicate efforts to revive a dormant U.S.-backed peace plan that runs counter to the party's campaign platform in key respects.

The poll, conducted by Bir Zeit University, projected Fatah winning 63 seats and Hamas 58 seats, leaving the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and an assortment of leftist and independent parties far behind.

DOJ_NMG_0012031

A second poll, by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, also conducted in coordination with the election commission, showed Fatah winning 58 seats to Hamas's 53. But the poll said that at least eight seats remained too close to call. Official results were expected Thursday.

"We knew that Hamas had this strength," said Ghassan Khatib, the Palestinian Authority's planning minister, who does not belong to either party. "Having them inside the council, abiding by its laws and regulations, hopefully will be better than having them outside. Now competition will be based on legal politics, rather than outside the law in the streets."

Election officials and observers reported no serious problems from either Israeli security measures or Palestinian factional rivalry that had threatened to disrupt voting in several cities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The officials said 77 percent of the 1.3 million registered Palestinian voters cast ballots on a brisk day, far surpassing the turnout in last year's presidential race.

In an initial assessment, a member of one international observer mission described the voting as "a generally smooth process with only sporadic violence and a robust turnout." The observer from the National Democratic Institute/Carter Center delegation, who declined to be named because of the preliminary nature of his evaluation, said his team had received only isolated reports of problems with voting materials.

The only apparent violation, the observer said, was the active campaigning that occurred throughout the day despite a Palestinian election law that requires campaigning to end 24 hours before the start of voting. But because all parties appeared to be violating the rule, the observer said, "at this point it doesn't appear to be a serious impediment to the election."

The atmosphere was celebratory here in Ramallah, where cars bearing the green banners of Hamas or the black-and-white kaffiyehs of Fatah jammed the streets. Each party appeared to have well-organized efforts to ensure its supporters made it to the polls.

The last parliamentary voting, in 1996, led to a Fatah-dominated legislature, which has now been expanded by 50 percent. Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority and leader of Fatah, postponed the elections in July to secure an election law more favorable to his party.

At the El Bireh Girls Secondary School, Hamas supporters set up a card table with a bound voter-registration list and laptop computer loaded with a database of all voters and their assigned polling stations. Hamas activists said they were helping anyone who had questions, not just those who supported their movement.

"I saw Hamas closer to the people, closer to the feelings and problems of the people," said Hassan Hamudah, 44, a Hamas supporter who works for the Palestinian Water Authority. "They are honest men. The others have made many promises, but we have only seen corruption."

Hamas has built its popularity over the years through patient political organizing, charity work and an unyielding position regarding Israel. The party's charter calls for Israel's destruction, and Hamas's armed wing has carried out numerous deadly attacks on Israeli civilians, police and soldiers.

The secular Fatah movement is suffering from generational divisions and a reputation for corrupt, ineffective government.

Abbas, who has threatened to resign as president if he is unable to carry out his program after the elections, will now appoint a prime minister who must form a cabinet approved by the parliament. Although it is theoretically possible that Hamas could form the next government, it is expected that Fatah would be invited to do so and join with the nationalist and leftist parties to forge a parliamentary majority.

As the main faction in the Palestine Liberation Organization, Fatah joined with Israel to endorse the 1993 Oslo accords and the U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map," signed in 2003. The plan has been frozen because of the Palestinian uprising, but each side has pledged to return to its phased framework for creation of an independent Palestinian state.

Hamas, on the other hand, has pledged to maintain its military wing, which Israel says must be dismantled before new peace talks take place under the road map. It is unclear how much influence Hamas could exert over a future peace process since it is not a member of the PLO, although its strong showing could hasten talks to bring the group inside the organization.

Hamas supporters say the party, which Israel, the United States and Europe classify as a terrorist organization, will concentrate on political and educational reform before moving on to issues of peace and diplomacy. Israeli and U.S. officials have warned that its presence in government could undermine diplomatic initiatives and imperil foreign aid.

DOJ_NMG_0012032

President Bush, in an interview Wednesday with the Wall Street Journal, lauded the democratic trend that produced the Palestinian elections but said Hamas would not be a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounced its call for the destruction of Israel.

"A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," Bush said. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

In a school adjacent to the al-Amari refugee camp, Ahmad Safi not only cast his vote for Fatah but draped the movement's black-and-white kaffiyeh across his shoulders against the cold.

"Historically, this is the movement that has given the most to the Palestinian cause," said Safi, 42, who works for the Fatah-run Interior Ministry and spent a dozen years in Israeli prisons.

Cars decked with banners and posters of Hamas green, Fatah yellow and the red of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine clogged the street in front of him. Many of the parties rented collective taxis to ferry their supporters to the polls.

"They are secular and democratic," he said of Fatah. "The proof of this is that we are now in pluralistic elections."

The Israeli police presence was heavy in Arab East Jerusalem, where roughly 6,000 of the 120,000 Palestinians eligible to vote in the city were expected to cast ballots. Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, agreed to allow voting to proceed in Jerusalem, which both Israelis and Palestinians claim as their capital, but prohibited the participation of Hamas.

Palestinian election officials extended voting in East Jerusalem for two hours, saying long lines caused by Israeli security measures prevented many from casting ballots on time.

In a statement issued after polls closed, Hamas officials accused Fatah of rigging the vote in the city.

At the post office on Salahudeen Street near the Old City's Damascus Gate, members of the governing party's youth movement chanted "Your blood is Fatah" from the steps and passed out lists with the names of the party's local and national candidates.

"It's good that all factions are participating in this," said Omar Bazian, 56, a Fatah supporter from the Old City. "Never mind losing some power -- this is a vote for the future."

On the other side of the separation barrier erected by the Israeli government, a cluster of Hamas flags flew from the dome of a mosque along the wide, worn avenue into the West Bank town of Abu Dis. The 24-foot-high wall, sealing what was once the main road from Jerusalem to Jericho, is covered with candidate posters and graffiti, including "This Wall Must Fall" in English.

"We're telling people Islam is the solution," said Radi Johar, 29, who was passing out Hamas candidate pamphlets in the dirt street outside a crowded polling station. "We are victorious, whether we win or not, since we are raising the flag of Islam."

Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party eked out a narrow victory over the militant movement Hamas in parliamentary elections yesterday but will be unable to govern alone, exit polls showed.

The news sent carloads of Fatah faithful streaming into Gaza City's central square to celebrate, firing guns and honking horns in a deafening display. Hamas followers were strangely absent from the streets, even in their political stronghold.

Nevertheless, Hamas' strong challenge to the long-ruling party of Yasser Arafat in its first attempt at parliamentary politics is bound to change the face of Palestinian politics and the Middle East peace process.

To achieve a legislative majority, Mr. Abbas will have to choose between forming an unstable coalition government with smaller independent parties or forming a broad coalition with Hamas -- which has transformed itself from a small militant underground group dedicated to Israel's destruction.

Both Israel and the United States have refused to deal with a government that includes Hamas until it renounces violence and abandons a constitution that calls for Israel's destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0012033

"You're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility," President Bush said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal published yesterday. "And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

Hamas in recent days had hinted at a willingness to consider a negotiated settlement with the Jewish state. But the Associated Press last night quoted Hamas' top parliamentary candidate, Ismail Haniyeh, saying the group had no intention of laying down its arms. And another leading candidate, Mahmoud Zahar, said Hamas was "not going to change a single word" in its charter.

An exit poll by Birzeit University in Ramallah showed Fatah winning 63 seats in the 132-member parliament and Hamas taking 58 seats, the AP reported. A second survey showed Fatah beating Hamas by 58 seats to 53.

The Palestinian election commission said yesterday's turnout was about 78 percent, compared to the 52 percent of registered voters who turned out in the 2002 U.S. congressional elections.

For Fatah and Mr. Abbas, heirs of the political movement that served as the foundation of modern Palestinian nationalism, the disappointing results are likely to deepen a crisis triggered by the death of Mr. Arafat.

"It's not pleasant news for Fatah, and it's encouraging news for Hamas," said Birzeit political science professor Basem Ezbidi.

"It's an indication that the Palestinian Liberation Organization has failed historically. This project of the PLO since 1965 did not work, and the people have chosen Hamas."

The vote was proclaimed a "milestone" in Palestinian history by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh, whose party boycotted the first parliamentary vote in 1995 because it was a direct result of the Oslo peace negotiations with Israel. The party decided not to challenge Mr. Abbas in a presidential ballot last year.

Mr. Abbas, for his part, hailed the peaceful conduct of the election, which saw largely celebratory crowds enjoying fair weather and a holiday atmosphere in which shops and offices were shut.

"We are so happy with this election festival," said Mr. Abbas, who added that the Palestinian Authority remains a partner for peace negotiations with Israel.

In a pointed reference to Israel's refusal to negotiate with any government that included Hamas, Mr. Abbas said it was not for the Jewish state to dictate who its counterparts are.

The hundreds of foreign election monitors who observed the voting reported few irregularities.

"People are voting in peace," said Cypriot monitor Eleni Theochapous.

"I was monitoring elections in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Compared with the Palestinians, I don't think there is that much of a difference. I saw homeless people voting three times. Here you can't do that because of the ink on your hands."

Palestinians Cast Historic Vote (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher And Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

BETHLEHEM AND RAMALLAH, WEST BANK; KHAN YOUNIS, GAZA STRIP - Palestinians streamed into more than 1,000 polling stations Wednesday in the first parliamentary election in a decade, one that will determine the shape of future prospects for returning to peace talks with Israel.

The ballot itself is largely viewed as a reality check over who Palestinians want steering them into that future: secular Fatah Party, the ruling faction that brought the Palestinian Authority (PA) into being through its willingness to negotiate with Israel, or Islamic Hamas, which stands by suicide bombings and other attacks as its way of facing off with the Jewish state.

Three hours after the polls closed, different organizations released varying figures. Al Arabiyeh, the Arab satellite channel, estimated that of the 132 seats, Fatah won 65 and Hamas won 48. But Al Jazeera, quoting an exit poll carried out by Bir Zeit University near Ramallah, showed Fatah winning 63 seats and Hamas winning 58.

Exit polls suggest that small parties and independent candidates attracted more supporters than expected, and many of these would be natural coalition partners of Fatah.

DOJ_NMG_0012034

These potential allies of Fatah include the Third Way Party, led by former finance minister Salaam Fayyad and Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi, as well as a liberal, progressive party led by Dr. Mustafa Barghouti.

Official results were expected to be released Thursday. Divided between militant, moderate

Given recent unrest in the West Bank and Gaza, the elections were carried out without any major incidents of violence or disruptions at polling stations.

Still, many campaign activists bent the rules, ignoring a prohibition on any electioneering outside the voting places. Hadija Jadour and Samah Jarah passed out campaign cards to voters who made their way up the dirt road into a girls' school in Obediyeh, a West Bank municipality east of Bethlehem.

The women describe themselves as friends, but the black-and-white keffiyeh-style sash that Ms. Jadour wears stands in contrast to the green one around Ms. Jarah's veil. That seems to say it all: Palestinians are deeply divided over who should lead and how.

The keffiyah marks Jadour's support for Fatah, while Jarah's green ribbon shows the world, as she puts it, "I love Hamas."

Explains Jarah: "Hamas has always been the center of the resistance, and they are working on giving assistance to people and developing our society."

"It's not true," argues Jadour, smiling wryly at her friend's comment. "Fatah is the one who established the Palestinian Authority in the first place. Fatah wants to solve things in a diplomatic way, not by violence."

Asked if they discuss these issues often, the women grin and look in different directions. "We don't go into politics," says Jarah, "or it might ruin the good relationship we have."

That dynamic, pitting friend against friend, and even brother against brother, was repeated throughout the Palestinian territories. Among the more famed divisions, one of the senior-most members of the Fatah, Jibril Rajoub, who long served as the West Bank security czar for the PA, was running against his own brother, Naif Rajoub, an Islamic religious figure who is high on the list of candidates for Hamas.

"Let's remember that the decision to hold new elections was made by us in Fatah, to reestablish the legitimacy of the regime. But I'm sure both of us will win," Jibril Rajoub says, speaking of his brother. "There's nothing wrong with having him, as part of Hamas, in the government. I'm proud of that."

But Hamas isn't sure that it's actually prepared to be part of a government led by Fatah - particularly one with plans to carve out peace with Israel.

One top candidate in Hamas, interviewed in Ramallah, says that Hamas is keeping its options open. It may decide to join Fatah and be a partner in the PA, or it may decide to instead play the role of a feisty opposition party, blocking attempts to make concessions in negotiations with Israel. Equally interesting, however, may be what Hamas plans to do domestically with its bolstered muscle and putative legitimacy.

"We want to clean the internal Palestinian house, to put an end to corruption in the Palestinian Authority, and to bring to justice those who have stolen from the people," says Ahmad Abdel-Aziz Mubarek, a Ramallah candidate for Hamas. "The Authority sometimes banned Hamas people from getting jobs and harassed them. We will put an end to that." The Gaza situation

Driving much of the dissatisfaction with the PA is the lawlessness that has gripped Gaza since Israeli disengagement last year. At a polling station there, a spurt of machine-gun fire rang out. Voters and election workers barely flinched as sporadic gunfire has become all too common in the coastal strip.

There was plenty else to fuel the anxiety. Hamas leader Mahmoud az-Zahar predicted there would be voter fraud, and last month a Fatah primary in Gaza was cancelled because of attacks on voting booths. But voting Wednesday was festive nonetheless. Banners of Fatah yellow and Hamas green fluttered from taxis and minivans ferrying groups of voters to the polls.

"Congratulations, Palestine for the day of democracy, the day of freedom," crooned a singer on a radio station.

In the southern Gaza town of Rafah, voters cast ballots at a school surrounded by bullet-ravaged buildings, a grim reminder of the five-year Israeli war against the Palestinians.

Atidal Hafagah says the outer wall of her house was once destroyed by the Israelis, but life has improved since the September withdrawal of Israeli settlers from Gaza. A black hijab covering her face, Hafagah says she voted for Hamas, which she thought would rid the PA of corruption and institute Islamic rule. Hamas to promote Islamic law

DOJ_NMG_0012035

Indeed, Mr. Mubarek says that Hamas gradually will change Palestinian society so that it conforms with Islamic law, or sharia. For example, he says, Hamas will see to it that the casino in Jericho will be closed down, since gambling is forbidden in Islam.

He says that it should be mandatory that people give zakkat, or charity, which is one of a Muslim's five major religious duties. "Christians will pay a different kind of tax," he adds, "and we will consider Christians as full citizens. We will deal with the minorities in Palestine according to Islamic rules."

Campaign pledges like these may have attracted some voters, but they quickly turn others off - including other Muslims.

At the Deheishe Refugee Camp in Bethlehem, secular Palestinians were trying to round up support for a leftist party, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, one of 11 lists in the race.

"Hamas wants an Islamic state, not a Palestinian state," says Mohammed Ramadan, a schoolteacher who was dismayed by growing support for Hamas. "We believe we need to build our state with a political and social program, without imposing Islam on people." US, Israel refuse to deal with Hamas

Outside the polling station in Dar Salah, a large village southeast of Jerusalem, Hamas certainly seemed the most palpable presence.

Although members of Fatah were elected last year to lead the local council, posters of Hamas carpeted the ramshackle town overlooking the desert. Most of the posters featured Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and Abdul Aziz Rantissi, two top Hamas leaders assassinated by Israel in 2004.

A white four-wheel drive vehicle, festooned with Hamas flags, sat parked at the entrance to the school where voters entered.

"We will cooperate with anyone who has clean hands, who safeguards the Palestinian people, and who opposes the occupation," says Nidal Huzeibi, the man with the keys. "But I totally reject recognition of Israel because they don't give us our rights," he says. "I'm 100 percent sure that Hamas will soon be the largest force on the Palestinian street."

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, whose seat is not up for reelection, said Wednesday that the PA will renew negotiations with Israel even if Hamas is a partner in the government. But the US and Israel have made clear that they will not deal with Hamas, which they consider a terrorist group.

Former President Jimmy Carter, heading a 900-member observer mission to the elections, told reporters Wednesday that the US would distinguish being Hamas in the legislative branch and Hamas at the helm: "The US government is prepared to continue to deal with the Palestinian Authority with Hamas members in the government. But if Hamas members become part of the executive branch, US law would preclude dealing with them."

After The Election, Hamas Must Learn To Govern (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

GAZA CITY — With its capture of at least a third of the vote in Wednesday's parliamentary election, the Islamist group Hamas has cemented its place in the heart of the Palestinian political establishment and fundamentally altered it.

But the group now faces dilemmas it has never confronted before. Hamas will have to decide whether to enter into a parliamentary alliance with its archrival, Fatah, and whether to take Cabinet positions in a new government controlled by Fatah.

Most important, it must decide whether to formally renounce its stated goal of Israel's destruction and open the way for negotiations with the Jewish state.

With roots in the rubble-strewn streets and teeming mosques of Gaza Strip refugee camps, Hamas has always harbored deep mistrust of the secular-minded ruling Fatah movement. The group's very name, an Arabic acronym for Islamic Resistance Movement, was a deliberate rebuke to all who sought accommodation of any kind with Israel.

At times during the last decade, Hamas' enmity toward Fatah has rivaled its hatred of Israel. Many rank-and-file Hamas activists, along with the organization's senior leaders, have served time not only in Israeli jails, but in Palestinian Authority prisons.

Hamas by no means speaks with one voice on these crucial questions, even when the same person is doing the talking. In recent days, views aired by Hamas candidates and officials have ranged from conciliatory to studiedly vague to utterly unyielding.

DOJ_NMG_0012036

"Never!" snapped Mahmoud Zahar, a senior figure in the group, when asked Wednesday whether Hamas would recognize Israel. But Zahar, one of the few members of Hamas' upper echelon to escape assassination by Israeli forces over the last 2 1/2 years, also said this week that negotiations with Israel were not "taboo," especially if conducted through a third party.

Those who have closely observed Hamas through the years note its tendency to scrap any strategy the group believes has run its course, without necessarily trumpeting the fact that it is doing so.

Hamas did not carry out any suicide bombings inside Israel in 2005, a period that coincided with its first entry into the political arena. That strategic shift paid off with victories in municipal elections that gave Hamas control of dozens of cities, towns and villages across the West Bank and Gaza.

Over the last two decades, Hamas built a formidable following by trading on its perceived standing as an outsider, even an underdog. Being part of the Palestinian power structure will inevitably change that dynamic.

"It's good that the people are with us," Imad Afana, a Hamas election observer, said as he watched his refugee-camp neighbors waiting patiently to cast ballots Wednesday. "But we cannot pretend that the result will not be complicated for us — very, very complicated."

Governance of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, as the Palestinian Authority has long since discovered, is a messy affair. Hamas honed a reputation for fiscal integrity while administering its far-flung network of schools, clinics and charities, but playing any significant role in the sprawling, ineffectual Palestinian bureaucracy carries the risk of taint.

"You are about to enter the Authority; we warmly greet you," senior Fatah candidate Mohammed Dahlan rather sardonically told Zahar during a televised debate this week. Then came the zinger: "It's time for you to become acquainted with the suffering of being in government."

The Palestinian election campaign bared fault lines within not only Hamas, but Israel. Impassioned debate has broken out over whether the Jewish state can possibly have any political dealings with a group whose suicide bombings wrought carnage on commuter buses and in crowded cafes and markets.

"It is important to understand that the participation of terror elements in democratic elections ... is a Trojan horse that will destroy democracy from within," Ron Prosor, director-general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, told an academic conference this week.

But former Prime Minister Shimon Peres, a senior figure in the centrist Kadima Party that is expected to win Israel's March 28 general election, argued that Israel should realize that pragmatic self-interest may have changed Hamas' agenda.

"We are not fighting against a name — we are fighting against a situation," Peres told Israel Radio this week. "If the situation changes, then what difference does a name make?"

Already, Israel is starting to draw a distinction between dealing with a Palestinian government in which Hamas takes part and one controlled by Hamas.

The Bush administration, too, appeared to be giving itself room to maneuver. Though the United States considers Hamas a terrorist organization and refuses any direct dealings with it, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack on Tuesday refused to rule out negotiations with a Palestinian government that included Hamas ministers.

Some observers point out that a Hamas role in government would give Israel the advantage of dealing with a ruling body that better represents the spectrum of Palestinian political views, perhaps making for more realistic talks.

"This time around, everything that was hidden during years of negotiations will finally be on the table," Nasser Laham, editor-in-chief of the Palestinian news agency Maan, wrote in a commentary for the Israeli newspaper Maariv.

A premier Israeli political commentator, Nahum Barnea, warned that with Hamas as a player in government, the fractious Fatah would have to pull itself together or risk being outflanked.

"In the new Palestinian parliament, a cohesive and disciplined Hamas faction will contend with a disintegrated and conflicted Fatah," Barnea wrote in the Yediot Aharonot daily.

In historical terms, any Israeli decision to engage Hamas would be reminiscent of its policy shift toward the Palestine Liberation Organization after it recognized Israel's existence, opening the path to negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0012037

"The entire process calls to mind what happened to the PLO," said Shaul Mishal, a Tel Aviv University professor whose specialty is Hamas. "I understand that this is a long, rough road, but these are the new Palestinian politics, and this could be the light at the end of the tunnel."

Although Fatah cannot help but be stung by Hamas' latest showing of electoral strength, its senior officials may sense a fresh opportunity to co-opt the Islamist group rather than try to defeat it in a head-on military confrontation. That has been Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' wish all along.

"What we see is that Hamas may change its views," Abbas told the satellite TV channel Al Arabiya this week.

Hamas is reluctant to tip its hand about disarming, and for now, the group plainly intends to have it both ways.

"The Europeans and Americans are telling Hamas to choose between having weapons and being in government," said Ismail Haniya, the top Hamas candidate. "But we say we will go for arms — and parliament."

WASHINGTON WIRE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

President Bush, in an Oval Office interview, declared that he isn't ready yet to deal with the radical Palestinian Islamist group Hamas no matter how well it does in Wednesday's Palestinian elections.

Speaking to The Wall Street Journal as Palestinians were electing a new parliament, Bush lauded the Middle Eastern trend toward democracy that produced Palestinian elections, but he said that Hamas isn't a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel. "A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," the president said. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you." (Read a transcript of the interview1.)

On other international subjects, Bush said "it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy" in dealing with Iran's nuclear program. And he said his principal hope for resolving the impasse is a plan in which Russia would enrich uranium on behalf of the Iranians, and then ship the material to civilian nuclear plants in Iran, negating Iran's need to develop its own enrichment abilities. If such efforts don't work, Bush said, "clearly, there's a set of different options available through the [United Nations] Security Council, and now we're working with our friends to review those options."

The president also said his administration's controversial plan for warrantless wiretaps of phone conversations was designed by experts at the National Security Agency to improve on a process laid out by Congress in the 1970s for eavesdropping on U.S. citizens under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Mr. Bush said he didn't use the provisions of that law allowing for court approvals of wiretaps, even after they have been instituted, because "we require a different response to an enemy" in the age of terrorism. --Gerald F. Seib

* * *

Private-Sector Growth: When Alan Greenspan leaves the Fed at the end of the day Jan. 31, he will set up a consulting firm called Greenspan Associates based in Washington, D.C.

Greenspan plans to consult, give speeches, and write a book. One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said Wednesday will quit as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. Ms. Smith joined the Fed as communications director in 2001 after serving as press secretary to Clinton Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers. Ms. Smith's responsibilities went well beyond public affairs: she served in effect as Mr. Greenspan's chief of staff, advising him on relations with the public, politicians, and the media, Fed insiders say. She has also advised Fed policy makers on monetary policy communications, such as the post-meeting statement and meeting minutes, though not on the formulation of monetary policy itself.

Also assisting Mr. Greenspan in his new business, at least initially, is Anne Nielsen, who has been his office and research assistant since his days at Townsend-Greenspan, the advisory service he ran before joining the Fed in 1987. The Fed said effective Feb. 1, David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesperson and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities. The elevation of Mr. Skidmore was made after consultation with Ben Bernanke, scheduled to take over as chairman on Feb. 1. Mr. Skidmore worked closely with Mr. Bernanke during his term as governor from 2002 to 2005. The promotion suggests that the transition will not trigger any major turnover among senior staff or the appointment of outsiders to key advisory positions, as has occurred at some other federal agencies like the CIA and SEC. --Greg Ip * * *

DOJ_NMG_0012038

Medicaid Requirement: Millions of low-income U.S. citizens would have trouble meeting Medicaid's new proof-of-citizenship requirements that are poised for passage in Congress, a new survey finds.

Under the new rules, part of the budget-reconciliation agreement scheduled for a final House vote next month, Medicaid recipients would have to document their citizenship in order to get health benefits from the federal-state program for the poor. In effect, that means producing a birth certificate or passport.

But one in 12 U.S.-born adults with annual incomes below $25,000 reported not having either of those documents, according to a survey of about 2,000 people commissioned by the liberal-leaning Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. More than one in 10 adults said they didn't have a birth certificate or passport for at least one of their children. The center said that indicates as many as 4.6 million low-income citizens would have trouble meeting the new requirements, which were pushed by some Republicans as a way to ensure that illegal immigrants aren't getting Medicaid coverage. That means those needing Medicaid -- or trying to requalify for it, which often is required every six months -- might be excluded from coverage or would have to wait while they obtain proper documentation.

"It's going to cause problems for a lot of people," said Leighton Ku, a co-author of the paper. Many other groups unlikely to have the documents -- such as Katrina survivors and people in nursing homes -- weren't represented in the survey, he said. The survey showed a high percentage of elderly people -- particularly African-Americans -- lack birth certificates and passports, he added. --Sarah Lueck * * *

Top to Bottom: U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman aims to conclude his "top-to-bottom review" of trade policy toward China soon.

Results of the administration-wide initiative are being closely held, but aides mull making it public in mid-February after the Bush administration moves beyond releasing the president's fiscal 2007 budget.

A top Portman aide, Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia, said the China initiative is in the final stages. "This has been a valuable effort and one that bears repeating from time to time to make sure that our trade policy with respect to China remains on course," Mr. Bhatia told the U.S.-China Business Council Wednesday. Mr. Portman promised to conduct the review last year, amid rising fears on Capitol Hill about the economic threat posed by Beijing.

Insisting that "China's apprentice period must now come to a close," Mr. Bhatia urged Beijing to shoulder more responsibility as a leader in the rules-based global trading system. He warned that the Bush administration "will not hesitate, when appropriate, to use all tools at its disposal to ensure that China lives up to its commitments, including dispute settlement at the WTO or the use of trade remedies within our legal system." --Greg Hitt * * *

McCain

Remembering Rehnquist: Arizona Republican Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl propose spending $10 million to set up a judicial research center in honor the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. Their bill would authorize $2 million annually through 2011 for a William H. Rehnquist Center on Constitutional Structures and Judicial Independence at the University of Arizona law school. The bill says the center "would advance nonpartisan scholarship about the judicial branch," particularly in areas the chief justice "held dearest" -- "constitutional federalism, judicial independence and the separation of powers." Although born in Milwaukee and educated at Stanford University, Chief Justice Rehnquist rose to prominence as a practicing attorney and Republican activist in Phoenix. President Nixon appointed him a Supreme Court associate justice in 1971, and in 1986 President Reagan elevated him to chief justice. He died in September at age 80 and was succeeded by his former clerk, John Roberts. --Jess Bravin * * *

Tuesday, Jan. 24

With the Feb. 3 deadline on renewing Patriot Act provisions looming, Senate Democrats predict a deal can be reached soon. To speed it along, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont is trying to tap First Lady Laura Bush's sympathies as a former school librarian.

DOJ_NMG_0012039

"The time is fast approaching when we have to extend it or change it," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who hinted that House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.) will find it harder to block an extension next week. "Sensenbrenner doesn't run the House. There will be 434 other people over there," Reid said. "I think everyone agrees that with a little bit of time alone, Leahy and [Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen] Specter can work out the problems."

Majority Leader Bill Frist predicts that "ultimately if we do an extension for six to eight weeks, I think we'll be able to work it out." But any Senate deal must also be sold to the House, where Republican turmoil over leadership races could be an obstacle. "We have to work through it here," Frist said. "Then I've got to shop that over there, which -- until they get through and things settle down -- will be hard. So we need just another six weeks."

Leahy, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Democrat, recalled a Jan. 6 conversation with top players and President Bush, who had gathered at the White House for a signing ceremony for an unrelated bill. "I raised the fact that we could easily do that, work out the few remaining differences," said Leahy, who played to the first lady on the issue of searches involving libraries. "I said, `Why don't we work out that problem with the librarians?' I mentioned librarians twice and Mrs. Bush caught my drift." --David Rogers * * *

Information, Please: The U.S. dialogue with China is intensifying on the important issue of enforcing intellectual-property rights.

The two camps have sparred in recent weeks over the legal basis of a U.S. move, launched through the Geneva-based World Trade Organization last October, to compel China to provide detailed descriptions of intellectual-property rights cases it has pursued as well as the penalties imposed on infringers. But a senior U.S. trade official said Tuesday that Beijing and Washington have set aside the dispute over whether the U.S. has the right to the information and, for now, are focusing on ways to allow an exchange of the disputed information.

"They have expressed an openness to work with us," the official said. "They've agreed to talk with us." The U.S. official said filing a piracy complaint against China at the WTO "remains a possibility," but stressed the U.S. is working through a number of channels, including bilateral talks, to encourage China to step up its enforcement. --Greg Hitt * * *

Lost Millions: Another Pentagon audit of Iraq reconstruction work found that a variety of jobs were never done and millions of dollars are missing. The report of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction4 examined 907 contracts and "micro-purchases" totaling about $88 million that were awarded by U.S. officials using Iraqi funds in 2003 and 2004.

The audit found that 17% of the work, totaling $16.3 million, was not competitively bid, that $87,000 in cash was somehow lost, and that $6.3 million was transferred to "unauthorized persons" without any trace of work being done in return. The report said that $471,000 was paid to install Internet service in the city of Ramadi, but quotes an internal memo saying, "There is no way to verify this project was ever completed, because we don't even know where exactly in Ramadi it was supposed to take place." Another 11 contracts were overpaid to the tune of $571,000.

The Justice Department has charged some U.S. officials and contractors with fraud in connection with similar work in southern Iraq, and more prosecutions are expected. --Neil King Jr. * * *

With an eye toward the oldest members of the Supreme Court, the White House is trying to scratch out a filibuster-proof 60 votes for Judge Samuel Alito to set a conservative standard that gives Bush some maneuvering room in the event of another opening.

Insiders say the odds of achieving that goal aren't good. But Bush allies take heart that the Democrats' vigorous opposition to Judge Alito irritated enough of the Republican members of the Gang of 14 -- the bipartisan group of senators who neutralized Democrats' threat to block Bush judicial nominees and Republicans' threat to change Senate rules to ban filibusters -- to edge them closer to voting for a judicial filibuster ban down the road.

After announcing the Judiciary Committee's 10-8 party-line vote for Judge Alito, Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the panel's ranking Democrat, and Republican Committee Chairman Arlen Specter wrap it up: "OK, Arlen," said Sen. Leahy as he grabbed his papers. "OK, Patrick," the chairman replied. --Jeanne Cummings

• Read excerpts5 from the Senate Judiciary Committee's meeting to vote on Alito, and see a chart of the nominees6 to the Supreme Court since the start of the Nixon administration.

DOJ_NMG_0012040

* * *

Frist

Asbestos Warning: With the Senate beginning hearings on lobbying overhaul Wednesday, Frist warned Democrats against trying to use the issue to delay action on the asbestos bill.

In a letter Tuesday to Reid, Frist predicted passage of the lobbying bill early this year -- "done right and well, not fast and foolish." But the Tennessean said asbestos action has waited long enough. "This problem is devastating and it requires leadership and action," he wrote to Reid. "To postpone debate on this issue is to blatantly ignore a very real problem." --David Rogers * * *

Frustration, continued: White House officials have been frustrated for months that President Bush gets so little credit from the public for an economy that's moving along reasonably well. They will have to continue to be frustrated, it appears. A new poll7 from the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press shows that only about a third of Americans (34%) rate economic conditions as excellent or good. Almost twice as many -- 64% -- call conditions only fair or poor. Overall, attitudes are darker than they were a year ago.

The poll's authors note that on this front, as on so many, views have grown more divided along partisan lines. More than half of Republicans see an economy that's excellent or good. Just 28% of independents and 23% of Democrats agree the economy is doing well. One of the goals of Bush's State of the Union speech next week is to improve public perceptions of the economy overall. The telephone survey of 1,503 adults nationwide has a three percentage point margin of error. --Jerry Seib * * *

Bernanke

Speech Pattern: Kevin Hassett, economist at the American Enterprise Institute offers a bit of advice to Ben Bernanke, Bush's choice to head the Federal Reserve: In the early days on the job, sound as much like Chairman Alan Greenspan as possible. "Take an Alan Greenspan speech, run it through Google into Spanish then translate it back. It's still basically a Greenspan speech." --Greg Ip * * *

Flood Watch: Overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program is a prominent item on the Senate's agenda. The program has been thrust deeply in the red by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, with damage from the two storms expected to reach $23 billion -- almost all on the taxpayers' tab.

The Senate Banking Committee will kick off the debate Wednesday at a hearing on how to fix the system, "which is clearly broken," said a committee spokesman. Some lawmakers, including Committee Chairman Richard Shelby of Alabama, suggest that the insurance program should be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company.

A first step may be for Congress to direct the program to deny coverage to properties that are repeatedly flooded, they say. Also to be considered is an idea being pushed by Republican Rep. Richard Baker of Louisiana to form a new government agency to oversee redevelopment of storm-battered Louisiana. The House Financial Services Committee passed a flood insurance bill late last year, but it hasn't come up for a floor vote. --Michael Schroeder

Vote Complicates Area's Diplomacy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration has strongly urged Palestinian leaders not to permit any Hamas members into the Palestinian cabinet, but yesterday's better-than-expected electoral showing by a group labeled a terrorist organization by the United States greatly complicates the administration's diplomacy in the region, U.S. officials said yesterday.

Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, appears to have ridden a wave of popular disgust at the perceived corruption and incompetence of the ruling Fatah Party. Exit polls indicate Fatah will have only a slim edge over Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, giving Hamas a strong claim to a role in the government.

Fatah in theory may still be able to form a government that excludes Hamas -- formally the Islamic Resistance Movement -- but Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has expressed hope that by bringing Hamas into the political process, it will become a partner in seeking a peace accord with Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0012041

The results also suggested the risks inherent in the Bush administration's campaign to bring democracy to the Middle East. Administration spokesmen officially celebrated the "historic moment" for the Palestinians while officials privately reeled at the outcome.

Bush administration officials had hoped Hamas would get as little as 20 percent of the vote. The Washington Post reported Sunday that the United States had spent $2 million in recent weeks to promote the Palestinian Authority, and by extension Fatah, in a campaign that kept U.S. involvement hidden. Before yesterday, officials were bracing for Hamas to receive 30 to 40 percent of the vote; exit polls indicated that Hamas topped 40 percent of the seats.

U.S. officials, from President Bush on down, reiterated that the United States will not deal with Hamas as long as it does not renounce violence.

"A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," Bush said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal yesterday. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

Bush's statement left open the possibility that the United States would not reject a Palestinian government that includes Hamas, but instead that the United States would not work directly with cabinet ministers who have Hamas connections. There is a precedent for this approach: The Bush administration already works with the Lebanese government, even though one cabinet member is a member of Hezbollah, also labeled a terrorist group.

The U.S. ambassador to Israel, Dick Jones, was quoted this week in the Israeli newspaper Haaretz as saying the Lebanese model might serve as a guide for dealing with the Palestinian Authority if Hamas joins the government. Jones has told officials in Washington the remarks were made at a dinner party and were taken out of context.

One major issue is that the United States has much more extensive dealings with the Palestinian Authority than it does with Lebanon. Hamas has indicated it would like to obtain ministerial portfolios that touch on social services, raising questions about whether some of the hundreds of millions of dollars in annual U.S. aid could continue to flow to certain public works projects if they are overseen by a Hamas cabinet member.

Moreover, with Israel facing critical elections in March, the administration must deal carefully with the emerging Palestinian government.

The administration must also hold together its allies in the peace process, particularly the European Union. Last late year, the sponsors of the "road map" peace plan, known as the Quartet, issued a statement saying that "a future Palestinian Authority cabinet should include no member who has not committed to the principles of Israel's right to exist in peace and security and an unequivocal end to violence and terrorism."

But that statement was not categorical, and some European officials have indicated in recent days that instead of the black-and-white view expressed by the United States, perhaps Hamas needed greater encouragement to make a break with its past, much like the Irish Republican Army. One U.S. official sighed that the European Union was like the "International House of Pancakes -- there are a ton of waffles there."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet in London next week with her counterparts from the European Union, Russia and the United Nations to try to reach an agreement. "There will be a very healthy debate about how to encourage Hamas to eschew violence and get into the political process," one diplomat involved in the discussions said.

Hamas Presses Fatah In Palestinian Vote, Surveys Say (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 25 — Hamas, the militant Islamic party sworn to the destruction of Israel, won a large share of votes in the first Palestinian legislative elections in a decade, depriving the more secular Fatah party of its longstanding monopoly on power, surveys of voters leaving the polls indicated Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0012042

While those surveys showed Fatah with a narrow lead, the vote marked the first entry of Hamas into representative Palestinian politics, a fundamental change, and its strong showing raised questions about the near-term future of any peace talks with Israel.

The acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, said his country could not accept a situation in which Hamas would be part of the Palestinian Authority if the group remained armed with unchanged goals.

Detailed results for the parliament's 132 seats are not expected until Thursday. Numerous Fatah candidates are competing against one another, which could allow Hamas candidates to win in some constituencies with a minority of the votes.

But judging from the polls, Fatah, though battered, should be able to form a working majority in coalition with other independent or secular parties like that of Salam Fayyad, the former finance minister who is considered a likely choice for prime minister. But Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, who will choose a prime minister, is thought to favor the inclusion of at least a few Hamas ministers to draw the party into the duties and responsibilities of government.

As voter surveys indicated that Fatah may have fended off the Hamas challenge, celebratory gunfire echoed through Ramallah's streets. The election itself went off remarkably smoothly, with little trouble at any of the more than 1,000 polling stations or in East Jerusalem, where Israel allowed Palestinians to cast "absentee ballots" in post offices. About 900 foreign observers, including former President Jimmy Carter and the former Swedish prime minister, Carl Bildt, monitored the voting. In a preliminary assessment, an official from a United States delegation called the voting "generally smooth, with sporadic violence and a robust turnout."

An exit poll from the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, headed by Khalil Shikaki, showed Fatah winning 42 percent of the national vote and Hamas 35 percent, with a margin of sampling error of 2 percentage points.

Another such survey from Birzeit University indicated that Fatah would get 46 percent of the vote to Hamas's 39 percent. That would mean Fatah would be short of a majority of the legislature's 132 seats. The leftist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine could get several seats, Mr. Fayyad's list would get a couple, as would another independent one and the leftist Badil list. The director, Nader Said, cautioned that the poll should be treated as indicative, not final.

Palestinian voters, candidates and analysts said they expected Hamas to take some cabinet positions in service or welfare ministries, thus joining the government, but in jobs that would not necessarily require contact with Israel. But Hamas could stay out of the government and remain a parliamentary opposition, telling its voters that its job is to keep Fatah honest and to protect those who fight against Israeli occupation.

Ahmed Mubarak, a Hamas candidate in Ramallah and an Islamic jurist, said that "I personally see no problem with being in the government if we were confident it will be for the sake of the people."

The Palestinian Authority is committed, under the internationally backed peace plan known as the road map, to dismantling armed militias and "terrorist capabilities and infrastructure."

Inside the government or out, then, Hamas is considered likely to keep the Palestinian president, Mr. Abbas — known as Abu Mazen — and the new government from pursuing serious negotiations with Israel on any basis that Israel is likely to accept.

In a meeting with Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Democrat of Delaware, Israel's acting prime minister, Mr. Olmert, said: "I will not negotiate with a government that does not meet its most basic obligations — to fight terrorism. We are prepared to assist the Palestinians and Abu Mazen very much but they must meet their commitments."

Israel, the United States and Europe all label Hamas a terrorist organization, and while American and European officials say they will not meet or deal with any Hamas officials, they will continue to have close relations with Mr. Abbas and a new Palestinian prime minister, much as they do in Lebanon, where Hezbollah, a radical Islamic party, has cabinet representation.

Mr. Abbas pressed for these elections against considerable opposition from inside Fatah, convinced that the only way to tame Hamas and turn it from an armed militia to a political party was through representative democracy. A normally stiff and shy man, Mr. Abbas looked positively happy on Wednesday morning as he voted with his wife and then posed for the television cameras.

"We are so happy with this election festival," he said. Palestinians were festive, too, coming out in large numbers to vote in an election they understood to be a vital moment for their own history. Turnout was estimated by officials at nearly 78 percent of the 1.3 million eligible voters.

DOJ_NMG_0012043

Mr. Abbas also had words of calm for Israel. "The Israelis should have no reason to be fearful but rather pleased as we are building a democracy which can serve as a base for peace between us," he said. "I am always ready for negotiations with the Israelis although they must want them on their side."

Israel is engaged in its own election campaign and with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon still comatose after a massive stroke, it is not likely any time soon to talk to any government containing Hamas representatives. The Hamas showing and what should now be done will be a major issue in the Israeli campaign, which ends March 28.

Although Mr. Abbas has promised Washington that he will move to disarm Hamas after these elections, there is considerable skepticism that he will be able to do so.

Voting himself on Wednesday, the head of Hamas's candidate list, Ismail Haniya, said: "The Americans and the Europeans say to Hamas: either you have weapons or you enter the legislative council. We say weapons and the legislative council. There is no contradiction between the two."

The comments point up the awkwardness of any Fatah-Hamas coalition. Fatah, a secular, nationalist movement, wants to restart negotiations with Israel based on the road map, the dormant peace plan that was introduced in 2003, and Mr. Abbas has often suggested parallel secret talks with Israel on a final agreement.

Hamas has waged a suicide bombing campaign and always rejected negotiations with Israel. During the campaign, some Hamas leaders toned down their rhetoric, and the group has largely abided by a truce announced early last year, and is expected to continue to do so, focusing on an internal agenda and keeping its promise to voters of "change and reform." Still, Hamas leaders say the group will not lay down its weapons.

The polling stations here in Ramallah were vivid with the yellow flags of Fatah and the green of Hamas and the colorful posters of individual candidates and others of the 11 party lists running, as candidates and party workers handed out election material and lobbied voters up until the entrance of the stations.

Voters were anxious but talkative, pleased with the process of democracy but worried about the results.

Mai Alami, a mother of three girls and one boy, said the election was vital and would bring some needed "fresh faces" to a stagnant politics in the wake of the death of Yasir Arafat more than a year ago. "But we're afraid of the Islamic party," she said, "not because we are against them, but because of their prejudice and their policies."

Fatah was being punished by voters for the misrule and corruption of the last 12 years, Ms. Alami said outside the busy polling station at the elegant stone Friends Boys School.

Her husband, Ali Khashen, a constitutional lawyer, said the election also gave legitimacy to independent candidates like Mr. Fayyad and Mustafa Barghouti. "But now with Hamas we may have more obstacles for the peace process just as Israel was becoming more receptive," he said. "We all formed our agenda around Fatah, and now we need a new strategy."

In East Jerusalem, Fida Abdellatif, an architect, said: "This election is different because there is a full spectrum of parties, which wasn't the case before. We hope this will produce a strong leadership that everyone can support."

Mr. Abbas hopes so, too. He met on Wednesday with Senator Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and suggested that he was considering ways to press Hamas to disarm, the senator said. "He said they'd have to choose in the end, that they can't be part of a government and have a militia," Senator Biden said. Mr. Abbas also asked the United States not to react too quickly to the Hamas vote and to continue to help him improve, reform and equip the Palestinian security services.

But the election also marked a fundamental change in Palestinian politics and a political earthquake rare in Arab countries.

"Fatah has decided to share power, that's the point," said Nader Said of Birzeit University here. "It's not easy for them, but in no Arab country I can think of has any ruling party wittingly shared power in a democratic process."

Mr. Said says that the transition will be difficult, and Fatah's own divisions will resurface. "But things will never be the same," he said. "Hamas has accepted to be a part of the political game, and it will never be able to be as militant or hard-line as it used to be, no matter its rhetoric."

Fatah, though its campaign finally came to life in the last 10 days, suffered from "tremendous disappointment in Fatah and the Palestinian Authority and Abu Mazen," said the pollster Khalil Shikaki. "There was anger about corruption, chaos, lack of law and order and a lot of disillusionment." Despite Hamas's participation and support, he said, the election "was not really about the peace process — in fact three-quarters of Palestinians support the peace process and negotiations" and are more moderate on final-status issues like Jerusalem and refugees than ever before.

DOJ_NMG_0012044

"Fatah will get more votes than Hamas today," Mr. Shikaki said. "But this is the last opportunity Fatah will have to get its act together." And if Mr. Abbas does not choose a candidate for prime minister that can get the support of Fatah's younger generation, Mr. Shikaki said, "you could see Fatah split."

Mr. Shikaki said he believed that Hamas wanted to join the cabinet in some role, and that Mr. Abbas also wanted it to do so, but would not predicate participation on disarmament.

"Abu Mazen wants to disarm Hamas, but through consensus, not confrontation," he said. "Hamas won't agree to disarm as a precondition, but could agree to hand over weapons voluntarily."

Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 -- Iran's leading negotiator on nuclear issues said here Wednesday that his country was open to a compromise proposal from Russia that it enrich uranium for Iran on Russian soil to guarantee it would be used only for peaceful purposes, not to create nuclear weapons. But he said the idea needed fine-tuning in advance of further talks scheduled for the middle of next month.

"Our attitude to the proposal is positive," said Ali Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, after talks here with the secretary of the Russian Security Council, Igor Ivanov. "The project won't have the full potential to resolve all problems. It should be fine-tuned, together with other measures."

The foreign ministers of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the United States, China, Russia, France and Britain -- plus Germany plan to meet Monday in London in advance of a Feb. 2 emergency session of the board of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency.

The United States, France and Britain are pushing for a vote at the IAEA to refer Iran to the Security Council, which can impose sanctions. They fear that Iran is attempting to develop nuclear weapons, and enrichment is a key step in that process. Iranian officials say their nuclear program is solely for the purpose of generating electricity but that Iran has the right to control of the entire nuclear fuel cycle.

The positions of Russia and China on referring Iran to the Security Council remain unclear. Russia, which has expressed doubts about the idea, is helping Iran build a nuclear power plant. Iran is a major supplier of energy to China, which needs power for its rapid industrialization.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said Wednesday in Beijing that he told Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao that it would be "extremely dangerous" to allow the proliferation of nuclear weapons in the Middle East and that it would damage China's interest in energy security. Larijani is scheduled to arrive in China for talks Thursday.

Larijani said Wednesday that if the Feb. 2 meeting referred Iran to the Security Council, the country would begin enrichment. "In this case," he said, "our activities will not be limited to research and we'll begin industrial enrichment of uranium."

Some Western officials fear that the Iranians are appearing to consider the Russian offer in order to buy time and prevent any Russian vote to send the matter to the council.

Iran Open To Nuclear Venture With Russia (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 — Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said here today that he welcomed a Russian proposal to defuse the confrontation between Iran and the West over its nuclear programs by establishing a joint venture to enrich uranium in Russia. But he indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated.

DOJ_NMG_0012045

"Our attitude to the proposal is positive," Mr. Larijani, the secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, said after meeting with his Russian counterpart, Igor S. Ivanov, Russian news agencies reported. "We tried to bring the positions of the two sides closer."

At the same time, he warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if Iran's nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council. His remarks came a day after he and Mr. Ivanov said the confrontation should be resolved at the International Atomic Energy Agency, whose governors are to meet next week.

Although the Russian proposal has been seen as a possible compromise, Mr. Larijani's remarks made it clear that further discussions on it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna.

Russia has publicized few details of the proposal, including whether Iran's involvement in a joint venture would simply be financial or whether it would be scientific as well. Russia had previously offered to produce uranium for a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran on condition that the spent fuel be returned to Russia for reprocessing.

"The big issue for the Russians will be how much the Iranians demand technical access to the processes," said Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Moscow Carnegie Center and a former nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration.

President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia expanded on the idea of a joint enrichment facility today by expressing support for establishing an international center for providing nuclear fuel to nations that seek to develop civilian nuclear power plants. He said that Russia "was prepared to set up an international center of this kind on its territory."

The idea of international enrichment centers, which has been endorsed by the atomic energy agency's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei, and others, would be to provide fuel under strict international supervision, negating the need for countries to develop their own enrichment capabilities and lowering the risk that civilian work could be used to support weapons programs.

Mr. Putin said that he would make the proposal a part of negotiations with leaders of the Group of Eight industrial nations later this year.

"Further development of peaceful uses of nuclear energy ranks among our priorities," he said, Interfax reported, at a meeting in St. Petersburg with leaders of former Soviet republics.

Iran Wants More Work On Nuke Deal (AJC/AP)

By Steve Gutterman, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW — Iran's top nuclear negotiator said Wednesday that a Russian proposal to enrich uranium for the Islamic republic needs more work, and renewed a threat that, if the issue is referred to the U.N. Security Council, Tehran will forge ahead with technology that can make nuclear arms.

Ali Larijani's comments came amid quickening diplomatic negotiations ahead of a crucial Feb. 2 meeting of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, which could refer the issue to the Security Council. The 15-member council has the power to impose sanctions on Iran.

Larijani suggested it would take time to work out details of Russia's proposal — a Western-backed compromise that could provide more oversight and ease fears that Tehran is using its pursuit of atomic power as a front for a nuclear weapons program.

In Washington, President Bush said Russia's proposal offered the best chance for resolving the impasse, adding "it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy" in dealing with Iran.

If such efforts do not work, Bush said, "clearly, there's a set of different options available through the Security Council, and now we're working with our friends to review those options." He made his remarks in an interview with The Wall Street Journal.

Iran, which insists its program is peaceful, has welcomed Moscow's suggestion that uranium could be enriched in Russia, then returned to Iran for use in the country's reactors. But haggling has continued over the specifics.

Uranium enrichment can produce fuel for nuclear reactors to generate electricity or, if sufficiently processed, the material for nuclear warheads.

DOJ_NMG_0012046

"Our view of this offer is positive, and we tried to bring the positions of the sides closer," Larijani told reporters Wednesday, a day after talks with Russian security council chief Igor Ivanov. "This plan can be perfected in the future, during further talks that will be held in February."

"There are lots of details surrounding this offer that must be must be decided — the location of the plant, the form of participation, technical cooperation," Larijani said.

Speaking to Iranian state television after returning to Tehran, Larijani said the "minds of Iran and Russia are getting closer" but more effort was needed.

Russian officials have said further talks on the proposal would be held in Russia around Feb. 16 — two weeks after the emergency IAEA board meeting in Vienna, Austria.

Larijani also said Tehran would welcome talks with European countries — though an Iranian proposal to renew talks with the European Union was recently rejected.

State television quoted Larijani as saying Iran was ready to negotiate with all countries except Israel. Iranian officials normally reject negotiations with both Israel and the United States and it was not clear whether his comments signaled a shift in position.

Larijani reiterated that any attempt to refer Iran to the Security Council would lead the country to move forward with a full-scale uranium enrichment program.

"If they use political pressure, if our dossier is handed over or opened in an unofficial way by the Security Council, then according to a parliament decision we are obligated to revoke the fulfillment of all moratoriums," he said. "In this situation, our actions will not be limited to research. Then we will begin industrial enrichment."

He said Tehran also would be obliged to forsake a 2003 agreement with the IAEA that gave the agency more power to inspect Iranian nuclear sites and warned of unspecified additional actions to be revealed "in due time."

Iran removed IAEA seals from equipment Jan. 10, ending a 15-month moratorium, and announced it would restart research on nuclear fuel including what it described as small-scale enrichment.

European countries believe they will have enough votes at the emergency IAEA board session next week to haul Iran before the Security Council — a move also favored by the United States — but they want broad support, especially from Russia and China. Moscow and Beijing, which have close commercial ties with Iran and wield veto power in the Security Council, are not eager to see the issue come before the powerful U.N. body.

The issue also was expected to come up Monday on the sidelines of a donors conference on Afghanistan in London, with the State Department saying Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would use the forum to discuss Iran's nuclear program with key nations.

In Vienna, a diplomat accredited to the IAEA — who demanded anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the planned meeting with the media — said Washington and the Europeans would use the meeting to try to persuade reluctant Russia and China to support referral.

Larijani, meanwhile, was expected to meet with top Chinese officials in Beijing Thursday.

On Wednesday, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said he had warned Chinese officials that allowing Iran to develop nuclear weapons could threaten Beijing's crucial supplies of Middle Eastern oil.

The Russian enrichment plan presents President Vladimir Putin with an opportunity to please the West without sacrificing ties with Iran. Russia is building a reactor for Iran's first nuclear power plant.

Putin called for the creation of an international system of facilities to provide enrichment and other nuclear-cycle services to nations that want nuclear power. In televised comments Wednesday, he said Russia could establish the prototype facility on its territory.

Iran, Russia Fail To Reach Deal On Uranium Enrichment (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- Iran's top nuclear negotiator said Wednesday that Tehran saw Moscow's offer to have Iran's uranium enriched in Russia as a positive development but no agreement has been reached.

DOJ_NMG_0012047

Chief negotiator Ali Larijani also reiterated Iran's threat to renew enrichment activities if it is referred to the United Nations Security Council.

After talks with Russian Security Council Chief Igor Ivanov, which included discussion of the plan to enrich uranium in Russia, Mr. Larijani told a news conference: "Our view of this offer is positive, and we tried to bring the positions of the sides closer." He added, "This plan can be perfected in the future, during further talks that will be held in February," speaking through a translator.

Mr. Larijani suggested that it would take some time to work out details of Russia's proposal. Some critics allege that the Iranians are using the proposal to stall for time as diplomatic pressure on Tehran mounts over its alleged nuclear-weapons program. "There are lots of details surrounding this offer that must be examined," Mr. Larijani said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Larijani and Mr. Ivanov said in a joint statement that Tehran's nuclear standoff must be resolved through the U.N. atomic watchdog agency's diplomatic efforts. The statement reflected Russia's efforts to delay Iran's referral to the U.N. Security Council and Moscow's opposition to international sanctions against Tehran.

"Both sides expressed their desire to solve the issue in a diplomatic way within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency," Russia's Security Council said after the two met.

Iran has warned that IAEA referral to the U.N. Security Council over its nuclear ambitions would lead it to move forward with a full-scale uranium-enrichment program, a possible precursor to making atomic weapons.

High-level diplomacy has intensified with little more than a week to go until the Feb. 2 meeting of the IAEA's 35-nation board.

Prior to that session, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will attend an international conference in London on Jan. 31 focusing on Afghanistan, but department spokesman Sean McCormack said Ms. Rice is expected to use the meeting to have discussions with key nations on Iran's nuclear program.

The New York Times reported the foreign ministers of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- Britain, France, Russia and China, in addition to the U.S. -- as well as Germany would attend the meeting.

Moscow has proposed having Iran's uranium enriched in Russia, then returned to Iran for use in the country's reactors -- a compromise that could provide more oversight and ease tensions. Haggling has continued over the specifics of the proposal, including Tehran's proposal to have China involved in the Russian enrichment process.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw urged Tehran on Tuesday to seriously consider Russia's offer to enrich Iran's uranium in an effort to end the standoff. Mr. Straw also said in an interview with the Associated Press that he hoped the IAEA would refer the matter to the Security Council.

The West fears Iran wants to develop a nuclear bomb, but Tehran says its intentions are peaceful and that it wants only civilian nuclear energy. Iran removed IAEA seals from equipment Jan. 10, ending a 15-month moratorium, and announced it would restart experiments including what it described as small-scale enrichment. The move led lead negotiators Germany, Britain and France to call for the Feb. 2 emergency board session.

European countries believe they have enough votes to haul Iran before the Security Council, but they want broad support including Russia, China and key developing nations.

In Washington, Ms. Rice said that "referral absolutely has to be made" on Feb. 2, while remaining vague on what action she thought the Security Council should take, and when.

Tehran Holds Up Russian Nuke Deal (WT/AP)

By Steve Gutterman

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- Iran's top nuclear negotiator said yesterday that a Russian proposal to enrich uranium for the Islamic republic needs more work and renewed a threat that Tehran will forge ahead with the technology that can make nuclear arms if the issue is referred to the U.N. Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0012048

Ali Larijani's comments came amid quickening diplomatic negotiations ahead of a crucial meeting next Thursday of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the U.N. nuclear watchdog that could refer the issue to the 15-nation council, which could impose sanctions.

Mr. Larijani suggested that it would take time to work out details of Russia's proposal -- a Western-backed compromise that could provide more oversight and ease fears that Tehran is pursuing a nuclear weapons program.

Iran has welcomed Moscow's proposal that uranium could be enriched in Russia, then returned to Iran for use in the country's reactors. But haggling has continued over the specifics.

"Our view of this offer is positive, and we tried to bring the positions of the sides closer," Mr. Larijani told reporters yesterday, a day after talks with Russian security council chief Igor Ivanov. "This plan can be perfected in the future, during further talks that will be held in February."

Russian officials have said further talks on the proposal would be held in Russia around Feb. 16 -- two weeks after the emergency IAEA board meeting in Vienna, Austria.

Hans Blix, a former IAEA director and chief U.N. weapons inspector in Iraq, said yesterday that Tehran could be offered a package of incentives to wean it away from a nuclear program.

Mr. Blix, chairman of the Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission in Sweden, said the package could be similar to that offered to North Korea, with a focus on security.

"We promised not to attack North Korea, and we opened diplomatic relations," Mr. Blix said in an address to the Arms Control Association in Washington. "If it's done for North Korea, I don't see why it couldn't be done for Iran."

Mr. Larijani said Tehran would welcome talks with European countries. But he reiterated that any attempt to refer Iran to the Security Council would lead the country to move forward with a full-scale uranium-enrichment program.

"If they use political pressure, if our dossier is handed over or opened in an unofficial way by the Security Council, then according to a parliament decision, we are obligated to revoke the fulfillment of all moratoriums," he said. "In this situation, our actions will not be limited to research. Then we will begin industrial enrichment."

European countries think they will have enough votes at the IAEA board session next week to haul Iran before the Security Council, but Russia and China, which have close commercial ties with Iran.

Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 — Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said here on Wednesday that he welcomed a Russian proposal to defuse the confrontation between Iran and the West over its nuclear programs by establishing a joint venture to enrich uranium in Russia. But he indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated.

"Our attitude to the proposal is positive," Mr. Larijani, the secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, said after meeting with his Russian counterpart, Igor S. Ivanov, Russian news agencies reported. "We tried to bring the positions of the two sides closer."

At the same time, he warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if its nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council. His remarks came a day after Mr. Larijani and Mr. Ivanov said the confrontation should be resolved at the International Atomic Energy Agency, whose governors are scheduled to meet next week.

Although the Russian proposal has been seen as a possible compromise, Mr. Larijani's remarks made it clear that further discussions of it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna.

Russia has publicized few details of the proposal. It has not addressed, for example, whether Iran's involvement in a joint venture would simply be financial or whether it would be scientific as well. Russia had previously offered to produce uranium for a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran on condition that the spent fuel be returned to Russia for reprocessing.

"The big issue for the Russians will be how much the Iranians demand technical access to the processes," said Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Moscow Carnegie Center and a former nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration.

DOJ_NMG_0012049

Iran's Stonewalling At Heart Of Crisis (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors were anxious to learn if the military-run physics research center on the edge of Tehran was part of the uranium enrichment program that Iran had admitted hiding for 18 years.

But wrecking crews got in first.

Even as the inspectors waited in late 2003 for permission to enter, the top-secret Lavizan-Shian Technical Research Center was bulldozed flat and the tons of rubble and earth trucked into the desert and scattered, obliterating evidence that the IAEA had hoped to gather.

Iran's failure since then to fully explain activities at the site and its obfuscation, conflicting answers and stonewalling on other aspects of the enrichment program are at the heart of the crisis over its nuclear program.

The IAEA has been trying to determine whether Iran is developing nuclear arms behind the facade of a civilian nuclear project. Iran claims it has no weapons program.

Only by reconstructing the complete history and extent of Iran's nuclear work can the IAEA determine the truth. So far, that's been impossible.

"Even after three years (of investigation), I am not yet in a position to make a judgment on the peaceful nature of the program," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei lamented earlier this month to Newsweek magazine.

The dispute became a full-blown crisis on Jan. 10 when Iran ended a 26-month freeze on work on uranium enrichment, a method that produces fuel for both civilian power plants and warheads, depending on the duration of the process.

Iran claims the right to enrichment for peaceful purposes as a signer of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the key international safeguard against the spread of nuclear arms.

But the IAEA board of governors in September declared Tehran in breach of its treaty obligations to disclose all aspects of its program to the IAEA. This includes complete information on Iran's deals with the Pakistani-led smuggling ring that also supplied the know-how and technology to develop nuclear weapons to Libya.

The United States, Britain, France and Germany are pushing to have the IAEA board ask the U.N. Security Council to step up pressure on Iran to answer the IAEA's questions.

In October 2003, Iran gave the IAEA what it declared was a full accounting of its nuclear program. Agency experts quickly began finding holes.

Iran has filled some gaps and is promising to fill the rest. But in a Nov. 18 report to the IAEA board, ElBaradei complained that "there still remain issues to be resolved" and Iran's "full transparency is ... long overdue."

The agency's most pressing questions concern Iran's work on the equipment used to enrich uranium, whether it got blueprints for a Chinese nuclear weapon, and more about what was going on at the razed Lavizan-Shian research center.

Here's what Iran has done in each of these areas and why the IAEA is concerned:

CENTRIFUGES: These are devices that are linked together in the thousands to separate uranium 235, the isotope used to fuel power plants and weapons, from uranium hexafluoride gas.

Tehran asserts that it's working only on the P1, an older centrifuge whose design it admitted buying as part of a 1987 deal with the smuggling network led by A.Q. Khan, the father of Pakistan's nuclear arsenal.

But IAEA experts who studied materials and documents that the Khan ring supplied to Libya concluded that, like Libya, Iran also received the design of the P2, a device twice as efficient as the P1.

Confronted by the IAEA, Iran admitted omitting from its 2003 declaration a 1995 purchase of P2 blueprints from the Khan network.

Iranian officials insisted that they did nothing with the blueprints until they were given to an engineering firm for limited research in 2002.

When IAEA inspectors visited the firm, they discovered that it had fabricated a P2 component from a specialized metal, maraging steel. They later determined that the firm had ties to the Iranian military.

Iran has dragged its feet on providing additional data on its P2 work.

DOJ_NMG_0012050

"We have a deep and wide body of intelligence that Iran has a parallel clandestine centrifuge program, but we have never been able to get coordinates," said a U.S. official, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "We assume it is a P2 capacity they are focusing on."

Those suspicions grew after Iran told the IAEA that it broke the seals on a stock of maraging steel when it resumed enrichment work at Natanz, a key research facility, he said.

While the metal has limited applications in the P1 program centered at Natanz, "it is basically a necessity in the P2," said the U.S. official.

U.S. experts, he said, believe that Iranian officials may have resumed work at Natanz so they could use P1 machines to investigate and resolve technical hurdles in the suspected P2 program.

"It doesn't seem credible that they got P2 design information and it sat on a shelf," said Corey Hinderstein of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private research group that monitors the Iranian program.

Another unanswered question related to the P2 work "is the level of the involvement of military or military organs," she said.

OTHER KHAN RING DOCUMENTS: The IAEA has outstanding questions about the 1987 deal in which Iran admitted purchasing P1 blueprints and components and related documents from the Khan ring.

ElBaradei revealed in November that one document Iran provided contained specifications for casting and milling enriched uranium metal into hemispheres - which have no application in civilian power plants, but form the explosive core of nuclear warheads.

Iran said it didn't ask for the document and did nothing with it.

But an official close to the IAEA, who asked not to be identified further, said the issue is a serious one and agency investigators are interviewing former members of the Khan network to assess Iran's claim.

Another pressing question is whether Iran bought blueprints for a Chinese-designed nuclear warhead in 1987 from the Khan ring.

Documents provided to Iran by the Khan network were identical to papers that Khan sold to Libya, which received a Chinese nuclear warhead design.

"This is a fairly new concern that opens up a new avenue of investigation ... that Iran is blocking," said the U.S. official. "This to us is one of the key indicators of weapons intent by Iran."

WARHEAD RESEARCH: The IAEA opened an inquiry earlier this month into whether Iran has been secretly developing a nuclear warhead for its medium-range missiles.

The official close to the agency said that the Bush administration has turned over to the agency thousands of pages of computer simulations and studies that appeared to indicate that Iranian missile experts have been working on such a program.

The data came from a laptop computer obtained by U.S. intelligence officials in 2004 reportedly from a source in Iran, the official said.

Iranian officials deny that such materials exist.

THE BULLDOZED PLANT: The IAEA also is still investigating activities that took place at the Lavizan-Shian site.

Iran told the agency that research there involved the treatment of casualties of a nuclear attack and that the Tehran municipal government razed the facility after it prevailed over the military in an ownership dispute.

Environmental samples taken by IAEA inspectors when they were finally allowed into the site last summer found no traces of radioactivity.

Iran has been refusing to allow agency experts to interview senior officers who ran the center or to inspect equipment removed from it that had both civilian purposes and applications for centrifuge development.

"The IAEA has hard evidence of dual-use equipment ordered for Lavizan that almost certainly was used in a centrifuge research and development program," said the U.S. official.

US Moves To Delink Indian Nuclear Deal With Iran Vote (AFP)

AFP, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012051

Washington moved to unlink a landmark US-India civilian nuclear deal with how New Delhi votes on the Iranian nuclear question at a key meeting of the UN atomic watchdog agency.

"Well, we deal with the Indian Government on these two issues as separate issues," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters on Wednesday. "Certainly, they come up in the same conversations, I'll tell you that," he said.

US Ambassador to India David Mulford had warned Wednesday that a historic deal giving American nuclear technology to India might fall through if New Delhi did not vote against Iran at the February 2-3 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

The West wants to refer Iran to the UN Security Council amid concerns over its nuclear program heightened earlier this month when Tehran announced it was suspending a voluntary moratorium and resuming sensitive nuclear research work.

Western countries suspect Iran wants to build nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear power program, a charge Tehran denies.

Mulford had said that a prospective deal for the United States to transfer civilian nuclear technology to India would "die" in the US Congress if India voted against a resolution on Iran.

If India decides not to back the resolution, "the effect on members of the US Congress with regard to (India-US) civil nuclear initiative will be devastating," Mulford told the Press Trust of India (PTI) news agency.

India, which carried out a string of nuclear tests in 1998 and declared itself to be a nuclear-armed state, bristled at Mulford's comments, saying New Delhi would be guided by its own national interest.

McCormack said Washington encouraged the Indian Government to vote for Iran's referral to the UN Security Council but "ultimately, that is going to be their decision."

But he recalled that last September, India voted along with the United States when Iran came up before the global atomic agency, a part of the United Nations.

Under the Indo-US nuclear deal, signed by US President George W. Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh last July, India would get advanced nuclear technology which it has been denied for 30 years for conducting nuclear tests and refusing to sign on to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

For the deal to be approved, the United States wants India to separate its civilian and military nuclear programs under a plan that would place its civilian nuclear reactors under IAEA inspection.

Mulford said Washington felt the ideas put forth by India on nuclear programme separation had not met the "test of credibility".

US Says India Nuclear Deal May Depend On Iran Vote (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

NEW DELHI (Reuters) - The United States said on Wednesday a nuclear cooperation deal with India may stall unless New Delhi votes against Iran next month at the U.N. nuclear energy watchdog.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) meets on February 2 to discuss whether to refer Iran to the U.N. Security Council over a nuclear program the West says is aimed at developing weapons, which Tehran denies.

The U.S. ambassador to India, David Mulford, told the Press Trust of India news agency that if India decided not to vote against Iran, "the effect on members of the U.S. Congress with regard to the civil nuclear initiative will be devastating."

The agency quoted Mulford as saying the deal would "die," but the government said it would vote based on its "own independent judgment."

U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday the IAEA was unlikely to decide at that meeting what to do about Iran.

U.S. President George Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed in July an accord on civil nuclear energy that would reverse a nearly 30-year-old ban on atomic cooperation with New Delhi, which has tested nuclear arms.

The deal has yet to be fully worked out, especially the key requirement of a separation plan for India's civil and military nuclear facilities, and must then pass a final test in the U.S. Congress and be agreed by the 44-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group.

DOJ_NMG_0012052

India surprised its historic ally Iran in September by siding with the West when the IAEA declared Iran had failed to comply with its international obligations.

Its role at next week's IAEA meeting is being keenly watched.

"The position India will take on this issue at the IAEA will be based on India's own independent judgment," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

"We categorically reject any attempt to link this to the proposed India-U.S. agreement on civil nuclear energy cooperation."

The first sign of trouble with the deal came last week when after talks with Indian officials U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said there were "difficulties" in finalizing it but that he remained hopeful.

The two sides were hoping to finish the pact before Bush visits the subcontinent in March.

U.S. Envoy Says India Nuke Deal Could Die (AP)

By Matthew Rosenberg

AP, January 26, 2006

The U.S. ambassador to India said Wednesday that a nuclear deal between India and the United States could "die" if New Delhi supports Iran during a U.N. atomic watchdog agency meeting. The State Department said the envoy was speaking for himself.

A week before the International Atomic Energy Agency meets to discuss Iran's nuclear program, Ambassador David Mulford said that if India does not vote to refer Tehran to the U.N. Security Council, it would be "devastating" to the deal currently before the U.S. Congress.

"I think the Congress will simply stop considering the matter," Mulford told the Press Trust of India news agency.

The deal, seen as a cornerstone of the emerging alliance between India and the United States, "will die in the Congress," he said.

The U.S. Embassy confirmed that Mulford was accurately quoted. The State Department in Washington said later that Mulford wasn't speaking for the U.S. government.

"The Ambassador was expressing his personal opinions about what the potential political outcome might be. He was giving his personal assessment of how the Congress might react to such an action by India," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Mulford's frank comments were the first time a senior U.S. official has made a direct link between India's stance on the Iran issue and the nuclear deal.

After Mulford's comments, India reiterated that the two issues should remain separate.

"We categorically reject any attempt to link (Iran) to the proposed Indo-U.S. agreement on civil nuclear energy cooperation, which stands on its own merits," Indian Foreign Ministry spokesman Navtej Sarna said in a statement.

"The position that India will take on this issue at the IAEA will be based on India's own independent judgment."

Under the deal, Washington is to share civilian nuclear technology and supply nuclear fuel to India in return for New Delhi separating its civilian and military nuclear programs and allowing international inspections of its atomic facilities.

The separation is necessary because the United States has only agreed to recognize India as having a civilian nuclear program — not as a legitimate nuclear weapons state.

The deal was signed in July when Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh visited Washington, and marked a major policy shift for the United States, which imposed sanctions on India in 1998 after it conducted nuclear tests. The restrictions have been lifted.

IAEA referral of Iran to the Security Council could lead to economic and political sanctions against Tehran, which the United States and European powers fear could use its nuclear program to develop weapons. Tehran insists its program is for generating electricity.

European countries believe they have enough votes at the IAEA, which will hold an emergency board session on Feb. 2, to haul Iran before the Security Council. But they are seeking support from Russia, China and key developing nations, such as India.

DOJ_NMG_0012053

New Delhi voted in September with the U.S. and European powers on an earlier IAEA resolution that could have led to Iran's referral to the council.

But the Indian government faced fierce domestic criticism over the move from its left-wing political allies, who accused it of selling out a longtime ally to curry favor with Washington. New Delhi has, in recent weeks, appeared hesitant to repeat the vote, instead urging negotiations with Tehran.

India, which has few domestic sources of fuel, also plans to build a 1,750-mile gas pipeline from Iran through Pakistan, a project that has raised concerns in Washington.

"We have made it known to (India) that we would very much like India's support because India has arrived on the world stage and is a very important player in the world," Mulford said.

Iran, Russia Closer To Uranium Deal (REU)

By Parisa Hafezi

Reuters, January 26, 2006

TEHRAN (Reuters) - Iran again threatened on Wednesday to start full-scale uranium enrichment if reported to the U.N. Security Council, while signalling interest in a Russian proposal aimed at calming its nuclear row with the West.

The council's five veto-wielding permanent members plus Germany plan to meet in London on Monday to try to resolve differences over whether to send Iran to the council at a crisis meeting of the U.N. nuclear watchdog on February 2, diplomats said.

They said foreign ministers of Britain, China, France, Russia, the United States and Germany would seek a consensus before the 35-nation board of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) gathers in Vienna to weigh what to do about Iran.

The United States and its European Union allies say it is time for the IAEA to turn Iran's nuclear dossier over to the Security Council. China and Russia have urged caution.

U.S. ambassador to India, David Mulford, suggested to the Press Trust of India news agency that a nuclear cooperation deal with India could collapse unless New Delhi voted against Iran next month at the IAEA. So far India has been non-committal.

But U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said how India voted was solely a decision for the Indian government.

"We deal with the Indian government on these two issues as separate issues," he said of the Iran vote and the U.S.-Indian nuclear agreement sealed last July.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said he doubted any decision on referral could be reached at the February 2 meeting.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said his country would immediately halt voluntary dealings with the IAEA, which include snap checks on its atomic sites, if sent to the council.

Iran, going beyond its Non-Proliferation Treaty obligations, allows impromptu inspections by the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Mottaki urged the Britain, France and Germany to renew talks they halted this month when Iran removed U.N. seals on uranium enrichment equipment and resumed nuclear fuel research.

RUSSIAN PROPOSAL

Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said after talks in Moscow he was positive about the idea of setting up a joint venture with Russia to purify uranium on Russian soil.

He said the plan could be "perfected" at talks in Moscow set for February 16 -- two weeks after the IAEA board meeting.

The proposal aims to prevent Iran gaining technology that could be used for military purposes. Iran says it does not want atomic bombs, but has the right to enrich uranium at home.

Foreign Secretary Jack Straw reiterated that the Russian proposal was welcome if it enabled Iran to receive nuclear fuel that was processed safely outside its borders.

"That may provide a solution," he told a news conference in Cyprus. "But what the world is also looking for is for Iran to stop the beginnings of running its centrifuges. That's essential if it is to avoid reference to the Security Council."

Annan said it was encouraging to hear the Iranians say they were considering the Russian offer seriously. "It is a solution that the international community is ready to accept," he told Reuters on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum in Davos.

DOJ_NMG_0012054

He said he was not sure any decision on referring Iran to the council could be taken before the IAEA board gets a report that the agency's chief Mohamed ElBaradei aims to deliver at the end of February for a regular board meeting in March.

ElBaradei has already rejected Western pressure to provide a full report for the emergency meeting.

IAEA safeguards investigators led by deputy agency director general Olli Heinonen flew to Tehran on Tuesday to try to get Iran to reveal more about its past nuclear activities.

Larijani, who begins a visit to China on Thursday, warned that referral would prompt Iran to begin large-scale enrichment.

Mottaki said there was no way Iran would suspend its atomic fuel research programme, a step the EU trio has made a condition for any renewal of talks that began in 2003.

Russia and China are reluctant to see Iran hauled before the council, which has the power to impose sanctions, and do not back a draft EU resolution asking the IAEA for referral.

An EU diplomat said Moscow wanted the IAEA only to "inform" the council about Iran. He said China had told the EU it had its own proposal, but had not submitted it in writing.

(Additional reporting by Mark Heinrich in Vienna, Oliver Bullough in Moscow and Madeline Chambers in London)

Annan Doubts West Can Make Iran Decision In Feb (REU)

By Evelyn Leopold

Reuters, January 26, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan 25 (Reuters) - U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday he doubted that a U.N. nuclear watchdog would be able to come to a decision by early February on referring Iran to the Security Council over its nuclear programme.

Annan told Reuters that Mohamed ElBaradei, the director-general of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, did not expect to have a report on Iran ready until the end of February, for the IAEA's regular board meeting in March.

"I am not sure that they will be ready to refer (Iran) to the Security Council if the official report of the board has not been released and deliberated upon by the board and a decision taken," Annan said on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum.

The IAEA is scheduled to discuss the crisis on Feb. 2.

The United States and its European Union allies say it is time for the IAEA to turn Iran's nuclear dossier over to the Security Council. Russia and China are urging caution.

The United States, Britain, France, Russia and China, the five veto-wielding powers of the 15-member Security Council, plus Germany plan to meet in London on Monday to try to resolve differences over whether to send Iran to the council. Both Russia and China to date have opposed a formal referral.

Annan said he was encouraged by comments from Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani, who said after talks in Moscow, he was positive about the idea of setting up a joint venture with Russia to purify uranium on Russian soil.

Larijani said the plan could be "perfected" during talks in Moscow scheduled for Feb. 16 -- two weeks after the IAEA board meeting.

Annan previously appealed to Iran to scrap its decision to stop nuclear research and return to negotiations with France, Britain and Germany. He has said a Security Council referral, which could lead to sanctions, should be a last resort.

On Wednesday, he said: "As you know, I have appealed to the Iranians not to escalate, maintain the situation as it is today in order to create the right environment and confidence that negotiations are serious and lead to concrete results that would be mutually acceptable.

"It is also encouraging to hear the Iranians say they are considering the Russian offer very seriously. It is a solution that the international community is ready to accept."

Iranians Accuse British Military Of Aiding Bombers (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

TEHRAN, Jan. 25 -- Iran accused the British military on Wednesday of cooperating with bombers who killed eight people in southwest Iran, an allegation Britain described as ludicrous.

DOJ_NMG_0012055

A little-known group campaigning for independence for Iran's Arab minority asserted responsibility in a Web statement for Tuesday's attacks on a bank and government building in the oil city of Ahvaz.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said that London's involvement was clear and that Tehran would make strong protests. He said the attackers "enjoy the cooperation of British army commanders and use their facilities in Basra," the oil city in southern Iraq.

A spokesman in British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office said Iran's allegation "deserves to be treated with scorn by the whole international community."

U.N. Council Backs Monitors In Lebanon (REU)

By Reuters

Reuters, January 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 25 — (Reuters) — The members of the United Nations Security Council have agreed that United Nations peacekeepers should keep monitoring the Israeli-Lebanese border for six more months, the current Council president said on Wednesday.

Lebanon had asked for a renewal of the mandate of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission for the border area for a year, until Jan. 31, 2007.

But the 15 Security Council members instead reached a consensus on an extension until July 31, said Augustine Mahiga, the United Nations ambassador from Tanzania, which holds the Council presidency for January.

The mandate of the 2,000-member United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon will expire on Jan. 31 unless renewed by the Council. A vote on a resolution prolonging the mission is expected on Monday or Tuesday, Council diplomats said.

While the mission has been in place since March 1978, a draft resolution circulated by France on Wednesday would emphasize "the interim nature" of the mission and emphasize that the Council was "looking forward to the early fulfillment of its mandate."

The draft would also urge Israel and Lebanon to put an end to violations of their shared border and would renew appeals to Lebanon's government to extend its authority across the south, to prevent attacks on Israel from its side of the border.

The Security Council and the United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, have regularly pressed the Lebanese government to assert control over the south since Israel pulled out of the region in May 2000, ending 22 years of occupation.

The militant group Hezbollah dominates the southern part of the country, profiting from a power vacuum there. Hezbollah guerrillas have sporadically clashed with Israeli forces.

The Council and Mr. Annan have been urging the Lebanese government to disarm Hezbollah, in line with a September 2004 Council resolution demanding that all foreign militias on Lebanese soil be disbanded.

But Hezbollah has refused to disarm, and last year it joined the Lebanese government after its candidates did well in June parliamentary elections.

White House Slams Mexico For Aid Maps (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev And Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday accused the Mexican government of facilitating illegal entry into the United States after Mexican officials said they would distribute maps of dangerous border areas and posters with safety instructions and other tips.

Mexico's National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) said the maps, which would provide details of the terrain, cell-phone coverage and water stations set up by the U.S. charity Humane Borders, would help to save lives.

"We oppose in the strongest terms the publication of maps to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. "It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort.

"This effort will entice more people to cross, leading to more migrant deaths and the further enrichment of the criminal human trafficking rings that prey on the suffering of others," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0012056

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States would "take whatever steps it deems necessary to protect its own borders."

"No government, including the government of Mexico, should facilitate or encourage its citizens to try to enter the United States outside established legal procedures," he said.

Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the NHRC is an independent body and receives no government funds. He said the commission is working with Humane Borders in distributing the maps.

Hundreds of Mexicans die every year while crossing the southern U.S. border illegally in search of a better life in the United States. They sometimes walk in temperatures that exceed 110 degrees.

The NHRC said it would distribute about 70,000 posters beginning in March, mostly in border towns and villages, as well as bars and restaurants frequented by emigrants.

The commission also said the posters show the estimated time it takes to walk or drive to nearby cities, note with red dots where migrants have died in the past and mark the location of water stations and emergency beacons set up by U.S. authorities.

"This is going to give people a false sense of security," said Shannon Stevens, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Border Patrol in Tucson, Ariz. "This is going to give them the idea that they are better educated so they can cross the border easier."

But Mexican officials disagreed, saying that illegal border crossing by thousands of people each year is a fact of life and that they are simply trying to prevent tragedies.

"Without a doubt, these maps will enable many lives to be saved," Mauricio Farah, an inspector with the NHRC said in Mexico City. "We are not trying in any way to encourage or promote migration. The only thing we are trying to do is warn them of the risks they face and where to get water, so they don't die."

Mexican officials also said that the posters would warn potential emigrants not to believe promises of an easy journey from smugglers. "Don't Do It," the posters say. "It's Hard. There's Not Enough Water."

At the same time, they advise migrants to travel with someone they trust and bring enough water and food, phone numbers of relatives, identification, and shoes adequate for a long and difficult journey.

Last year, the Mexican government issued a comic-style book as a guide to migrants on how to cross the border and avoid detection. It included "practical advice" on when and where to enter and what to wear and other instructions, including a tip to avoid sending children with strangers.

Illegal migration has become a thorny issue in the U.S.-Mexico relationship.

Mexican President Vicente Fox has called for a "status of regularization" for Mexicans illegally in the United States, which would allow them to remain as long as they were employed. He also has criticized recently approved legislation in the House authorizing the construction of 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border and the designation of illegal entry as a felony.

"What is not resolved by intelligent policies and by leaders is resolved by citizens. That is how the Berlin Wall fell and that is how this wall will fall," he told Reuters news agency Tuesday. "I hope it isn't even built because, if it is, it will fall."

Migrants working in the United States are a huge source of revenue for Mexico, sending home an estimated $16 billion a year -- Mexico's second largest source of foreign currency after oil exports.

The Mexican government has vigorously lobbied U.S. lawmakers and civic leaders for a guest-worker status for millions of illegal aliens in the United States, working through a coalition of U.S.-based immigration rights groups.

Part of the Fox administration's effort to assist Mexican nationals in this country has included a move to adopt the consular or "matricula" identification cards issued to its citizens in the United States. The cards assist Mexican nationals in sending money home.

•This article is based in part on wire service reports.

Sheriff Demands Probe Of Incursions (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

A Texas border sheriff yesterday demanded that the U.S. and Mexican governments investigate incursions into the United States by heavily armed drug escorts dressed in Mexican military uniforms "before someone gets killed."

DOJ_NMG_0012057

Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., who heads the Texas Sheriff's Border Coalition, said a growing number of suspected incursions and violence aimed at the area's law-enforcement officers is making the border "a pretty dangerous place."

"We have tried everything we know to make the federal government aware of the problems at the border and how they have affected us," said Sheriff Gonzalez, who has fewer than two dozen deputies to patrol 1,000 square miles, including 60 miles of Texas-Mexico border.

"It appears our government is covering this thing up because it just doesn't want to admit there is a problem," he said. "Trade between the United States and Mexico may be more important to Washington than human lives."

His comments come in the wake of an incident Monday in which U.S. law-enforcement authorities in Hudspeth County, Texas, confronted several men in Mexican military uniforms who were accompanying drug smugglers. The "soldiers" were in a camouflaged Humvee with a mounted .50-caliber machine gun, said Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West.

Yesterday, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, said she was "deeply concerned" about the possible incursions and asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to "fully investigate this matter and report to Congress the details and confirm whether or not Mexican military officials were involved.

"But make no mistake -- this is only a symptom of a much larger problem," she said. "Even after September 11, our nation's borders remain porous. We must take bold action in securing our borders."

The Mexican government has denied that the men in any of the incidents were soldiers, saying that some drug smugglers dress in military-style uniforms, carry automatic weapons and drive military-style vehicles.

Sheriff Gonzalez said he could not confirm that the men were soldiers, but said he was skeptical of the denials by the Mexican government. He described the suspected soldiers as "very military looking, clean cut and in good physical condition -- not your average drug smuggler."

"When you spot a Humvee with military paint on it and a .50 caliber machine gun, this leads you to suspect that it's not a vehicle being used by drug lords," Sheriff Gonzalez said.

In Monday's incident, Hudspeth sheriff's deputies pursued three SUVs back to Mexico after spotting them driving north from the Rio Grande. Sheriff West said the pursuit ended on the U.S. side of the border when the deputies -- joined by Texas state troopers -- encountered at least 10 heavily armed men in what he described as battle dress uniforms.

Sheriff West said deputies found 1,400 pounds of marijuana in one of the vehicles abandoned after it blew a tire early in the pursuit. Another made it into Mexico and a third got stuck in the Rio Grande and was burned by the "soldiers" after it was unloaded, said Sheriff West, who is a Border Coalition member.

No shots were fired and no injuries were reported.

U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman Kristi M. Clemens said the Hudspeth County incident is under investigation and CBP is "coordinating closely" with the federal, state and local authorities. She said the government also has discussed the matter with Mexico and is asking for a thorough investigation and response.

California Republican Reps. David Dreier and Duncan Hunter have asked three House committees and the Department of Homeland Security to investigate suspected incursions by the Mexican military. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, also asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to "initiate an official investigation" and "open a dialogue with Mexico to prevent any future incursions."

In November, Sheriff Gonzalez said Hudspeth deputies chased a dump truck, which also fled and got stuck in the Rio Grande. He said men dressed in uniforms showed up and threatened the deputies with machine guns. He said the men then bulldozed the truck back into Mexico.

On the border in Zapata County in September, he said, three of his deputies spotted 25 men dressed in military uniforms in the U.S. during a late-night patrol. He said that the men marched two abreast and carried duffel bags and automatic weapons, and that his outmanned and outgunned deputies retreated.

"The only thing you can do in that kind of situation is seek cover," Sheriff Gonzalez said. "I'm not going to lose someone in an unfair fight."

Reports Cite Incursions On U.S. Border (LAT)

By Richard Marosi, Robert J. Lopez And Rich Connell, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

Armed Mexican government personnel made unauthorized incursions into the United States five times in the last three months of 2005, including one incident last month in Southern California, according to confidential Department of Homeland Security records.

The crossings involved police officers or soldiers in military vehicles and were among 231 such incidents recorded by the U.S. Border Patrol in the last 10 years.

The records obtained by The Times provide new details on more than a dozen incursions into the U.S., including the five most recent ones.

Details of the incidents emerged as authorities on both sides of the border scrambled to investigate a dangerous confrontation Monday in Texas.

Heavily armed personnel in a military-style Humvee from Mexico helped drug smugglers fleeing police to escape back across the border, according to authorities. An internal Border Patrol summary of the incident said the Humvee was equipped with a .50-caliber machine gun.

It was the second such incident in three months in the same rural county southeast of El Paso.

"It's clear you're dealing with a large number of incursions by bona-fide Mexican military units, based on the tactics and the equipment being used," said T.J. Bonner, a Border Patrol veteran and president of the agents union.

Reports of incursions into the U.S. by gun-toting groups of men dressed in what appeared to be military or police uniforms along the Mexican frontier have become a powerful rallying point for advocates of illegal immigration crackdowns and tighter border security.

The incursions have also intensified a long-running debate over the merits of fencing the 2,000-mile Mexican border, now a patchwork of metal barriers, rusted and broken barbed wire and expanses of rugged terrain where the divide is difficult to identify. In Texas, the Rio Grande separates the two nations.

U.S. Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar said that incursions by Mexican government personnel were nothing new, and that U.S. agents on occasion have crossed accidentally into Mexico. He noted that incursions have declined by more than 50% since 2002. Still, with assault rates against agents at record highs, any incursion is taken "very seriously."

"These are not taken lightly at any level within the Border Patrol … and it is an ongoing concern," Aguilar said.

U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that this week's incident in Texas was "about as serious as it gets" and noted that dozens of reported incursions have occurred in his state.

The encounters seriously undermine efforts to stop the flow of drugs coming across the U.S. border and suggest possible cooperation among Mexican authorities and traffickers, he said.

"You do not want to get into a fight with guys carrying machine guns," said Kyl, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Terrorism, Technology and Homeland Security.

He has asked the State Department to investigate the incursions and said that he plans to hold a hearing on the issue in March. Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a leading anti-illegal immigration lawmaker, called this week for U.S. troops to be deployed along the border to counter armed incursions.

Mexican officials on Wednesday denied that their police and military have been involved in illicit crossings but said they are investigating Monday's incident.

In recent interviews, local and federal law enforcement officials in south Texas and the San Diego area said a long pattern of encounters with Mexican government units along the border have bolstered suspicions that their counterparts work with smugglers. In Laredo, Texas, authorities said they have repeatedly seen Mexican military units clearing people from brushy areas along the south banks of the Rio Grande shortly before loads of migrants and drugs are brought across.

Several of the incidents described in the Department of Homeland Security reports appeared to involve Mexican officials getting lost or pursuing suspects. For example, five Tijuana police officers pursued two men across the border in 2004. Some of the officers fired at the suspects while on U.S. soil, according to a Border Patrol report. The police returned to Mexico after arresting the men.

DOJ_NMG_0012059

Other encounters were more suspicious and add to concerns among many U.S. law enforcement officials that corruption in Mexico is eroding efforts to gain control of the border and combat trafficking in humans and drugs.

In October, Border Patrol agents in the El Cajon area east of San Diego reported seeing Humvees on the south side of the border fence. Minutes later, they saw two men in Mexican military uniforms carrying rifles in a creek bed north of the border, according to the records. When an agent approached, the two men ran south and drove off in the Humvees. Agents found footprints indicating three or four individuals had come north of the border and then returned.

Other incidents included Mexican helicopters flying north into U.S. airspace near El Paso for about 15 minutes, five Mexican officials armed with assault rifles entering the country near El Centro and returning without incident, and two Mexican police officers observed wandering along the U.S. side of the border near Yuma, Ariz.

Witnesses in El Paso reported in 2004 that a Mexican military-style helicopter landed just south of the border and armed men in federal police uniforms crossed into the U.S. and questioned them about vehicles before returning to Mexico, according to a Border Patrol report.

A spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, Rafael Laveaga, said Wednesday that he had not seen the report and declined to comment.

He said there have been accidental entries across the border in recent years by both U.S. and Mexican law enforcement personnel. As a result of those incidents, Mexican military units are prohibited from coming within a mile of the U.S. border unless they receive authorization from commanders to pursue criminals, Laveaga said.

Many U.S. law enforcement authorities paint a different picture.

"Every time traffickers come across, the military is close by," said Sheriff Arvin West of Hudspeth County, Texas, where Monday's standoff occurred. He said military crossings occur weekly in his county and are so common that "people don't even report it anymore."

Monday's incident is being investigated by U.S., Texas and Mexican authorities. But initial accounts appear to make it one of the clearest examples yet of either private militia or government troops aiding traffickers.

A confidential Border Patrol summary of the incident said it began when county sheriff's deputies and state troopers tried to stop three vehicles on an interstate highway southeast of El Paso. All three vehicles made a run for the border, the report said.

One vehicle, a black 2006 Cadillac Escalade loaded with nearly 1,500 pounds of marijuana in plastic-wrapped bales, was abandoned near the border, West said.

As deputies approached the river they saw a Mexican military Humvee on the U.S. side, West said. A second vehicle bogged down in ankle-deep water in the Rio Grande, while the other made it back to Mexico.

"The Humvee attempted to push and pull [the stuck vehicle] toward Mexico to no avail," the Border Patrol summary said.

At that point, West said, Mexican soldiers and civilians began unloading marijuana from the stranded vehicle. About 20 Mexican personnel in military uniforms, with insignias on their caps, took up positions on the south side of the river and pointed automatic rifles at about half a dozen sheriff's deputies and state troopers.

"They were daring my guys to make a move," West said.

As deputies took photos, the uniformed men burned the vehicle after it had been unloaded, then retreated into Mexico.

Laveaga, the Mexican embassy spokesman, said his country's military units in the area do not use Humvees or the types of weapons described by U.S. authorities. He noted that Mexican drug-smuggling rings have been known to use military uniforms and weapons.

Bonner, of the border agents union, questioned how anyone "can move around in a Humvee with a 50-cal on it unless they have the permission of the government."

West said the confrontation was similar to an incident in mid-November in the same area. In that incident, sheriff's deputies and Border Patrol agents who intercepted a disabled dump truck filled with several tons of marijuana were backed off by heavily armed, uniformed men described by West as military personnel.

A bulldozer appeared on the Mexican side, West said, and towed the truck back across the border.

Texas has launched its own investigation of this week's incident, said Rachael Novier, a spokeswoman for Gov. Rick Perry. Regardless of who was involved on the Mexican side, she said, "it was unacceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0012060

Why Mexico Helps US Fight Terror (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

TUCSON, ARIZ. - A top priority of the United States government is to prevent a determined terrorist from crossing the US-Mexico border. It is also becoming a primary mission for Mexico - and the first place it's focusing on is the 375-mile, desolate stretch of land that abuts Arizona.

In addition to sharing intelligence and cooperating on investigations with its US counterparts in Arizona, Mexico last year set up three checkpoints along known human-smuggling routes on its side of the border and plans to add two more.

Between August, when the checkpoints became operational, and December, Mexican officials stopped 1,277 non-Mexicans (OTMs, for "other than Mexicans") from crossing into Arizona, according to a Mexican government report obtained by the Monitor. The report shows that most of the OTMs came from Central and South America, but seven are listed as Iraqis.

FBI officials decline to say if they know what became of the Iraqis detained in Mexico. The seven - believed to have been apprehended simultaneously at one checkpoint - could be members of a single family or unrelated individuals simply trying to find a better life in the US. But they also could have been trying to illegally cross the southern border for nefarious purposes.

That's where the additional checkpoints could prove crucial.

The Mexican government has "an immense interest in making sure terrorists don't cross from Mexico into the US," says Ben Peres of the FBI office in Tucson, the bureau's liaison here with Mexico on cross-border issues. "If something were to harm the US, it would harm them, too."

Government officials and terror experts have long fretted about the porous border between the US and Mexico. With the onset of the Iraq war in 2003, they worried that teams of Iraqis might cross the border to set off terror attacks inside the US, and they say they know that people tied to Al Qaeda have entered the US through Mexico using false identities. One they cite is Mahmoud Youssef Kourani, who paid to be smuggled across the US-Mexico border in 2001 and later was convicted and imprisoned for providing material support to Hizbullah, which is on the US list of terror groups.

Last March, US officials intercepted a letter purportedly written by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Al Qaeda leader in Iraq, who suggested to his acolytes that it would be easy to infiltrate the US through the southern border.

For its part, the US government is apprehending record numbers of illegal immigrants on the Arizona side of the border. In 2005, Border Patrol officials nabbed 577,418 illegals. Of those, 14,323 were non-Mexicans - up from 9,974 in 2004. Most OTMs came from Central and South America. But 407 came from elsewhere, some from nations designated as "countries of interest," meaning those that are known to harbor terrorists.

US Customs and Border Patrol officials say the number of OTMs from "countries of interest" is small. But they don't divulge these because of "national security and law-enforcement sensitivity issues," says Michael Gramley, Border Patrol spokesman in Yuma, Ariz.

"Borders inherently are dangerous places where the state has the least amount of control and supervision," says Adrian Pantoja, a political scientist at Arizona State University in Tempe. Measures that have been put into place to secure the border so far, he says, are largely symbolic.

"If the US wanted to seal the border with Mexico it could. Look at the demilitarized zone between South Korea and North Korea," Dr. Pantoja says. "The dilemma is really between political will and economic necessity. How do you protect the nation's security while ensuring its economic well-being?"

Still, cooperation between Mexico and the US is steadily improving on the issue of illegal entry of OTMs, FBI officials say. Although they cannot discuss the Iraqis' case specifically, the officials explain how the current system works.

OTMs detained on the Mexican side of the border are screened by Mexican officials for possible criminal or potential terror activities. If evidence of wrongdoing surfaces, Mexican intelligence officials, in turn, share that information with US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

ICE officials then pass that information to the Joint Terrorism Task Force, in a weekly meeting. In Tucson, the JTTF is made up of an FBI official, who leads the effort, and representatives from Border Patrol, ICE, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Arizona state police, and two county sheriff's departments.

"It would be our job to corroborate that information and act appropriately, or debunk it," says the FBI's director of the JTTF in Tucson.

FBI agents in Tucson describe a successful operation in which they have worked with their Mexican counterparts to stop a cross-border people-smuggling ring, one with potential terrorism risks. A joint sting operation led to the arrest last May of Iranian-born Zeayadali Malhamdary, a legal permanent resident of the US. Mr. Malhamdary is now in Arizona awaiting trial on charges of smuggling illegal immigrants into the US. Officials say he smuggled in about 60 Iranians via Mexico - and provided high-quality fraudulent documents for entry into the US. The FBI says it is tracking down the 60 Iranians.

States Weigh Immigration Controls Congress Moving Too Slow For Some (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Frustrated by slow action in Congress, state legislatures are debating whether to increase border enforcement at their own expense, fine employers who use undocumented workers and get local police involved in deporting them.

It's unclear how far the proposals would go because, like Congress, legislatures are divided on what to do about the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants who provide a low-wage workforce in the USA. Federal law may limit state power on actions such as penalizing employers, says Ann Morse, an analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Immigration policy is one of the hottest issues as 37 legislatures convene this month. Last year, states considered 300 immigration laws and approved 40. That number is expected to rise this year, Morse says.

The immigration proposals are part of a larger trend of states getting involved in traditionally federal issues ranging from pollution control to prescription drug prices. Congress is considering changes to immigration policies — a border fence, a guest worker program — but it's uncertain whether action will be taken this year.

Among the state proposals:

•Arizona is debating installing a radar system and video cameras along the state's 340-mile border with Mexico. The proposed $50 million system would alert law enforcement when crossings occur.

•About a dozen states are considering employer sanctions, Morse says. Kentucky's proposal, for example, would fine employers up to $5,000 for knowingly hiring undocumented workers.

•Border states and a few others are ready to spend their own money on immigration enforcement. State and local police would be asked to check the residency status of people arrested or given traffic tickets under some proposals.

Away from the Mexican border, Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty wants to create a team of 10 state agents to police undocumented immigrants, charging them with state crimes such as identity theft or turning them over to federal authorities. “The federal government hasn't been doing a good job, so states have to play a role,” says Pawlenty, a Republican.

Flavia Jimenez, a policy analyst at the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights group, says the legislative activity “reflects real concern about the failure of Congress to pass real immigration reform.” She says the job is best left to the federal government, and states will face a costly task if police get involved in determining people's immigration status.

'Keep America, America' (WSJ)

By Andrew S. Grove

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Recently the House of Representatives passed an immigration bill -- the Sensenbrenner-King bill -- by a vote of 233 to 189. It is now on its way to the Senate.

This bill scares me.

It's not likely to affect me directly. I'm no longer in day-to-day business, nor do I have regular contact with immigrants. But it scares me because it has the potential of turning neighbor against neighbor -- and of changing our country into a place of fear and mistrust.

Let me illustrate. The bill contains a provision punishing anyone who "assists, [or] encourages . . . a person who . . . lacks lawful authority to remain in the United States" to remain here. Punishment: three to 20 years in prison, the same punishment meted out to professional smugglers who profit from transporting illegal aliens across the border.

DOJ_NMG_0012062

This could change the nature of our society in a way that I have seen firsthand. As a Jewish child hiding from the Nazis in Hungary, I saw how the persecution of non-Jewish Hungarians who hid their Jewish friends or neighbors cast a wide blanket of fear over everyone. This fear led to mistrust, and mistrust led to hostility, until neighbors turned upon neighbors in order to protect themselves. Is this what we want?

Consider the potential effect of this bill. Victims of the hurricane that devastated New Orleans more often than not did not have proof of their immigration status. Relief workers who helped them -- for example, by providing schooling to their children -- could have been charged under this bill with assisting undocumented aliens. Volunteers who save the lives of individuals who are left to die by smugglers -- by providing water or food, or by taking them to a hospital -- could face arrest and prosecution. An immigration worker who encourages a refugee from political persecution to seek asylum in the United States could be charged with a felony; so could a manager who forgets to check the papers of a job applicant.

Prosecution of these well-intentioned people will lead to a growing schism. We will be forced to become a nation of identity-checkers; anyone who looked "foreign" would likely have to endure a lifetime of proving their status even if they were native-born American citizens. People will be deterred from helping anyone suspected of foreign origin. The events of World War II, the civil wars in Africa, the strife in the Middle East, ethnic cleansing in the Balkans, the decades-long civil disturbances in Ireland and the recent riots in France, all provide wrenching examples of fractured societies.

This bill forces us to answer the question: What kind of country do we want? Our country has promoted tolerance and diversity through most of its history, providing an outstanding and attractive example to others. Coming to this country and enjoying its openness has taught me how wonderful it is.

Church groups, relief organizations and legal scholars have spoken out against this bill. Business groups have not. Perhaps they consider this bill of little concern to them. I disagree. This is a time when we face increasing competition from well-educated and highly motivated workers from many corners of the world. The stability and diversity of our society are two key competitive differentiators we enjoy. We must hang on to them.

Let's keep America, America.

Mr. Grove, former chairman of the Intel Corporation, is a member of the board of overseers of the International Rescue Committee.

Mexican Candidate Tries To Emerge From Fox's Shadow (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 25 — Francisco Rendón twirled a blue and white party flag in his weathered hands on a recent evening in a square in Querétaro, more than 100 miles northwest of the capital, waiting patiently for the man his party had nominated for the unenviable job of trying to succeed President Vicente Fox and keep the National Action Party in power.

"Fox promised a lot, and we want to see those things completed," Mr. Rendón said, echoing a widespread feeling. "About Felipe Calderón we don't really know anything except that he's a politician."

Mr. Rendón is not alone. During a bitter primary fight last year, Mr. Calderón transformed himself from a little-known former energy commissioner into the best hope for the president's right-of-center party. He is running a strong second in most opinion polls to the leftist former mayor of Mexico City, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, and many political strategists say he has a chance to win the election on July 2.

But outside the capital's opinion-makers and party insiders, surveys show that one in five Mexican voters still do not know who Mr. Calderón is, and as the presidential campaign officially kicked off last week, he made his first tour to try to change that.

Mr. Calderón, 43, opened a sunny, optimistic campaign, presenting himself as a principled, honest and incorruptible man, the only candidate "with clean hands," a young candidate of the future.

He portrays his adversaries as old-fashioned politicians stuck in the past. He depicts Roberto Madrazo of the Institutional Revolutionary Party as a political boss from the old ruling party, the sort who used to buy votes with everything from cash to free roofing and then, once in office, enrich themselves and their friends.

DOJ_NMG_0012063

Mr. López Obrador, candidate of the Party of the Democratic Revolution, he says, is a throwback to the ruinous economic policies of the 1970's, a closed economy with enormous public spending financed by foreign debt.

"In 2006 we have to have an election about the course of the country," Mr. Calderón said Saturday evening at a rally in Aguascalientes, in north central Mexico. "We have to choose between the past and the future."

But perhaps his biggest challenge is President Fox himself. The president remains popular for breaking more than 70 years of one-party rule in 2000 but is seen as having promised much more than he could ever deliver without a majority in Congress. Mr. Fox's image as a reformer has also been tarnished by allegations that his wife's sons have become rich businessmen through influence-peddling.

So every day on the campaign trail Mr. Calderón walks a fine line, praising Mr. Fox for creating economic stability and trying at the same time to distance himself from the many failures of a president who is seen as an ineffectual leader.

"Fox has been a transition president," he said in an interview, speaking slowly and choosing his words with care. "He has the indubitable merit of having been the leader of the transition and the peaceful change of power in Mexico."

But in the same breath Mr. Calderón said he did not plan to suffer from the same congressional deadlock that stymied most of Mr. Fox's reform proposals. "If you don't have a majority, you have to construct it," he said.

For the United States, a Calderón presidency would promise continuity. Like Mr. Fox and most other Mexican politicians, he has railed against a bill in Washington that would build a longer border fence and make illegal migration a felony. Also like Mr. Fox, he wants a guest worker program.

In another north central city, San Luis Potosí, he said: "I'm going to act as president not only with the government of the United States but with the legislators from both parties, Republicans and Democrats, to persuade them that Mexicans are not criminals and that it would be good for the economy of the United States to legally regularize migratory labor. The economy of America cannot advance, would not have been able to advance, at the same rate as it has without Mexican labor."

With such statements Mr. Calderón has tried to tap a wellspring of national pride and feelings of inferiority in Mexico, pledging to make it competitive in everything from industry to sports and to shed its history of corruption and backwardness.

Again and again he says he wants to make Mexico "a winning country," one that "not only competes with the world but beats it."

"My whole life I have dreamed of this country," he told a crowd in Querétaro. "I don't accept that our country will be condemned forever to be behind in development."

To get there he favors a flat tax on businesses and personal income to encourage foreign investment. He wants to continue the free-trade policies of Mr. Fox, arguing that the only way to create jobs and curb migration is to attract investment. He even favors a limited amount of private investment and competition with the state-owned energy companies, a proposal that has long been politically taboo in this country.

Mr. Calderón has also zeroed in on the main preoccupation of middle-class and upper-class Mexicans: organized crime and kidnappings. Calling the current law enforcement agencies "a cancer," he has proposed setting up a single federal police force to replace the myriad, sometimes corrupt, forces that now exist. He also wants to give the local police the power to investigate crimes, something they now lack.

"It's clear to me the potential Mexico has lost because it is not completely law-abiding," he said in an interview. "The potential of Mexico is enormous if we can manage to be a country of judicial certainty. I want to be a president who complies with the law and makes everyone comply with the law."

A short man with a paunch and gray, receding hair, Mr. Calderón lacks the stage presence of President Fox, a barrel-chested man with a baritone voice. When Mr. Calderón arrived at a campaign event for truckers driving a tractor-trailer on Friday in San Juan del Río, not far from Querétaro, the effect was almost comical. He was barely visible behind the wheel.

He is also one of those speakers who seem to confuse shouting with passion, giving speeches that have all the dynamics of a Nascar race, starting loud and getting louder. In private, though, he is serious and analytical, a soft-spoken intellectual who often sounds like the Harvard-trained economist that he is.

The son of one of his party's founders from Morelia, capital of the west central state of Michoacán, Mr. Calderón received advanced degrees in law and economics and spent only a short time in the private sector before running for office at 26 and gaining a seat in Mexico City's assembly. He went on to a seat in Congress in the early 1990's, but lost a race for governor in his home state in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0012064

After that he became national president of his party and engineered gubernatorial victories in three states, as well as victories in more than a dozen mayoral races. In 2000 he supported Mr. Fox but was not close to him. Then the president reached out for him in 2003 to head an agency that builds toll roads and later made him energy secretary.

Mr. Fox asked him to step down in May 2004 when Mr. Calderón made it plain that he would run for president.

Now it remains to be seen whether he can generate the passion for his campaign that he says he feels for Mexico. First he must somehow erase the disappointment and apathy that many in his party feel after Mr. Fox's tenure. And he acknowledges that he needs to pull votes from the two other major parties and from independent voters to put together enough of the popular vote to win.

Asked why he is running, his answer is simple: "I don't want Mexico to go backward."

OPEC Is Expected To Maintain Output Levels (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is widely expected to refrain from trimming output levels when its oil ministers meet in Vienna next week, but Iran remains a wild card.

With the price of oil nearing records recently, an OPEC decision to continue pumping oil at close to capacity should reassure markets of plentiful supply, something Saudi Arabia appears to favor and the U.S. seems to be counting on. In short, there is no economic incentive for OPEC to trim output when market forces have sent billions of extra dollars pouring into the coffers of oil-rich countries anyway.

ENERGY DIARY

See a graphic1 on the rising cost of shipping oil. Plus, world production and consumption data.

Still, Iran -- an OPEC founding member and the No. 4 oil producer in the world -- is feuding with the West over its nuclear ambitions, and it could use the OPEC meeting to send a warning to Western Europe and the U.S., both big oil importers.

"Iran is going to make a political point" at the meeting, predicts Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy, a Washington consulting company. The nuclear dispute has helped push up oil prices recently, and no early resolution is seen, at least for now. "This Iran thing has legs," he said.

Iran appears poised to propose a reduction in OPEC quotas, with Iranian officials citing a buildup of excess supply ahead of a seasonal dip in demand in spring. Venezuela has said it would back such a cut. Still, these two countries are unlikely to carry the day at OPEC, if Saudi Arabia and its allies in the cartel hold firm against reducing the group's quotas totaling 28 million barrels a day for 10 members, excluding Iraq.

Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali Naimi, the de facto leader of OPEC, and Nigerian Oil Minister Edmund Daukoru, who is OPEC's president, already have said they see no reason to cut production at next week's meeting. Oil prices are on the "high side," Mr. Naimi told an Indian TV network this week. He added: "Unless the market changes significantly between now and the meeting, there is probably no real reason to do anything different."

Yesterday, the benchmark light, sweet crude-oil futures for March delivery fell $1.21, to settle at $65.85 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Based on that price, this year the U.S. benchmark price is up $4.81 from the settlement price of $61.04 recorded Dec. 30, the last trading day of 2005.

Many in the industry, including the U.S. Energy Department, see prices rising this year. Some see them skyrocketing.

"We'll see a price well above $100 a barrel before the end of the year," predicts Philip Verleger Jr., an oil analyst and senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics in Washington. Mr. Verleger cites international uncertainties, strong world economic growth, lack of interest by central banks in the price of oil and changes in oil-product specifications. He also cited investor interest. "Oil is a tremendous investment and $3 billion have already gone into the [U.S. benchmark] contract" on the Nymex this year, Mr. Verleger said.

DOJ_NMG_0012065

Many other analysts are far less bullish on oil prices. But, by all accounts, demand for oil continues to rise as the world economy flourishes. The International Energy Agency in Paris expects world oil demand to increase by 1.8 million barrels a day this year to 85.1 million barrels a day.

U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says he has been in regular contact with oil producers. "By and large, they seem to be understanding that we have a situation where there needs to be more oil rather than less oil in the world," Mr. Bodman said this week.

The question is if Iran shares in that understanding. The OPEC meeting is scheduled to take place two days before the International Atomic Energy Agency meets, also in Vienna, to consider what to do to dissuade Iran from moving toward enriching uranium.

Iran has drawn a link between any move by the West to seek United Nations approval for sanctions and the price of oil. Iran produces nearly four million barrels of oil a day, exporting 2.5 million. The spare oil-pumping capacity of the rest of the world is currently estimated at less than two million barrels a day.

Sanctions against Iran aren't considered imminent, and Iran isn't seen as being close to halting oil exports. Still, the dispute could provoke Iran into using the OPEC meeting to grandstand ahead of the nuclear meeting. "They don't have many big venues to bluster," says Yasser Elguindi, a managing director at Medley Global Advisors.

Roh Opposes U.S. On Regime Change Plans For NorthWarns Of 'Difference Of Opinion' (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

SEOUL -- A day after the United States urged South Korea to take an active stance against what it contends are North Korea's illicit financial activities, Seoul refused to say whether it would take action and made clear it opposed any attempt at regime change in Pyongyang.

"When it comes to the North Korean regime, raising issues about it or pressuring it or sometimes wishing for its collapse, on that position of some Americans, we do not agree," South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said in a press conference yesterday.

"If the U.S. government tried to solve the situation through that process, there might be a rift or a difference of opinion between the two governments."

He added that whereas both governments had officially agreed to resolve the North Korean nuclear issue through dialogue, there was, however, no dispute.

Mr. Roh's comments came one day after the U.S. Embassy released a statement in which U.S. officials requested Seoul join action against what it says are illicit financial activities by the North Korean government.

Some here think the U.S. move is part of a strategy to squeeze Pyongyang by cutting off its funding sources.

By "some Americans," Mr. Roh appeared to be referring to hard-liners in the Bush administration who favor toppling North Korean strongman Kim Jong-il.

Mr. Roh refused to respond to the U.S. accusations on North Korea.

"A detailed review needs to take place ... fact-finding and consultation between the two governments is necessary," he said. "I don't think it is now time for the Korean president to express an opinion on this issue. It is quite risky for the [Korean] president to get into this directly and draw a conclusion."

Also yesterday, the South Korean Foreign Ministry released a statement in which it said that the U.S. Embassy's press release on Tuesday was "inappropriate," and did not accurately represent the results of talks between U.S. and Korean officials.

In its release, the U.S. Embassy said it had "urged" South Korea to take action against the North Korean transactions. The ministry denied being asked to take any concrete steps.

Analysts think that the reason for a U.S. Treasury team's 10-day Asian tour was to present Asian capitals with evidence of North Korea's financial crimes, pressuring them to act.

But given that there has been evidence of Pyongyang's activities for years, the chances of Beijing or Seoul exerting pressure at the insistence of a frustrated Washington appears minimal at present.

DOJ_NMG_0012066

"South Koreans feel that quiet diplomacy is the way to go with North Korea," said Michael Breen, the Seoul-based author of a biography of Mr. Kim. "The Americans believe that if you are nice to the North Koreans, they will abuse you, but if you are tough, you might make progress. It's a classic carrot-and-stick dispute."

There have been cracks in the Seoul-Washington "blood-forged alliance" since President Bush was inaugurated in 2000: His administration's North Korean policies have contravened the engagement policies promoted by South Korean President Kim Dae-jung from 1997-2002, and by Mr. Roh currently.

U.S., South Korea Near Free-Trade Talks (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The United States and South Korea are very close to launching negotiations for a free-trade agreement, which would be the most economically significant free-trade pact for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement, according to people familiar with the matter.

Officials in Washington and Seoul have been discussing the idea of a trade accord for more than a year, fueled by a mutual desire to deepen an already extensive commercial relationship. Two-way trade was $72 billion in 2004, making South Korea the United States' seventh-largest trading partner. The United States is the second-largest market for Korean exports.

But both sides have been reluctant to start formal talks until they are reasonably confident that the negotiations would end in agreement. South Korea's farmers are bitterly opposed to opening their country's agricultural markets, and their political clout could scuttle a deal.

Most of the other countries the United States has free-trade pacts with have much smaller economies than South Korea and are thus much less important markets for U.S. products. They include Chile, Singapore, Jordan, Israel, Australia, Morocco, Bahrain, and the six countries in the Central America-Dominican Republic Free Trade Agreement, which squeaked through Congress in July. For example, combined U.S. exports to the six CAFTA-DR countries were $15 billion in 2004, whereas exports to South Korea reached $26 billion.

Only the NAFTA countries -- Canada and Mexico -- surpass South Korea among current and likely free-trade partners as a market for U.S. exports. Canada bought $190 billion in U.S. products in 2004, and Mexico bought $110 billion.

Free-trade agreements have proliferated in recent years and involve a variety of provisions. The United States has generally insisted on eliminating or phasing out all tariffs and other impediments to bilateral trade, including agriculture, though it has sometimes allowed exceptions or long phase-out periods for a handful of products. Korea would certainly insist on maintaining some protections for its rice market, said Jeffrey J. Schott, a scholar at the Institute for International Economics who has written a book about the benefits of a U.S.-Korea deal.

A 2001 study by the U.S. International Trade Commission estimated that a U.S.-Korea free-trade agreement could increase U.S. exports to Korea by $19 billion and U.S. imports from Korea by $10 billion. As large as those numbers are, they would not have an appreciable impact on U.S. gross domestic product, which is in the $11 trillion range.

Although plans to launch the U.S.-Korea talks could still founder, officials and other sources who have spoken recently with negotiators said an announcement is likely to materialize before long. Asked about the prospects, one administration official replied, "How do you say 'soon' in Korean?" The source spoke on condition of anonymity because the final decision has not yet been made.

Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, heightened the speculation Friday when he told reporters, "We'll be announcing some additional [free-trade agreement] partners soon. As I think you will notice, they will not be with small economies because I do think we need to move on to some larger economies."

Yesterday, Neena Moorjani, a spokeswoman for Portman, said it was "premature" to say whether the formal talks with Korea would be launched.

Moscow-Kiev Gas Spat Heats Up As Supplies, Temperatures Drop (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012067

Bickering over natural-gas shipments intensified between Moscow and Kiev as reduced supplies of Russian gas to Europe led to shortages in several countries and fueled energy-security anxieties across a continent gripped by an arctic cold snap.

Russia, which provides a quarter of Europe's gas, blamed Ukraine for taking too much of the fuel from pipelines carrying Moscow's exports to Europe. Kiev insisted it was entitled to the extra volume amid the winter freeze, though officials pledged drastic measures to rein in record gas consumption.

Alexei Miller, chief executive of Russian gas monopoly OAO Gazprom, said Ukraine's consumption has been rising in the past few days, swamping Gazprom's efforts to increase supplies to its frost-stricken European customers. "We boosted supply again today," he said.

Few analysts expect a repeat of Russia's New Year's gas cutoff to Ukraine, which led to sharp drops in supplies to European customers and triggered harsh criticism of Moscow for using energy as a political weapon. But as details of the Jan. 4 deal have emerged, doubts have grown about whether it sets the stable foundation for supplies and exports to Europe that its backers claim.

"It's not at all a compromise. It's more of a time bomb that could lead to future conflicts," said Vladimir Milov, president of the Institute for Energy Policy in Moscow and a former deputy energy minister.

Facing steady shortfalls in supplies, Italian officials called on the public to lower thermostats and take other steps to reduce energy use. Italy's industry minister will meet today in Moscow with Russian officials to seek assurances that supply contracts would be observed. Romania, facing temperatures as low as 22 degrees below zero Fahrenheit, appealed to Russia to boost supplies as shortages developed and led to school and other closings.

"For most of the last 15 years, there really haven't been any concerns about security of supply," said Ben Hollins, a gas specialist at consultants Wood Mackenzie. "The reality is that Europe is dependent on Russia and will remain so."

The gas troubles have fueled debate about alternatives. "We want Europe to take common responsibility for energy security -- all for one and one for all. This is a brand new initiative: joint reaction to any individual country's problems, joint investments in energy security," Polish Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz announced in Warsaw.

Russia has sought to reassure its customers of its reliability, and Ukrainian officials have vowed to ensure that shipments to Europe are delivered. Still, the two sides yesterday failed to reach agreement on the details of implementing the Jan. 4 compromise, intended to halt what is known as the "gas war" in the region.

Officials said the agreements, which would finalize the terms for shipments to Ukraine as well as transit of Russian gas to Europe, will be signed in the next few days. Opposition politicians in Ukraine have attacked the deal, which calls for gas prices to jump to $95 a thousand cubic meters from about $50 last year. That price is for gas from Turkmenistan and other Central Asian producers.

"The gas conflict isn't over," said Vladimir Saprykin of the Ukrainian Center for Political and Economic Studies in Kiev.

A key element of the pact, the $95 price for Ukraine, is fixed only through the first half of this year, and analysts warn that the rate could rise sharply after that, dealing a brutal blow to Ukraine's fuel-guzzling economy.

Rosukrenergo AG, the Swiss-registered trading company at the heart of the Russian-Ukrainian deal, has drawn increased scrutiny. Half-owned by a unit of Gazprom, the identities of the owners of the rest, held by a unit of Austria's Raiffeisen Bank, remain secret.

"My clients say their names can't be released at this time for political reasons," said Wolfgang Putschek, the Raiffeisen official representing the unidentified shareholders. He said they have been instrumental in mediating compromises between Moscow, Kiev and the Central Asian suppliers.

In an interview, he said Rosukrenergo could earn as much as $1.3 billion in profit this year thanks to the agreement, which substantially increases the volumes it handles and opens the way for more sales of gas to high-paying customers in Europe. The group earned about $500 million last year supplying Turkmen gas to Ukraine through Russia. Details of its financials remain secret.

Yesterday, Ukrainian Prime Minister Yuri Yekhanurov rejected calls for his government to buy the 50% stake in Rosukrenergo not owned by Gazprom. Gazprom officials have defended Rosukrenergo's role in the Ukrainian trade as critical to reaching the compromise deal with Kiev. Antitrust regulators in Kiev are investigating its ownership structure.

DOJ_NMG_0012068

Write to Gregory L. White at greg.white@wsj.com1 and David Crawford at david.crawford@wsj.com2

Putin Links Espionage To NGO Funding (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 -- In his first comments on the discovery of alleged British spies in Moscow, Russian President Vladimir Putin on Wednesday linked the scandal to foreign financing of nongovernmental organizations in Russia, a connection that grass-roots activists say is tangential and being used to smear their work.

"The situation is regrettable, as we have seen, when attempts are made to use secret services to work with nongovernmental organizations and when financing is carried out through secret services' channels," Putin told journalists in St. Petersburg. "No one can then say the money does not smell. Beneficial aims cannot be attained with unsuitable means."

The FSB, Russia's domestic security service, announced Monday that it had found British electronic equipment hidden in a fake rock in a Moscow park and that a Russian, allegedly recruited by the British, was using it to upload information and receive instructions. Four people said to be British diplomats were videotaped downloading data from the device.

One of the accused spies, Marc Doe, a second secretary in the British Embassy, has been involved in the British government's dispersal of grants to Russian human rights organizations. The British government has refused to comment on the espionage charges, but has denied it was doing anything illegal with nongovernmental organizations.

The Russian authorities have so far presented no evidence that the alleged spy ring recruited human rights activists. An unidentified Russian citizen has been arrested, but what kind of information the British may have been attempting to obtain or who the Russian is remain unknown.

Still, Doe's work with nongovernmental organizations has been seized on by many Russian politicians. The lower house of parliament, by a vote of 401 to 6, passed a resolution Wednesday condemning the involvement of foreign intelligence services with the private groups. "Such actions undermine trust in NGOs as a universally recognized institution of civil society," the resolution said.

The Moscow Bureau for Human Rights, a private group, said in a statement Wednesday that "the idea is being imposed on society that public organizations are involved with espionage activity. This injures their reputation and defames the name of NGOs in public opinion."

Privately, a number of activists expressed dismay that Doe, if he was indeed a spy, would have used his work with the groups as public cover, particularly given the current climate in which grass-roots organizations believe they are under attack from the state.

Putin this month signed into law a controversial bill regulating nongovernmental groups. Some of its authors argued that it was necessary to prevent foreign money from corrupting Russia's political process. On Wednesday, Putin again defended the law.

"It is aimed at preventing the intrusion of foreign states into Russia's interior political life and to create favorable and transparent conditions for the financing of nongovernmental organizations," he said.

Putin went on to say that he was still supportive of the work of the groups. "Society needs activity of this kind so that close control over the state's activity is put in place," he said.

Putin said it was up to the Russian Foreign Ministry, in conjunction with the FSB, to decide whether to expel the four diplomats. It is unclear if they're still in Moscow.

"My opinion is that if these intelligence agents are expelled, they will send new ones," Putin said. "These people may prove to be smart. In this case, we will have to go to a lot of trouble spotting them. Think about it."

Putin Says Foreigners Use Private Groups To Meddle In Russia (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012069

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 — President Vladimir V. Putin accused foreign intelligence operatives on Wednesday of using private groups to interfere in Russia's internal affairs, saying that accusations that four British diplomats were spies justified new government curbs on the groups.

Mr. Putin has previously criticized foreign support for groups involved in politics here, but on Wednesday he linked the groups to intelligence agencies more explicitly than before.

His remarks intensified a furor that erupted after the disclosure of what officials said was a British espionage operation that used a device concealed in a fake rock to exchange information with a Russian agent.

"We see that there are attempts to work with nongovernmental organizations with the help of special services and that there is financing of nongovernmental organizations through the channels of foreign secret services," Mr. Putin said in televised remarks from St. Petersburg, where he was meeting with leaders of other former Soviet republics.

"I think that nobody has the right, in the given situation, to claim that money has no smell," he added.

One of the accused British diplomats, identified as Marc Doe, oversaw British grants to private organizations, including some prominent groups that promote democracy and human rights. While intelligence officials acknowledged there was no direct connection between those grants and the espionage that has been alleged, the distinction has largely evaporated in the fury of Russian reaction to the spy scandal.

Parliament's lower house adopted a statement Wednesday denouncing support for private groups by foreign spies. "Such actions undermine trust in noncommercial nongovernmental organizations," it read.

British officials have declined to discuss Russia's accusations, though the Foreign Office denied that any of its grants to Russian groups were improper. The groups Russia has linked to the affair — without specifying illegalities — include the Moscow Helsinki Group and the Center for Democracy and Human Rights. The scandal could worsen relations with Britain and other countries as Russia presses its assault on European and American financial support of groups that criticize the Kremlin.

This month Mr. Putin signed into law new controls over private groups, requiring them to reregister and prohibiting foreign financing of activities deemed political. Foreign leaders and Russian representatives of the groups called the curbs a bid to stifle political discourse.

Ulrich Fischer, the president of the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights called the accusations against its Moscow branch and other groups slanderous and "part of an official Russian policy to silence criticism and strengthen ever further a centralized state power."

Mr. Putin, in his remarks, said Russia was still considering whether to expel the four diplomats, all mid-ranking secretaries in the British Embassy, indicating for the first time that they had not yet been expelled or withdrawn, though the espionage that was alleged was reported to have been uncovered last fall.

Kyrgyzstan to Investigate Groups

By The New York Times

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan, Jan. 25 — Following the lead of Russia, Uzbekistan and Belarus, Kyrgyzstan on Wednesday ordered investigations into private groups that get foreign money, including from the United States, which has continued to support pro-democracy groups since the popular uprising here last year.

US Congressman Takes Google To Task On China (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, January 26, 2006

Google will be called to task in Washington next month following a controversial decision by the internet search engine to launch a China-based version of its website that will censor results to avoid angering the country's Communist government.

The decision by Chris Smith, a Republican congressman from New Jersey who chairs a House subcommittee on Human Rights, to call for a February 16 hearing to examine the operating procedures of US internet companies in China, represents the first signs of what could become a serious backlash against Google and other internet companies in Washington that are perceived as capitulating to the Chinese government.

DOJ_NMG_0012070

Mr Smith on Wednesday accused Google of "collaborating .. with persecutors" who imprison and torture Chinese citizens "in the service of truth".

"It is astounding that Google, whose corporate philosophy is 'don't be evil' would enable evil by cooperating with China's censorship policies just to make a buck," he said.

The hearing will also include testimony from Yahoo, Microsoft, Cisco and senior State Department officials who advise on China.

Mr Smith on Wednesday in a statement drew comparisons between Google and Radio Free Europe and Asia, reflecting on the capacity the radio stations had on empowering the "voices of freedom throughout Communist countries".

News about the congressional hearing came just hours after another lawmaker, Democratic senator Patrick Leahy, spoke out on another issue that has enveloped Google in recent days: the company's refusal to comply with a subpeona by the Justice Department that would require it to hand over toe the government extensive records about the way people use the company's search engine.

In a letter to attorney general Alberto Gonzales, Mr Leahy demanded more information about four subpoenas to major internet companies, including how the DOJ intended to use the information while protecting privacy rights, and whether the DOJ planned to request further information from the companies.

Mr Leahy, the leading Democrat on the judiciary committee, said the collection of data on law-abiding Americans posed "unique concers".

U.S. Envoy Engages In Panda Diplomacy (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

CHENGDU, China, Jan. 25 -- Diplomacy is in large part symbolism, and the symbol was unmistakable. There was Robert B. Zoellick, the deputy secretary of state assigned to manage U.S. relations with China, hugging a baby panda.

Zoellick, who was formerly a member of the advisory council of the World Wildlife Fund, had a natural interest in visiting the Giant Panda Breeding Research Base here in Chengdu, capital of Sichuan province in central China. The appealing creatures, he pointed out during a two-hour tour Wednesday, have long been a symbol of joint U.S.-Chinese efforts to preserve the environment and protect wild animals.

But ever since President Richard M. Nixon opened contacts with the Communist government in 1972, pandas also have been a symbol of political cooperation between Beijing and Washington. The Chinese program of sending pandas as gifts, but more frequently on lease and loan, to zoos in Washington, Atlanta, San Diego and Memphis, has played a large role in de-icing diplomatic, commercial and public relations over the past 30 years.

In that context, Zoellick's pose with Jing Jing, a female cub born at the Chengdu facility in August, was seen at least in part as a signal to China about where he wants to steer U.S.-Chinese relations. The official New China News Agency received his message 10-4. It immediately transmitted a happy photo of Zoellick and Jing Jing around the country, illustrating the government's view that good U.S.-China relations are essential and, in fact, getting better and better.

Zoellick's gesture, in another reading, could also be seen as a signal of where he stands in the Washington debate about China. Interpreted that way, becoming a public panda-hugger was an eloquent endorsement of the view that engagement with Beijing is the best path for the United States and that China's emergence as an Asian power does not have to mean conflict in the Pacific.

"You want to know how the panda felt?" he asked. "Very soft."

Zoellick, in a meeting with reporters, joked that he had discussed the various readings of his panda poses with his staff before agreeing to take Jing Jing on his lap. Some aides had questioned whether the image was the right one to convey, he acknowledged, but he decided to go ahead because his wife wanted a photo of him with a panda. "At my age, I listen to my wife," he said.

Zoellick, who left Chengdu for a panel discussion on China at the annual economic forum in Davos, Switzerland, was named point man for U.S.-China policy by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at the start of the second Bush administration. In particular, he has become the main U.S. interlocutor in a strategic dialogue set up last year in response to Chinese requests for sustained discussions on long-term issues between Washington and Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0012071

This visit to China, which came in addition to that twice-yearly schedule, was partly to maintain contacts with Chinese leaders and show interest in keeping up a close relationship, Zoellick said. He met Tuesday with Premier Wen Jiabao, Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and his own counterpart in the Chinese Foreign Ministry, Dai Bingguo.

But the two-day stay here, after stops in Japan and at U.S. Pacific Command headquarters in Hawaii, also included specific talks on issues that could be seen as a test of the U.S.-Chinese engagement his panda photo was meant to symbolize. These, he said, included China's stand on the effort to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, China's role in diplomacy to persuade North Korea to eliminate its nuclear weapons program and China's currency policies at a time of soaring U.S. trade deficits.

Chinese officials made clear they shared the U.S. and European goal of demonstrating to Iran's rulers that they should not proceed with a program that could lead to nuclear weapons production, Zoellick said.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman, Kong Quan, said Tuesday, however, that China believed more time should be allowed for diplomacy before resorting to sanctions or other pressures from the U.N. Security Council.

Reporting on his talks, Zoellick said he emphasized to Chinese officials that their own oft-repeated goal of energy security argued for joining in the effort. A government such as Iran's armed with nuclear missiles would be a destabilizing force in the Middle East, China's main source of imported oil, even though China has signed a long-term oil and gas deal with Tehran, he said.

The argument, Zoellick explained, flowed from the idea of making China more of a "responsible stakeholder," a major state with worldwide interests to preserve through cooperation with other governments. The approach was laid out in a speech in September outlining the administration's underlying policy toward China.

Zoellick also received a report from Chinese officials on last week's tour by the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il. In addition to meetings with President Hu Jintao, Wen and other senior Chinese Communist Party officials, Kim visited ports and factories in the booming Pearl River Delta, just north of Hong Kong and a showcase for China's economic reforms.

The question was whether what Kim saw would inspire him to enact similar changes in his own country, which some officials believe would open North Korea to the world and help with a long-term solution to the nuclear standoff. Zoellick suggested the response from Chinese officials who hosted Kim was: "We'll see."

Too Fast In China? (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

SHANGHAI, Jan. 25 Led by surging exports, China's economy grew by 9.9 percent last year, the government announced Wednesday, underscoring the swiftness by which this once insular communist country has remade itself into a global trading power.

The rapid expansion appears to move China's economy ahead of those of Great Britain, France and Italy to become the world's fourth-largest, although many countries have yet to report their final 2005 economic data. Over the past decade, China's output has more than doubled in size as the country's transition toward capitalism has progressed, turning farmers into factory workers and linking the fortunes of its people to the appetites of shoppers in the United States, Europe and Japan.

Yet the news also increased concern that China could be growing too fast, despite measures aimed at cooling the hottest parts of the economy. Aggressive investment has produced too many factories, heightening trade tensions with the United States as China exports surplus wares such as steel, depressing prices globally. Chinese officials worry that unneeded plants could deliver a crippling era of deflation -- falling prices -- which hurts profits and reduces incentives for companies to invest. Such a syndrome kept Japan mired in recession and unemployment for much of the past 16 years.

"Overcapacity is dangerous," said China's leading statistician, Li DeShui, speaking at a media briefing in Beijing, according to a transcript on the Web site of the official New China News Agency. "It will cause huge waste, and will especially generate huge bad loans for banks. For some businesses, it will cause losses and even closures, which will lead to rising unemployment."

DOJ_NMG_0012072

Li emphasized that China is not yet facing this problem, with inflation still at a healthy 1 percent. He pronounced himself "cautiously optimistic" about China's economic prospects this year.

State data paint a troubling picture. Steel capacity already outstrips domestic demand by 120 million tons a year, and new mills that would add an additional 70 million tons are under construction, according to the National Development and Reform Commission, a unit of China's governing State Council. Chinese automakers saw profit margins plummet last year as ultra-low-priced vehicles came on the market, and as dramatic expansion brought production capacity to 2 million more than China's annual sales.

Still, some say fears of overcapacity are overblown: Even as the supply of everything from aluminum to motorcycles swells, the underlying demand for the trappings of modern life within this land of 1.3 billion people should not be underestimated. China's appetite for new housing, roads and vehicles will eventually put the extra plants to work, some economists say.

"There's no question that there's demand," said Jonathan Anderson, chief economist for Asia at UBS Investment Research in Hong Kong. "Local governments want to build science parks and subways, and people want to build houses. And now [Chinese authorities] are actually letting stuff get built again."

Anderson argues that the growth of manufacturing capacity is slowing -- a sign that it will eventually disappear.

He cites the Chinese steel industry, which saw capacity grow by nearly 40 percent in 2004 and 2005. This year, he said, capacity will continue to grow, but by only 10 percent. At the same time, growth in demand for steel will bounce back to about 18 percent this year, after decelerating to about 7 percent last year as the government clamped down on development.

"You've got spending going on," Anderson said. "Overcapacity is actually going to be going away."

China's economic data is notoriously unreliable, and many say the data fail to capture the true magnitude of the economy. Last year, the government restated several years' worth of economic data when a nationwide census discovered that millions of mostly private service companies had previously been left out of the calculation. In one shot, the government declared that China's economy was 17 percent bigger than it had previously realized -- the statistical equivalent of finding an Austria lying around uncounted.

On Wednesday, speaking at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, Zhu Min, an executive at one of China's largest state banks, said the economy remains underestimated.

"There's another 15 percent to 20 percent space for China to grow," Zhu said, according to Bloomberg.

Whatever the real rate of growth, the ceaseless clatter of machinery that has become the national soundtrack and the construction cranes hovering over every urban skyline attest to the dramatic expansion, one that has refashioned China and its relationship with the rest of the world.

Last year's growth was propelled largely by exports, which leapt 28 percent, leaving China with a $102 billion global trade surplus. Manufacturing trade groups in the United States, Europe and developing countries argue that much of this success is a result of China's maintaining its currency, the yuan, at an artificially low value, making its goods unfairly cheap on world markets. Congress is considering a bill that would slap across-the-board punitive tariffs on Chinese goods if Beijing does not significantly raise the value of the yuan. China counters that it is being made the scapegoat for the loss of factory jobs elsewhere.

China's growth has prompted Beijing to dispatch state oil firms around the globe in search of new energy supplies. This has stoked a historic rivalry with Japan for access to Russia's Siberian oil fields. It has sent Chinese investment into Africa, Latin America and Indonesia, and has provoked accusations in Washington that China's thirst for energy threatens U.S. interests. Chinese demand is a key factor behind the recent spike in world oil prices.

Within China, years of rapid growth have sown concern that new wealth is not being shared equally, with much being stolen from the poor via corrupt land acquisitions by Communist Party officials. Recent years have seen sometimes-violent protests around the country as farmers complain they are being pushed off land without just compensation. Last week, Premier Wen Jiabao pledged that more investment had to be directed into poor, rural areas to address the growing income gap.

Growth last year brought China's overall economic output to $2.26 trillion, according to state data. But its rapid growth still leaves China's economy at less than one-fifth the size of the world's largest -- that of the United States, whose output reached $11.7 trillion in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0012073

New Estimate In China Finds Fewer AIDS Cases (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 25 — China countered the long-held suspicion that it has undercounted the number of people with H.I.V. and AIDS by releasing a new, more extensive estimate on Wednesday that found the opposite: that the country had actually overestimated its number of cases.

The new estimate, conducted with the World Health Organization and the United Nations AIDS program, lowered the country's estimated number of H.I.V. and AIDS cases to 650,000 from the official figure of 840,000 released by the government in 2003. Many experts and AIDS workers have long believed that China has at least 1.5 million cases, possibly far more, and some expressed skepticism that the new figure was any more reliable than past estimates.

At a news conference on Wednesday morning, Chinese and international health officials endorsed the new findings but also warned that while the overall number of cases is less than previously believed, the rate of infection is still rising, with 70,000 new cases in 2005. Drug users and prostitutes are transmitting H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS, in most of the new cases, but the report also found that the disease is now spreading from such high-risk groups into the general population, raising the risk of broader infection.

"Almost 200 people are infected every day in China," said Wang Longde, a vice minister of health. "The situation is grave."

With AIDS and H.I.V. having already devastated large swaths of Africa, experts have feared that China and India, the world's two most populous countries, may become the next epicenters of major outbreaks.

The lower estimate in China, if accurate, would place it in a far more enviable position than India, which is estimated to have more than five million people living with H.I.V. The Indian government has been criticized for failing to respond swiftly and effectively to the disease.

China is still trying to regain its credibility on AIDS. Not too many years ago, top leaders denied that the country had an AIDS problem and tried to cover up an outbreak in central China caused by a tainted, government-sponsored blood selling program. Since late 2003, China has mounted an aggressive nationwide campaign against AIDS and introduced pilot programs that provide free condoms, free methadone and even free antiretroviral drugs.

The joint effort by China, the World Health Organization and the United Nations AIDS program, Unaids, in drafting the new study reflected the improved openness of Chinese health officials on AIDS. But that collaboration also underscores the fact that the outside world would most likely be skeptical of any study conducted solely by China. Some Chinese health officials had privately fretted that the study would be regarded as a whitewash.

Henk Bekedam, head of the W.H.O.'s office in Beijing, warned that China still faced a major AIDS problem and needed to raise public awareness about H.I.V. while expanding prevention and treatment programs. But he endorsed the new estimate "as a more accurate portrait of the epidemic" and described China's H.I.V. status as "low prevalence."

Ray Yip, the Beijing representative of the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, did not attend the news conference on Wednesday but said his office had provided technical assistance for the new study. He said the new figure represented a far broader sampling from across China. "It's a more robust and more complete number," Mr. Yip said in a telephone interview. "But by all means, it is an estimate."

Some AIDS experts in China expressed doubts about the lowered estimate. Chung To, chairman of the Chi Heng Foundation, which helps AIDS orphans in central China, questioned the reliability of the raw data used in the estimate. He noted that local officials often hid the true prevalence of the disease, while many H.I.V.-positive people lied about their condition to avoid social stigma.

"To me it is hard to believe they are revising downward," he said. "It is certainly not what I see as a front-line, grass-roots AIDS worker."

Another advocate, Odilon Couzin, also was skeptical about how accurately officials were able to count infected people among groups like prostitutes, drug users and gay men, all of whom are loath to reveal their H.I.V. status in China.

DOJ_NMG_0012074

"Frankly, in all of my experience, the quality of the data and the accuracy of the information here is not high enough to have confidence in this new estimate," said Mr. Couzin, who runs China AIDS Info, an AIDS information and advocacy group based in Hong Kong.

Officials involved in the study say improved methodology and a bigger sampling of data have made it more accurate than the earlier one. The 2003 study estimated 840,000 cases, based on samples drawn from 194 "surveillance" sites around the country. By comparison, the new study used 329 national sites and several hundred other sites operated by provincial governments.

A key difference between the two studies is the revised estimate of the number of people infected by the tainted blood selling operation in the 1990's. Some doctors in Henan Province, a center of the blood selling operation, estimated that more than a million people had been infected in that province alone. The 2003 study estimated that the blood program had infected 199,000 people. By comparison, the new study estimates that only 55,000 former blood donors are infected with H.I.V.

To some degree the lower number of infected blood donors may be partly because many of them have died. The study found that nationally, 25,000 people died of AIDS last year. Of that figure, 10,000 were former blood and plasma donors, the estimate found. Over all, Chinese health officials estimate that fewer than 100,000 people have died of AIDS in the country.

The study found infection rates varied greatly in different regions of the country and could be broken down into six major groups: drug users, prostitutes and their clients, former blood and plasma donors, gay men, partners of H.I.V.-positive people, and infants infected in the womb by H.I.V.-positive mothers.

Drug users living with H.I.V. or AIDS accounted for 288,000 people, or 44.3 percent of the estimated total. Nearly all of them live in seven southern provinces. Prostitutes and their clients accounted for 127,000 cases, or 19.5 percent.

A large majority of those infected in China still do not know it. The estimate found that only 141,000 of the estimated 650,000 cases have been detected through testing.

China still faces enormous challenges on AIDS. Efforts to distribute anti-retroviral drugs have created a host of problems, while local officials in some regions still try to deny the presence of H.I.V. Some public security bureaus continue to arrest infected drug users rather than steer them to treatment.

Joel Rehnstrom, the coordinator in China for Unaids, said the new figures provide "a better picture" of the problem in China but should not be interpreted as meaning the situation is improving.

"This is good news, but there is still a long way to go," he said.

European Economic Plan Seeks Nordic-style Approach (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission presented a new plan to reinvigorate Europe's economies, calling for a Nordic-style, seemingly social-democratic approach rather than an Anglo-Saxon free-market model.

European leaders are scheduled to discuss the plan at their spring summit.

In the 247-page report, Commission President José Manuel Barroso gave the most praise to northern European countries that are increasing spending on research and development universities and pursuing interventionist jobs policies. He also called for the creation of a competitive, continent-wide energy program, and support for small and medium-size businesses.

He also singled out previously Communist Eastern European countries that joined the bloc in 2004 "for doing some amazing things" in turning around their formerly state-run economies.

The announcement represents Mr. Barroso's attempt to recover the initiative after a tough first year in office. Many of his previous plans for jump-starting Europe's economies have faltered. Both European governments and the European Parliament, for example, rejected his plan to free up the services market, allowing plumbers, hairdressers and other small-business people to work more easily outside their homelands.

The report includes evaluations of the 25 national reform programs drawn up by EU members. While commission officials insist the process doesn't amount to naming and shaming, it does go out of its way to praise many Nordic initiatives. The Nordics are saluted for setting up "an integrating market for buying and selling electricity," for putting their public finances in order and improving the financial health of their pension systems.

DOJ_NMG_0012075

Some countries come in for gentle criticism. Italy, for example, is chided for not setting "targets, timetables and details" in its program. Rome is urged to control its public finances, take action to increase the competitiveness of traditional industries that face stiff Asian competition, and raise its employment level.

Warring Factions In Sri Lanka Agree To Resume Peace Talks (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Jan. 25 — In a measure of how intractable this country's ethnic conflict is, the warring parties agreed Wednesday to begin talking to each other again, after more than 18 months of deadlock over a site for peace talks and with scores of killings in the meantime.

The talks would focus on strengthening an all-but-ineffectual four-year-old cease-fire agreement. They are scheduled to take place in Geneva, starting as early as February.

The agreement, though modest in scope, represents a major breakthrough in the decade-long war between the ethnic-Sinhalese-dominated government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the separatist guerrilla outfit that effectively runs a swath of the country's north and east. It is better known as the L.T.T.E.

The cease-fire, brokered by Norway in February 2002, remains in place, but has frayed so much recently that the country appears to be at war in all but name.

There were 100 killings in December alone. Sailors and soldiers have repeatedly been the targets of bombs and land mines. A pro-rebel politician was gunned down during Christmas Eve Mass. Even the compound of the Nordic peace monitors, in the eastern town of Batticaloa, was bombed, on Jan. 13.

"Both sides have agreed on the need to meet and decide how the cease-fire can be implemented better," Erik Solheim, the chief Norwegian mediator, said after talks with the leader of the Tamil Tigers, Velupillai Prabhakaran, in the rebel capital, Kilinochchi. Talks would focus on "strengthening the 2002 cease-fire," he said.

Mr. Solheim said it was imperative to halt the tide of violence for the talks to be productive. "There is a need to create a climate that is conducive to peace," he added. "The violence has to stop."

The choice of Geneva marks a significant concession for the government, which had long insisted that negotiations take place only inside Sri Lanka, or at best, in another Asian country.

The European Union has barred Tamil Tiger delegations from traveling to its territory. But the restriction does not apply to Switzerland, which is not part of the European Union.

The government of President Mahinda Rajapakse, a Sinhalese hard-liner, has also made a concession on the subject of the talks. Mr. Rajapakse had insisted that the cease-fire agreement be renegotiated. The Tamil Tigers had insisted that the terms of the agreement could not be tampered with.

Even so, the talks are not going to be easy. The Tamil Tigers are particularly exercised about a breakaway faction operating in government-held territory, led by a prominent former Tiger leader called Karuna. The rebels will press the government to enforce an existing clause in the agreement: to disarm paramilitary forces operating in its area.

The government, meanwhile, will point to numerous cease-fire violations for which it blames the Tigers.

"On our part we have given our assurance there will be no act of violence by the L.T.T.E. against government forces," said Anton Balasingham, the chief negotiator for the Tigers, according to Tamilnet, a Web-based news service.

Then there is the bigger gulf that fuels the war in the first place. Mr. Rajapakse insists that he wants a unified state, while the rebels demand greater autonomy for the Tamil-majority areas.

In Africa, Islam And Christianity Are Growing - And Blending (CSM)

By Abraham McLaughlin

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012076

LAGOS, NIGERIA - At first, it seems a surprising sight: inside a two-story mosque in sub-Saharan Africa's largest metropolis hangs a life-size portrait of Jesus Christ.

Yet worshipers at "The True Message of God Mission" say it's entirely natural for Christianity and Islam to cexist, even overlap. They begin their worship by praying at the Jesus alcove and then "running their deliverance" - sprinting laps around the mosque's mosaic-tiled courtyard, praying to the one God for forgiveness and help. They say it's akin to Israelites circling the walls of Jericho - and Muslims swirling around the Ka'ba shrine in Mecca.

This group - originally called "Chris-lam-herb" for its mix-and-match approach to Christianity, Islam, and traditional medicine - is a window on an ongoing religious ferment in Africa. It's still up for debate whether this group, and others like it, could become models for Muslim-Christian unity worldwide or whether they're uniquely African. But either way, they are "part of a trend," says Dana Robert, a Boston University religion professor.

Amid intense sectarian violence in this half- Muslim, half-Christian country, these groups serve as tolerant peacemakers. Also, with widespread poverty and health concerns here, people are seeking practical, profitable religion more than rigid doctrine.

Before Islam and Christianity arrived in Africa, people here "believed in deities being close" - in gods who resided in trees or rivers and helped or hurt locals daily, explains Kamaldeen Balogun, an Islamic studies professor at Olabisi Onabanjo University in southeastern Nigeria.

"You in the West are satisfied with one hour of church on Sunday," says Mr. Balogun. But for people in Africa, who he says need so many solutions, "This is about a practical way of life," about a willingness to combine Christianity or Islam with their own traditions to "see if they can make something new" - something that will help.

Worshipers at the "True Message" mission say unifying the two theologies has made a major difference in their lives.

A slight woman with a quick smile, Kuburat Hamzat says she came here in 1998 with a severe menstruation problem. She was embraced by the mission's "man of God," a soft-spoken, bald man named Samusideen Saka. He told her, "Dancing will not kill you" and prescribed 91 laps of "running deliverance" each day. He also explained the commonalities of the great faiths to Ms. Hamzat who had grown up in Islam. That understanding, she says, changed her. "Because I understood that in my mind, I got healed," she says. Her problem hasn't recurred, she says. Others say they've been cured of barrenness, mental illness, and other troubles.

Pastor Saka explains that his father was an herbalist and that both Muslims and Christians would come to him for healing. Although he grew up Muslim, and has been to Mecca on pilgrimage several times, he couldn't comprehend Nigeria's sectarian strife. He now considers himself a Christian, "but that doesn't mean Islam is bad."

Quite the opposite. Next to his mosque is a televangelist's dream - an auditorium with 1,500 seats, banks of speakers, a live band, and klieg lights. On Sundays the choir switches easily between Muslim and Christian songs, and Pastor Saka preaches from both the Bible and the Koran. His sermons are often broadcast on local TV.

The broader context here is Africa's dramatic shift in recent decades to Christianity and Islam. During the 20th century, fully 40 percent of Africa's population moved from traditional religions to "different shades of Christianity," says Philip Jenkins, a history and religion professor at the University of Pennsylvania. It is, he adds, "the largest religious change that has ever occurred in history." There are debates about whether Christianity or Islam is spreading faster in Africa, but clearly they're both on the rise - and sometimes are the source of tension.

In Nigeria's religious city of Jos (short for "Jesus Our Savior") the government says 50,000 people died between 1999 and 2004 in sectarian clashes. Until a peace deal last year, Sudan's northern Muslims and southern Christians were at war for two decades.

Clearly, the religious revolution is still shaking out. "People are converting rapidly, but they don't necessarily have instruction" in the details of their faiths, says Boston University's Professor Robert. Nor have they had "time for their belief system to solidify." It is, she says, "still shifting." She argues that eventually the faithful will choose one religion or another, and the hybrids will fade away.

DOJ_NMG_0012077

But the ferment is quite evident on the chaotic streets of Lagos, which is home to some 10 million people. Hundreds of church-sponsored banners scream out, "It's your day of RECOVERY @ LAST where life's pains are healed" or "Jesus Christ: A friend indeed! Even in times of need!!"

Healing is a regularly promised feature of churches across Africa. It's symbolic of a key element of the continent's religious explorations - fusing faith and rationality, Professor Balogun says. According to Western thought, with its emphasis on rationality, "Everything that goes up must come down," he says. But a more African approach is that, "By divine intervention it may not come down." In fact, his university is initiating a degree focusing on the religion-science nexus.

Meanwhile, it's not just Saka who's exploring the common ground between Christianity and Islam. Sitting in a wrought-iron throne, swathed in silky white fabric, the founder of "Chrislam" has these words for followers of the two great faiths: "The same sun that dries the clothes of Muslims also dries the clothes of Christians." Stroking his beard, the man named Tela Tella says, "I don't believe God loves Christians any more than Muslims."

His followers calls him His Royal Holiness, The Messenger, Ifeoluwa or "The Will of God." Since the religion's founding two decades ago, this small band has been gathering almost daily to hear his message of inclusiveness - that Christians and Muslims, "who are sons of Abraham, can be one."

Delta Villages Fear Troops In Nigeria (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WARRI, Nigeria, Jan. 25 (Reuters) — Villagers fled Nigeria's lawless delta on Wednesday amid fears of military reprisals after a wave of attacks on foreign oil companies by ethnic Ijaw militiamen.

The army deployed more troops to major installations, and oil companies tightened security around offices a day after heavily armed men stormed the headquarters of the Italian oil firm Agip, robbing a bank on the premises and killing eight policemen and a civilian.

"There are soldiers everywhere, and I don't want my three girls in the firing line," said Return Powei, who lives in the remote village of Ogbotobo. "Our youths run into the forest when they hear the soldiers are coming. Everyone is moving out of Ogbotobo."

It was not clear if the attack on Agip, a unit of ENI of Italy, was the work of the Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta, whose five-week campaign of sabotage and kidnapping has contributed to an increase in oil prices.

The group said it would make Royal Dutch Shell suffer unless it paid $1.5 billion to delta villages in compensation for decades of oil pollution, which is one of its demands for releasing four foreign hostages.

The government has set up a committee to negotiate the release of four oil workers kidnapped Jan. 11.

U.N. Chief's Son Agrees To Pay Duties On SUV (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The son of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has announced that he intends to pay Ghana's government $14,301 in import duties on a Mercedes SUV that he had avoided paying by misusing his father's name.

Kojo Annan had obtained diplomatic discounts and tax exemptions on the luxury vehicle when he bought it in his father's name seven years ago. He does not intend to reimburse a German Mercedes dealership that gave him a $6,541 diplomatic discount, his lawyer said this week.

"The automobile was not for the secretary-general's own personal use and therefore the [import duties] exemption was not justified," William Taylor III, Kojo Annan's lawyer, said in a letter to Ghanaian officials last Thursday. "I write to inform you that Mr. Kojo Annan wishes to make full payment of the amount due to the government of Ghana."

A probe of the United Nations oil-for-food program revealed in September the false statements involving the car. Investigators initially suspected that the Mercedes was a payoff to Kofi Annan for awarding a U.N. contract to his son's employer, Cotecna Inspection. The investigators found a memo on the computer of an assistant to Annan that relayed Kojo Annan's request to approve the use of his name to obtain a diplomatic discount.

DOJ_NMG_0012078

The secretary-general said that he gave his son $15,000 toward the purchase but that he did not realize that his name had been used to receive diplomatic discounts and tax exemptions.

On Wednesday, he welcomed news of his son's move. "It was the right thing to do," Annan told Reuters at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. "He knew I wanted him to sort it out, clean it up. It was between him, his lawyer and the government."

Asked whether he, as secretary-general, secured the tax break for his son, Annan said, "Absolutely not. It was done behind my back."

The investigative panel, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Paul A. Volcker, found no evidence of wrongdoing by the secretary-general. But journalists' persistent requests to the secretary-general's office for more information about the car roiled the elder Annan, who considered the matter closed and refused to address it.

At a news conference last month, Annan called a Times of London reporter "an embarrassment to his profession."

On Tuesday, Taylor announced that Kojo Annan would reimburse Ghana's government. The lawyer also said that the car was no longer in the secretary-general's name and that it had been totaled in a crash.

Ghanaian customs officials told the Times of London on Wednesday that they had received Kojo Annan's offer but that the attorney general had not decided whether to press charges.

Pinochet Daughter Detained At Dulles (WP)

By Monte Reel And Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Jan. 25 -- The oldest daughter of the former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was detained Wednesday at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, where she requested political asylum, a Chilean official said.

Lucia Pinochet, 60, arrived at about 7 a.m. on a United Airlines flight from Buenos Aires, and customs officials stopped her for questioning. She had been served with a subpoena over the weekend in Chile, along with her mother and three siblings. They had been ordered to appear in court on Monday in Santiago, the Chilean capital, on tax fraud charges connected to a probe of her father's illegal bank accounts.

A spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security said she was in U.S. custody at the airport in Virginia "pending resolution of her immigration status."

Chile's Interior Minister, Francisco Vidal, said U.S. Ambassador Craig Kelly informed his government that Pinochet, sought on an international arrest warrant, had requested asylum. U.S. officials said they could not comment on that issue.

Vidal said the Chilean government, as a democracy, rejects the basis for such a claim.

"Political asylum . . . is when there is no system of law, when there is no due process," he said.

Pinochet's father, 90, faces charges for financial crimes and human rights abuses committed during his 17-year rule, from 1973 to 1990. His wife, Lucia Hiriart, and three of their other children obeyed the summons, but Lucia was not present in court, according to Chilean news reports.

Lucia Pinochet's son, Rodrigo Garcia, told Chile's Radio Agricultura that he had traveled by car with his mother Sunday across the Chilean border into Argentina.

Diplomatic sources said she then took a domestic flight from the city of Mendoza to Buenos Aires, where she boarded a U.S.-bound flight. Garcia stayed behind.

"I want to make it clear that the journey we made to Argentina had been planned beforehand and she was never running away from anything," Garcia said in the radio interview.

He also sent a statement by his mother to a Santiago newspaper, in which she rejected the charges against her family.

"I am sorry that the instruments of the state are being used with the purpose of defaming and discrediting the honor of the people," the statement said. "They don't seek to clarify the source of my father's funds, but instead some seek the total defamation of each and every member of my family."

Lucia Pinochet is accused of evading almost $1 million in taxes. A Chilean prosecutor said Wednesday that the minimum punishment for a conviction of the charges would be three years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0012079

A U.S. customs service spokeswoman, Suzanne Trevino, said she did not know why Pinochet had been stopped at the airport. In general, she said, travelers would be referred by airport inspectors for additional interviews "if there were a problem with the documents or something suspicious."

Along with her mother and three siblings, Pinochet was charged with filing false tax declarations and helping her father hide nearly $27 million in more than 125 bank accounts outside Chile, including an account at the now-defunct Riggs National Bank in Washington, where he kept about $8 million.

Court officials in Santiago said the family members had been charged with filing "maliciously incomplete" and false tax declarations.

Chilean Foreign Minister Ignacio Walker told reporters that Pinochet could be sent back to Argentina by U.S. authorities, could voluntarily return to Argentina where Chile would submit an extradition request, or could decide to return to Chile and appear in court.

In Santiago, President Ricardo Lagos told reporters that talks were underway to arrange for her voluntary return.

"All of this has an effect on the country -- it's sad," said Lagos, a moderate socialist and longtime critic of the former dictator.

Augusto Pinochet has been charged with financial fraud, and faces prosecution related to the murder and torture of thousands of people after the 1973 military coup that brought him to power. He has avoided standing trial on the human rights charges by claiming health problems, including dementia.

A U.S. Senate report last year revealed that nine banks had allowed Pinochet to use false account names and offshore companies to hide millions of dollars from tax authorities and international prosecutors seeking to seize assets stolen from Chile. Riggs pleaded guilty last year to a criminal felony charge for failing to report suspicious transactions, and agreed to pay $41 million in civil and criminal fines to the U.S. government.

On Tuesday, a Santiago court approved bail for Pinochet's wife and their other children; Marco Antonio, Jacqueline and Veronica. Pinochet's eldest son, Augusto, was not arrested. He has been charged with falsifying passports but not with tax evasion.

Constable reported from Washington. Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu in Washington and special correspondent Jonathan Franklin in Santiago contributed to this report.

An Act Of Political Hygiene (WSJ)

By Mark Steyn

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

QUEBEC CITY -- Remember the conventional wisdom of 2004? Back then, you'll recall, it was the many members of George Bush's "unilateral" coalition who were supposed to be in trouble, not least the three doughty warriors of the Anglosphere -- the president, Tony Blair and John Howard -- who would all be paying a terrible electoral price for lying their way into war in Iraq. The Democrats' position was that Mr. Bush's rinky-dink nickel-&-dime allies didn't count: The president has "alienated almost everyone," said Jimmy Carter, "and now we have just a handful of little tiny countries supposedly helping us in Iraq." (That would be Britain, Australia, Poland, Japan . . .) Instead of those nobodies, John Kerry pledged that, under his leadership, "America will rejoin the community of nations" -- by which he meant Jacques Chirac, Gerhard Schröder, the Belgian guy . . .

Two years on, Messrs. Bush, Blair, Howard and Koizumi are all re-elected, while Mr. Chirac is the lamest of lame ducks, and his ingrate citizenry have tossed out his big legacy, the European Constitution; Mr. Schröder's government was defeated and he's now shilling for Russia's state-owned Gazprom ("It's all about Gaz!"); and the latest member of the coalition of the unwilling to hit the skids is Canada's Liberal Party, which fell from office on Monday. John Kerry may have wanted to "rejoin the community of nations." Instead, "the community of nations" has joined John Kerry, windsurfing off Nantucket in electric-yellow buttock-hugging Lycra, or whatever he's doing these days. * * *

It would be a stretch to argue that Mr. Chirac, Mr. Schröder and now Paul Martin in Ottawa ran into trouble because of their anti-Americanism. Au contraire, cheap demonization of the Great Satan is almost as popular in the streets of Toronto as in the streets of Islamabad. But these days anti-Americanism is the first refuge of the scoundrel, and it's usually a reliable indicator that you're not up to the challenges of the modern world or of your own country. In the final two weeks of the Canadian election, Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0012080

Martin's Liberals unleashed a barrage of anti-Conservative attack ads whose ferocity was matched only by their stupidity: They warned that Stephen Harper, the Conservatives' leader, would be "George Bush's new best friend"! They dug up damaging quotes from a shocking 1997 speech in which he'd praised America as "a light and inspiration"! Another week and they'd have had pictures from that summer in the late '80s he spent as Dick Cheney's pool boy.

Mr. Harper, the incoming prime minister, will not be "George Bush's new best friend" -- that's a more competitive field than John Kerry and Jimmy Carter think. But at the very least a Harper government won't rely on reflexive anti-Americanism as the defining element of Canadian identity. No cheery right-wingers south of the border should exaggerate what happened on Monday. It was an act of political hygiene: The Liberal Party was mired in a swamp of scandals, the most surreal of which was a racket to shore up the anti-separatist cause in Quebec by handing out millions of free Canadian flags, a project which so overburdened the domestic flag industry the project had to be outsourced to overseas companies, who at a cost of $45 each sent back a gazillion flags that can't fly. That's to say, they had no eyelets, no sleeve, no halyard line for your rope and toggle and whatnot. You have to lean a ladder up against the pole and nail it into position, which on a January morning at Lac St-Jean hardly seems likely to endear nationalist Quebecers to the virtues of the Canadian state. Millions of dollars were transferred to "advertising agencies" and "consultancies" run by the party's pals and in return they came up with a quintessentially Liberal wheeze: Even if you wanted to salute it, you can't run it up the flagpole. As a forlorn emblem of Trudeaupian nationalism, that's hard to beat.

And yet and yet . . . in throwing the bums out, Canadian voters declined to subject them to full-scale humiliation. Even with viable alternatives for all tastes -- conservative, socialist and Quebec separatist -- it seems one can never underestimate the appeal of a party of floundering discredited kleptocrat incompetents led by a vindictive empty suit who fought one of the most inept campaigns in modern political history. They clung on to over 100 seats and the votes of Canada's three biggest cities. Truly, the Liberals are one of the most amazingly resilient parties this side of Kim Jong-Il's.

Stephen Harper has to live with that political reality, but, as he's done with his party, he'll move the country incrementally. On the environment, his views are compatible with Mr. Bush, John Howard and now Tony Blair: That's to say, if "climate change" is a problem, Kyoto's not the answer to it. On missile defense, the Conservatives will string along with Washington because it's the easy option and we'll be covered by it anyway: Even Canadians aren't prepared to argue that, if there's something headed toward Winnipeg or Montreal, we'd rather the Americans minded their own bloody business and didn't tell us about it. But it's a good gauge of the deterioration in U.S.-Canadian relations that a quintessential piece of postmodern, humbug multilateralism -- an issue that required Canada to be minimally supportive without being helpful, at no political cost and in return for some lucrative contracts for northern defense contractors -- was whooped up by the Liberals into a big scare about Washington's plans for the "weaponization of space." On missile defense, Mr. Harper will be more down to earth in every sense.

But will there be Canadian troops in Iraq or wherever's next? No, not in any meaningful sense. The sad fact is, even if we'd wanted to liberate Baghdad, we have an emaciated military worn to the bone. But it goes beyond the lack of equipment and lack of transport that now afflict what was, 60 years ago, the world's fourth largest military. In April 2002, the Pentagon wished to confer the Bronze Star on five snipers from the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry in Afghanistan for their service in . . . killing the enemy. Ottawa put the request on hold, relenting grudgingly only after the matter was made public. It seems the Canadian government's main objection was a reluctance to let it be known that our military still, er, shoots people, and extremely accurately. The backs of our five-dollar bills celebrate the armed forces, but they're all unarmed -- peacekeepers, elderly veterans, etc.

Like much of the European Union, we're so heavily invested in the idea that we've found a kinder gentler way we can scarce bear to contemplate the reality. At the Washington state/British Columbia border this week, two guys on the lam were hightailing it through Blaine heading for the 49th parallel with the cops in hot pursuit. Alerted to what was coming their way, Canada's (unarmed) border guards walked off the job. For a country whose national anthem lyrics are mostly endless reprises of the line "we stand on guard for thee," we could at least stand on guard. A few years back, I was chatting with a border guard at the Derby Line, Vt./Rock Island, Quebec crossing. A beat-up sedan came hurtling northward and we jumped out of the way. She sounded a klaxon. By then the driver was halfway up the Trans-Quebecoise autoroute and, if he ever heard her stern warning, he declined to brake and reverse back to the post to show his papers. "Oh, well," she said to me, "it's probably nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0012081

Canadians have been reluctant in the last four years to accept that we no longer live in an "it's probably nothing" world. Many Continentals feel the same way. Unlike his hollow predecessor, Stephen Harper is a thoughtful man who understands the gulf between self-mythologizing and the harder realities. You can't change a free country unless you persuade free people to change their minds, and he will at least start that tough job. He doesn't have to be George Bush's best friend, and he may even be more effective at opposing him on trade and agriculture disputes. But he could try being Tony Blair's and John Howard's best friend and reconnecting us with other traditional pals from whom Canada's become increasingly estranged. He could honor our small but brave contribution to Afghanistan by flying out and meeting them on the ground. But, even if he does nothing else, he'll bring to an end a decade of self-defeating sneering. The ayatollahs at least flatter America as a seducer -- the Great Satan -- which is a more accurate and sophisticated construct than deriding her as the Great Moron. The difference between sniping at the Taliban and sniping at Washington is that in the latter case we're firing blanks.

Mr. Steyn is a columnist for Canada's Western Standard and Maclean's magazine, as well as for National Review and the Atlantic Monthly.

Freedom's Unsung Hero (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Hong Kong's prosperity since World War II is sometimes referred to as a "miracle." But miracles require the intervention of a deity, whereas Hong Kong's remarkable economic growth between 1945 and its handover to China in 1997 owes a great deal to the nonintervention of a mortal man, John James Cowperthwaite, who died over the weekend at the age of 90.

Cowperthwaite arrived in Hong Kong in 1945 and served as Financial Secretary of the then-British colony from 1961-1971. Perhaps more than any other single figure, he was the architect and guardian of the greatest natural experiment in free-market capitalism in the postwar world. It is all the more remarkable that he kept the colonial government small and out of the business of business at a time when socialism was ascendant in Britain.

In 1997, Milton Friedman noted that since 1945 Hong Kong's GDP per capita had gone from a fraction to substantially more than that of Israel and Britain, and had caught up with that of the U.S., even as the colony's population increased tenfold. That astonishing performance became a policy beacon first to the nearby small nations of Asia (the "tigers") and eventually to Mainland China itself.

One of the better known stories about the undeservedly obscure Cowperthwaite was his refusal to collect economic statistics about Hong Kong during his tenure as Financial Secretary, lest they produce an impulse toward central planning among the bureaucrats. "I did very little," Sir John once said. "All I did was to try to prevent some of the things that might undo it." Other would-be central planners could learn a lot from what John Cowperthwaite didn't do.

The African Union Gets It Half-Right (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

The African Union did the right thing in rejecting Sudan's bid for the rotating presidency of the organization. Allowing President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan to become Africa's face to the world would have sent just about every wrong message imaginable. Mr. Bashir has presided over the genocide perpetrated by Sudanese solders and allied militias in Darfur since 2003. He's not exactly the person anyone would want in nominal command of the 7,000-strong African Union force that is trying to protect civilians in Darfur. His ascension would have mocked the group's declared goal of promoting democracy, human rights and development.

The only question is why the African leaders in Khartoum for the sixth African Union summit meeting even wasted so much time on the issue, given the really pressing problems on their agenda. While the African Union usually passes the presidency on to the host of its regular summit meeting, the main purpose in founding the organization in 2002 was to avoid the pitfalls of its predecessor, the Organization of African Unity, which came to be derisively known as a dictators' club because of its consistent failure to sanction any member. The African Union, loosely modeled on the European Union, was meant to confront the continent's failings and problems head-on, and to find African solutions for them. So accepting Mr. Bashir's bid for the presidency would have been a serious blow to the union's credibility.

DOJ_NMG_0012082

Unfortunately, that credibility is still on probation. Though rebuffed for now, Mr. Bashir was promised the group's presidency in 2007, and for now the chair will go to the Congo Republic, hardly a model of human rights. Giving Sudan the African Union presidency next year will be just as unacceptable as it was this year.

DOJ_NMG_0012083

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Specter To Grill Gonzales On Spy Program (PPG)..... 5
Lawmakers Seek Details On Administration's Spying (NJTD)..... 5
Senators Questioning Spy Program (BSUN)..... 6
White House Dismissed '02 Surveillance Proposal (WP)..... 7
Words, Deeds On Spying Differed (LAT)..... 8
In 2002, Justice Department Said Eavesdropping Law Working Well (KRT)..... 9
Bush PR Blitz Races To Frame Spying Debate (DMN)..... 11
NSA Surveillance Legality Debate Narrows (FOX)..... 12
Bush Says Takes Threats From Bin Laden Seriously (REU)..... 14
Bush: Bin Laden Should Be Taken Seriously (AP)..... 15
Bush Reiterates Spy Authority (WT)..... 16
Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns (USAT)..... 17
Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows (WP)..... 17
In The Eye Of The Spying Storm (LAT)..... 18
Bush Visits Security Agency And Defends Surveillance (NYT)... 19
Spying By Another Name (LAT)..... 20
U.S. Must Submit Papers To Moussaoui Team (USAT/AP)..... 21
WASHINGTON Judge Orders Release Of Pre-9/11 Attack Assessments (SCRIPPS)..... 22
Al-Arian's Attorneys Want Off The Case (AP)..... 23
Two Get Prison In Exports To Syria, Libya (AP)..... 23
Lawsuit Filed In Support Of Muslim Scholar Barred From U.S. (NYT)..... 23
U.S. Sued Over Islam Expert's Visa (WSJ)..... 24

Patriot Act:

ACLU Says Patriot Act Excludes Muslim Scholar From U.S. (AP)..... 25
Academic Groups Suing To Stop U.S. From Denying Visas To Scholars Based On Their Political Views (KRT)..... 25

Homeland Response:

ACLU Decries 'Spying On Georgians' By Feds, Locals (AJC).... 26
ACLU Releases Documents It Says Show Government Spied On Georgians (AP)..... 27
A Mountain Of Documents On Hurricane Response, But Democrats Seek More (NYT)..... 27
Rejection Of Building Plan Causes Dismay In Louisiana (NYT).. 28
Bush Eyes Grants, Not Agency, For La. Recovery (REU-Y2)..... 29
Katrina Aid Falls Short, Blanco Says Grant To Give $6.2 Billion For La. Areas (USAT)..... 30
'Chocolate' Aftertaste: Bittersweet, Indeed (WP)..... 30
Changes Are Sought In Flood Insurance (NYT)..... 32
Massive Hurricane Claims Force U.S. Flood Insurance Overhaul (WSJ)..... 32

War News:

Insurgent Attacks Repelled (WP)..... 33
General Sees Rift In Iraq Enemy Local-foreign Divide Could Aid U.S. Goals (USAT)..... 33
Insurgents Give U.S. Valuable Training Tool Video Of Attacks Provides Up-close Look At Fighters' Tactics And Capabilities (USAT)..... 34
US To Release Five Female Prisoners In Iraq (CSM)..... 35
Female Detainees Will Be Freed (WT)..... 36
The Other Beat Of Her Heart (WP)..... 36
Abduction Forces A Grim Look At What A Story Is Worth (LAT) 39
Kurd's Writings Land Him In Jail: A Critic Of Party Corruption, Or A Reckless Defamer? (NYT)..... 41
British Arrests Of Police Strain Relations In Basra (LAT)..... 42
On Iraq's Front Lines, Digital Memorials For Fallen Friends (WSJ)..... 44
Where Iraq Goes Now (WP)..... 45
History Lessons (WT)..... 46
Pakistan Pledges To Push Forward On Iran Pipeline (WSJ)..... 46
India Sends Aid, Despite Pakistani Block (WT)..... 47
Rumsfeld Says Army Isn't Overextended (WSJ/AP)..... 48
Rumsfeld Says Army 'Not Broken' (WT)..... 49
Rumsfeld Denies Military Is Stretched Too Thin Defense Secretary Says Troop Retention Up (USAT)..... 49
Rumsfeld: Army Not 'Broken' (WP)..... 50
Reserve Members On Active Duty Earn More, Pay Study Says Findings By RAND Counter Prevailing View Of Service (USAT)..... 51

DOJ:

Judge Extends Appointment Of U.S. Attorney (MR)..... 52
DHS Helps DOJ With Case Management Systems (FCW)..... 52

Corporate Scandals:

Big Test Looms For Prosecutors At Enron Trial (NYT)..... 53
Opportunity For Corporate Fraud Has Shrunk -- But It's Still There (WP)..... 55

Enron Woes Reverberate Through Lives Many Saw Retirement Plans Evaporate With Stock Price (USAT) ... 57
Former Broker Pleads Guilty In Market Timing Probe (AP) ... 59
Livedoor Inquiry Prompts Focus On Japan's Accounting Rules (WSJ) ... 59

Criminal Law:

Senator Seeks Information On Subpoena Of Google (REU-Y2) 60
Senator Demands Info On Search Engine Subpoena (CNET) ... 61
Davis Takes Issue With Google Over Records Request (GCN) . 61
UPDATE: Google Stands Up To US, Accedes To China (DOWJONES) ... 62
Google's Dilemma: Privacy Vs. Police (CSM) ... 63
In Case About Google's Secrets, Yours Are Safe (NYT) ... 64
`Key Player' Pleads Guilty To Morial-era City Hall Corruption (AP) ... 65
Six Indicted In Driver's License Fraud (TENN) ... 66
FBI Arrests License Examiner (MDN) ... 67
Operation Crooked Highway: Federal Prosecutors Charge Six With Driver's License Fraud (AP) ... 67
Six Indicted In Alleged License Scheme (NASHCP) ... 68
IRS Agent Grilled About Ryan Campaign Fund Expenses (CHIT)69
Federal Prosecutors Hoping To Wrap Up Case Against Ryan By The Weekend (AP) ... 70
Accused City Clerk: 'Somebody Is Lying And It Isn't Me' (CHIT) 71
Ex-Campbell Hire Testifies Loyalty Vital (AJC) ... 72
Wis. Official Indicted Over Contract (NYT/AP) ... 73
Broderick Faces Jail Time After Guilty Plea In U.S. Court (FARMNT) ... 73
Contractor Serving Socom Gets Probation, Fine (TAMPTRIB) .. 74
Paper: Texas Favored Firm Tied To Abramoff (AP-Y2) ... 74
Cyberattacker Pleads Guilty (FCW) ... 75
Former Execs For Mail-order Company Outline Fraudulent Practices (PHI) ... 75
Jury Convicts Accused Iraqi Agent On Six Of Seven Counts (AP) ... 75
Kidnap Suspects Face U.S. Charges (COX) ... 76
High Court To Hear Lethal-Injection Case (WP) ... 76
Strapped To Gurney, Inmate Wins Stay; High Court To Hear Appeal (AP) ... 77
First Texas Inmate Put To Death This Year (AP) ... 78
ID Theft Complaints Still Rising, But Rate Of Increase Slows (WSJ) ... 79
Inmate Convicted Of Murdering Defrocked Priest (NYT) ... 80
A Push To Focus On Worst Cases In Child Abuse (CSM) ... 81
Fairfax Police Say Shooting Was Accident (WP) ... 82
Crimes Prompt More Police Patrols In Adams Morgan (WP) ... 83
Man Taught Son To Work Gun, Prosecutor Says (WP) ... 84
The Innocent And The Shammed (NYT) ... 85
Once More With Amy, Joey And Mary Jo (NYT) ... 86

Civil Law:

Ex-supervisor At GE Parts Plant Sues (AP) ... 86
Trustee Called Threat To Plan For Adelphia (LAW) ... 87
Flood Of Bids Is Behind Delay At GSA (WP) ... 88
Airborne Incident As It Adapts To Information Age, Lockheed Fumbles Key Project (WSJ) ... 89

Civil Rights:

Gay Marriage Ban Advances Toward Va. Referendum (WP) ... 91
Marriage Amendment Set For Virginia Ballot (WT) ... 93
FBI Report Could Rewrite Account Of Till's Murder (AP) ... 93
FBI Project Targets Human Smuggling (CO) ... 94
Ga. Lawmakers Approve Requiring Voter ID (AP) ... 95
Appellate Court Rules Against Shreveport In Race Discrimination Lawsuit (SHREVET) ... 95
SIU Tweaks Web Descriptions Of Fellowships Government Questioned (AP) ... 95
EEOC Ordered To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For 'Frivolous' Legal Action (AP) ... 96

Antitrust:

Microsoft Offers Rivals Source Code (FT) ... 97
Microsoft To Make More Code Available Move Made To Comply With EU Antitrust Sanctions (USAT) ... 97
Microsoft Offers Blueprint License To Avert Fines (REU) ... 98
Microsoft To License Windows Source Code In EU (AP) ... 99
Microsoft Bares Code To Avoid Fines (WSJ) ... 100
Guidant Can't Refuse Boston Scientific's Offer (USAT) ... 101
Quiet End To Battle Of The Bids (NYT) ... 102
Judge Sets Court Hearing On BlackBerry Injunction (WSJ) ... 103
Change From Within At Disney (NYT) ... 103

Environment:

US Grand Jury Indicts Three For 'eco-terrorism' (REU) ... 104
EPA Moves To Ban Cookware Chemicals (USAT) ... 104
Harmful Teflon Chemical To Be Eliminated By 2015 (WP) ... 105
E.P.A. Seeks To Phase Out A Toxic Chemical (NYT) ... 106
Bush Seeks To Jump-Start Nuclear Power (WSJ) ... 106
Nuclear Energy Plan Would Use Spent Fuel (WP) ... 107
Al Gore, Sundance's Leading Man (WP) ... 109

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Metro Briefing (NYT) ... 110
(NYPOST) ... 111
Lawyer Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme (AP) ... 111
No. 2 In Drug Ring Pleads Guilty (KNOXNS) ... 112
Prosecutor Postpones Charges In Bomb Case (TRICH) ... 112

Immigration:

Pinochet's Daughter May Seek US Asylum (REU) ... 113

Tax:

Hatch Guilty Of Failing To Pay Taxes On 'Survivor' Winnings (AP) ... 114
Government Says Struckman Nabbed (PSBIZ) ... 115

Congress-Administration:

Alito Moves Toward Senate Confirmation (SACBEE) ... 115
Senate Debates Bush Court Pick, Approval Expected (REU-Y2)116
Parties Shore Up Votes On Alito (WT) ... 117
Robert Novak (CHIST) ... 117
Senators In Need Of A Spine (NYT) ... 118

DOJ_NMG_0012085

The Roberts-Alito Court (WSJ) 119
A Stop At Senate On The Way To Court (WP) 120
Bush NJ Federal Court Nominees Include Abramoff Prosecutor (AP) 120
Bush Plays Down Bailout Prospects For GM And Ford (WSJ) . 121
Managing Detroit (WP) 123
In Address, Bush Is Seen Avoiding Large Initiatives (NYT) 124
Health Of The Union (WSJ) 125
Protesters Sue For Speech Spot (WP) 126
Moderate, Picked As Dems' Voice, Faces Liberal Outcry Governor To Respond To State Of The Union (USAT) ... 127
DIRTY TRICKS (HP) 128
Dems Pick Villaraigosa To Rebut State Of Union, In Spanish (LAT) 128
Prognosis Is Mixed For Health Savings (NYT) 129
Bush's Cure-All For Health Care Sidesteps Big Ills (WSJ) 130
The Fix-It Myth (WP) 131
Drug Benefit Suffers Side Effects (WT) 132
Caution Urged For Executives Seeking Spots On Nonprofit Boards (GOVEXEC) 133
Senators Debate Details Of Lobbying Rules (USAT) 134
For Would-Be Lobbying Reformers, Money Habit Is Hard To Kick (WP) 135
Senators Say Ethics Issue Goes Beyond Lobbying Reform (GFH) 136
McCain Calls To Reform Pork Barrel Politics (WP) 137
Earmark Reform Requires Oversight And Accountability (RC) . 138
Senators Want Outsiders For Ethics Overhaul (LAT) 139
Lobby Battle Splitting Parties (RC) 140
GOP Freezes Jobs List, A Vestige Of The K Street Project (WP) 141
Reform Talk May Spur Hill Exodus (RC) 142
Dodd Out, Link In (WP) 144
Hammering Away (WP) 144
GOP Will Regain Trust (USAT) 145
Proven Record (USAT) 146
Looking For Mr. Clean? Not In This House Race. (USAT) 146
Message Efforts May Boost The Messenger (RC) 147
Just In Time For Valentine's Day (RC) 148
Sen. Clinton: Bush Ignoring Needs Of US Cities (REU) 149
Hillary Has A Wobble Over Wal-Mart Days (Daily News) 150
Many Faces Of Hillary -- None A Winner (LAT) 150
Obey Seeks Public Financing Debate (RC) 151
House Republicans To Get Presentation On 'Suburban Agenda' (RC) 152
Postal Service Goes On Offensive In Fight With Senators Over System To Set Mail Rates (WP) 153
Inside Politics (WT) 154
Dead To The World (NYT) 156

Other News:

Home Sales Drop 3rd Month In Row Market Cooling Off Faster Than Expected (USAT) 156
Homes Sales Fell In December; A Record Still Set (WSJ) 157
Home Sales Fell Again In December (NYT) 158
Weaker Outlook For Homes And Oil Profits End A Rally (NYT) 158
Concerns Of Slowdown (WSJ) 159
Weak Earnings Reports Soften Stocks (USAT) 160
Greenspan To Set Up A Consulting Firm (WSJ) 160
Greenspan Opposes Bank Loophole (WSJ) 161
Skepticism Greeted Greenspan, Too Bernanke's Fed Chief Tenure Begins Similarly To Predecessor's (USAT) 162
Dow Chemical Is Ordered To Pay In 'Janitors' Case (WSJ) 163
Embattled Rep. Ney To Seek Re-Election (AP-Y2) 164
Congressman Tied To Lobbying Inquiry To Seek Re-election (NYT) 164
West Virginia: Late Senate Race Entry For GOP Media Mogul (RC) 165
Ehrlich Alters Landscape Of Stem Cell Funding Debate (WP) . 167
Republicans Pledge Bipartisan Filibuster Of Stem-cell Bill (WT) 169
Gerald Ford Returns Home From Hospital (LAT) 169
Hard Line State (WSJ) 170
Palestinian Premier, Cabinet Resigns (AP) 171
Palestinian Government Resigns In Wake Of Hamas Win (CNN) 173
No Clear Victor In Palestinian Vote (WSJ) 174
About 1 Million People Vote For Palestinian Parliament Terror Group Hamas Takes On Ruling Fatah Party In Elections (USAT) 175
Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote (WP) 176
Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls (WT) 178
Palestinians Cast Historic Vote (CSM) 178
After The Election, Hamas Must Learn To Govern (LAT) 180
WASHINGTON WIRE (WSJ) 182
Vote Complicates Area's Diplomacy (WP) 185
Hamas Presses Fatah In Palestinian Vote, Surveys Say (NYT) 186
Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program (WP) 188
Iran Open To Nuclear Venture With Russia (NYT) 188
Iran Wants More Work On Nuke Deal (AJC/AP) 189
Iran, Russia Fail To Reach Deal On Uranium Enrichment (WSJ/AP) 190
Tehran Holds Up Russian Nuke Deal (WT/AP) 191
Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain (NYT) 191
Iran's Stonewalling At Heart Of Crisis (KRT) 192
US Moves To Delink Indian Nuclear Deal With Iran Vote (AFP) 193
US Says India Nuclear Deal May Depend On Iran Vote (WP/REU) 194
U.S. Envoy Says India Nuke Deal Could Die (AP) 195
Iran, Russia Closer To Uranium Deal (REU) 195
Annan Doubts West Can Make Iran Decision In Feb (REU) 196
Iranians Accuse British Military Of Aiding Bombers (WP/REU) 197
U.N. Council Backs Monitors In Lebanon (REU) 197
White House Slams Mexico For Aid Maps (WT) 198
Sheriff Demands Probe Of Incursions (WT) 199
Reports Cite Incursions On U.S. Border (LAT) 200
Why Mexico Helps US Fight Terror (CSM) 201
States Weigh Immigration Controls Congress Moving Too Slow For Some (USAT) 202
'Keep America, America' (WSJ) 203
Mexican Candidate Tries To Emerge From Fox's Shadow (NYT) 204
OPEC Is Expected To Maintain Output Levels (WSJ) 205

DOJ_NMG_0012086

Roh Opposes U.S. On Regime Change Plans For NorthWarns Of 'Difference Of Opinion' (WT) 206
U.S., South Korea Near Free-Trade Talks (WP) 207
Moscow-Kiev Gas Spat Heats Up As Supplies, Temperatures Drop (WSJ) 207
Putin Links Espionage To NGO Funding (WP) 208
Putin Says Foreigners Use Private Groups To Meddle In Russia (NYT) 209
US Congressman Takes Google To Task On China (FT) 210
U.S. Envoy Engages In Panda Diplomacy (WP) 210
Too Fast In China? (WP) 212
New Estimate In China Finds Fewer AIDS Cases (NYT) 213
European Economic Plan Seeks Nordic-style Approach (WSJ) 214
Warring Factions In Sri Lanka Agree To Resume Peace Talks (NYT) 215
In Africa, Islam And Christianity Are Growing - And Blending (CSM) 215
Delta Villages Fear Troops In Nigeria (NYT/REU) 216
U.N. Chief's Son Agrees To Pay Duties On SUV (LAT) 217
Pinochet Daughter Detained At Dulles (WP) 217
An Act Of Political Hygiene (WSJ) 218
Freedom's Unsung Hero (WSJ) 220
The African Union Gets It Half-Right (NYT) 220

DOJ_NMG_0012087

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter To Grill Gonzales On Spy Program (PPG)

By Michael Mcgough, Post-gazette National Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- If Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales thought he might be spared tough questioning from Republican senators when he testifies about the warrantless wiretapping of Americans thought to be in contact with foreign terrorists, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., yesterday disabused him of that notion.

In a letter sent to the attorney general and shared with the press, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee propounded a series of questions that in a courtroom setting might be called "leading" and requested that Mr. Gonzales answer them in his opening statement before the committee on Feb. 6.

The combative nature of the letter wasn't altered by the fact that the printed salutation to "Attorney General Gonzales" was replaced by a hand-written "Al."

The letter honed in on the Bush administration's assertion-ridiculed by critics -- that Congress empowered the president to engage in electronic surveillance of Americans without a court order when it passed a resolution after the Sept. 11 2001, attacks authorizing him to "use all necessary and appropriate force" against terrorists.

Mr. Specter asked: "In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution, would it be relevant on the issue of congressional intent that the administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for executive powers under FISA?"

Mr. Specter further asked: "If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the resolution, wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to [do so] as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using 'roving' wiretaps?"

Mr. Specter also made it clear he would press Mr. Gonzales about the administration's other legal rationale for the surveillance -- that it flowed from Mr. Bush's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief.

On this point, Mr. Specter asked: "isn't President Carter's signature on FISA in 1978, together with his signing statement, an explicit renunciation of any claim to inherent executive authority under Article II of the Constitution to conduct warrantless domestic surveillance?"

In what might be the most ticklish question for Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Specter said he would ask if the administration would be willing belatedly to seek approval from the FISA court for "the ongoing surveillance program at issue."

In posing these other questions, Mr. Specter made it clear that Democrats won't be the only members of the committee to grill Mr. Gonzales about the rationale for the NSA program. That will make it harder for the administration to portray criticism of the operation as partisan.

On Tuesday, before the committee voted on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., Mr. Specter was praised by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., for scheduling hearings on the NSA program.

Mr. Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the panel, said that "most committees in the Senate have been unwilling to hold hearings because of the pressure from the White House."

Lawmakers Seek Details On Administration's Spying (NJTD)

By Sarah Lai Stirland, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, January 25, 2006

Pressure mounted on the Bush administration Wednesday to provide lawmakers with answers on domestic spying activities.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., released a three-page letter with detailed questions to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the president's decision in 2002 to secretly authorize domestic wiretaps without warrants.

The letter includes many of the questions that constitutional scholars have been posing about the president's order, and several questions could put Gonzales in an awkward position.

DOJ_NMG_0012088

Specter's Tuesday letter asked Gonzales why the president did not ask lawmakers to include the authority to conduct such surveillance as part of the USA PATRIOT Act. Congress passed the legislation shortly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, specifically to loosen legal standards governing terrorist investigations.

The letter also asks Gonzales to justify the administration's selective briefing of particular members of Congress, rather than of all of the members of the House and Senate Intelligence committees, as required by law.

At the same time, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee demanded that Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., hold a business meeting so the committee can vote to investigate several aspects of the administration's domestic spying.

Under committee rules, Roberts is obligated to hold a meeting if at least five members formally ask for one. All seven Democrats on the panel signed the request to Roberts.

A majority vote is needed to move ahead with the investigation. Two Republicans on the committee, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine, have asked Roberts for a hearing on the matter. Roberts has said nothing publicly about holding a hearing. A press call asking whether the senator plans for any hearings was not returned by press time.

Also on Wednesday, a group of Democrats, including Sens. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, sent a letter to President Bush asking him for specific changes in the law that he believes are necessary to permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists.

When asked whether they were posing the questions so new provisions could be included in pending legislation to reauthorize the USA PATRIOT Act, a spokesman for Durbin replied: "No. that's because we believe that the president is breaking the law, and we would rather have him not do that."

The spokesman added, "If [Bush] feels that he doesn't have the tools he needs, he has an obligation under the Constitution to come to Congress."

In a speech delivered at National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade, Md., President Bush sounded defiant.

"I'll continue to reauthorize this program for so long as our country faces a continuing threat from al Qaeda and related groups," he said. "This enemy still wants to do harm to the American people. We cannot let the fact that we have not been attacked lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared."

Senators Questioning Spy Program (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- On a day when President Bush visited the National Security Agency to defend its warrantless eavesdropping operation, questions mounted about the administration's legal justifications for the program.

A key Republican senator took issue with Bush's defense of the operation, which was secretly authorized by the president after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and targets some communications inside the United States. Also, new reports surfaced suggesting that the administration had rejected an earlier proposal in Congress that would have made it easier to obtain court approval for domestic wiretapping.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter took issue with major themes of Bush's legal defense of the program, including that Congress gave implicit approval for it in a 2001 resolution authorizing the use of force against terrorists.

Specter, who has called Gonzales to testify at hearings into the NSA surveillance activities, asked the attorney general to answer more than a dozen questions about the legal reasoning behind the operation. Among them: why Bush sidestepped a 1978 law requiring approval by a secret court for most domestic wiretaps; why the administration did not ask for express authority to carry out the program; and how the administration can justify briefing only eight members of Congress about the activities when the law requires that congressional committees be kept up to date on intelligence matters.

The letter from Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, asked Gonzales to appear for a full day of testimony at the hearings, scheduled to open Feb. 6. Specter was particularly pointed in questioning whether it actually was Congress' intent to let Bush circumvent the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which generally requires warrants for domestic surveillance.

ßsubhed 'Necessary' force

Bush contends the post-9/11 resolution, which authorized the use of "all necessary and appropriate force" to pursue al-Qaida, extends to wiretapping terrorist communications that originate or end inside the United States.

Still, legal experts and several lawmakers in both parties have questioned why Bush did not seek court approval for the program, or ask that the standards of the 1978 law be relaxed, if necessary, to accommodate it. Late last year, Gonzales said officials determined that such an expansion was "not something that we could likely get" from Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0012089

But the Bush administration opposed loosening FISA's legal standards in 2002, when Republican Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio introduced legislation that would have done so for wiretaps on non-U.S. persons. The change might not be necessary and could be unconstitutional, James A. Baker, the Justice Department intelligence counsel, testified on Capitol Hill in July 2002.

The issue is important to the raging debate over the legality of the NSA program, which operates without such warrants, since Bush and his top advisors argue that the secret authorization was needed because the FISA approval process is too unwieldy for intelligence officers tracking terrorist communications.

To obtain a domestic wiretap warrant through the FISA court, authorities must show "probable cause." In his 2002 testimony, Baker questioned whether relaxing the standard to "reasonable suspicion" would pass constitutional muster.

"If the current standard has not posed an obstacle, then there may be little to gain from the lower standard and, as I previously stated, perhaps much to lose," he said.

A Justice Department spokesman said there was no contradiction between Baker's statement and the administration's position on the NSA program. Officials carrying out the surveillance program operate on a "reasonable basis to believe" standard, which is similar to "probable cause," and a higher threshold than "reasonable suspicion," said Brian Roehrkasse, the spokesman.

"The legal standards are essentially the same; however, when time is of the essence, interposing additional layers of review sacrifices critical speed and agility," Roehrkasse said.

National security lawyers, however, view "probable cause" as a higher standard than "reasonable basis to believe."

Bush pressed ahead with his campaign to quell public anxiety about the program during a visit to the NSA's Fort Meade headquarters, painting his critics as weak-kneed in the face of terrorist threats. "There's some in America who say, 'Well, this can't be true [that] there are still people willing to attack,'" Bush said. "Listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously. When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it."

Flanked by senior advisors and Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the NSA director, Bush spoke to reporters from outside the NSA's Threat Operations Center, a high-tech hub of activity with a video wall displaying snippets of the vast amounts of information the agency collects and crunches. Earlier, in a portion of his visit that was closed to reporters, Bush addressed NSA employees. His remarks were beamed to agency personnel around the world, including in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Democrats pounced on Bush's NSA visit Wednesday to criticize the operation. "I regret that President Bush has chosen to use NSA, and its hard-working employees, as a photo opportunity for his own political purposes," Maryland Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski said. "Instead he should be working to sort out the complicated issues surrounding his domestic spying program."

Democratic Rep. Elijah E. Cummings of Baltimore said Bush should focus on helping Americans without jobs, health insurance or access to a quality education, rather than speaking out on the spying program.

"I urge our president to open his eyes and address the nation's immediate needs instead of defending the illegal action of listening in on private telephone conversations," Cummings said in a statement.

Republicans sent word to millions of supporters, asking them to rally behind the program in letters to newspapers and calls to radio shows and lawmakers. In an e-mail, National Republican Chairman Ken Mehlman accused Democrats of "deliberately distorting the truth" about the operation, and urged Republicans to "separate fact from fiction."

Democrats' letter

A group of Democratic senators released a letter to Bush that accused the president of breaking the law through the eavesdropping program. They called on him to tell Congress by Feb. 1 what changes he would seek in current law to carry it out.

"If you or officials in your administration believe that FISA, or any law, does not give you enough authority to combat terrorism, you should propose changes in the law to Congress. You may not simply disregard the law," wrote the group, including Sens. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader.

A request by Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Intelligence Committee Democrat, for prompt hearings on the NSA program touched off a testy exchange of letters between him and Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas, the panel's Republican chairman, with each accusing the other of playing politics with the issue.

House Intelligence Committee Democrats, too, renewed their calls for hearings on the NSA program. Also, Senate Democrats called on Specter to widen the scope of the Judiciary Committee hearings by calling current and former administration officials, including Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff.

julie.davis@baltsun.com

White House Dismissed '02 Surveillance Proposal (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration rejected a 2002 Senate proposal that would have made it easier for FBI agents to obtain surveillance warrants in terrorism cases, concluding that the system was working well and that it would likely be unconstitutional to lower the legal standard.

The proposed legislation by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have allowed the FBI to obtain surveillance warrants for non-U.S. citizens if they had a "reasonable suspicion" they were connected to terrorism -- a lower standard than the "probable cause" requirement in the statute that governs the warrants.

The administration has contended that it launched a secret program of warrantless domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency in part because of the time it takes to obtain such secret warrants from federal judges under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

The wiretapping program, ordered by President Bush in 2001, is used when intelligence agents have a "reasonable basis to believe" that a target is tied to al Qaeda or related groups, according to recent statements by administration officials. It can be used on U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, without court oversight.

Democrats and national security law experts who oppose the NSA program say the Justice Department's opposition to the DeWine legislation seriously undermines arguments by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and others, who have said the NSA spying is constitutional and that surveillance warrants are often too cumbersome to obtain.

"It's entirely inconsistent with their current position," said Philip B. Heymann, a deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration who teaches law at Harvard University. "The only reason to do what they've been doing is because they wanted a lower standard than 'probable cause.' A member of Congress offered that to them, but they turned it down."

But Justice Department officials disagreed, saying the standard the department opposed in 2002 is legally different from the one used by the NSA.

"The FISA 'probable cause' standard is essentially the same as the 'reasonable basis' standard used in the terrorist surveillance program," said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos, using the term for the NSA program the White House has adopted. "The 'reasonable suspicion' standard, which is lower than both of these, is not used in either program."

Justice officials also said that even under a different standard, the process of obtaining a surveillance warrant would take longer than is necessary for the NSA to efficiently track suspected terrorists.

The DeWine amendment -- first highlighted this week by Internet blogger Glenn Greenwald and widely publicized yesterday by the Project on Government Secrecy, an arm of the Federation of American Scientists -- is the latest point of contention in a fierce political and legal battle over the NSA monitoring program.

Many Democrats and some Republicans, along with legal experts from both sides, have criticized the program as a clear violation of the 1978 FISA law, which makes it a crime to conduct domestic surveillance without a criminal or intelligence warrant. The administration argues that Bush acted legally under the congressional authorization to use military force against al Qaeda, and that FISA would be unconstitutional if it constrains his power as commander in chief.

During separate appearances this week, Gonzales and Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the deputy intelligence chief, also said the legal requirements under FISA made it difficult for intelligence agents to act quickly enough in many cases.

Under the NSA program, Hayden said, "the trigger is quicker and a bit softer than it is for a FISA warrant."

During Senate debate over DeWine's amendment in July 2002, James A. Baker, the Justice Department's counsel for intelligence policy, said in a statement that the Bush administration did not support the proposal "because the proposed change raises both significant legal and practical issues."

Baker said it was "not clear cut" whether the proposal would "pass constitutional muster," and "we could potentially put at risk ongoing investigations and prosecutions" if the amendment was later struck down by the courts. He also said Justice had been using FISA aggressively and played down the notion that the probable cause standard was too high.

A DeWine spokesman declined to comment on the issue yesterday.

Also yesterday, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) sent a list of 15 sharply worded questions to Gonzales in preparation for a Feb. 6 hearing on the legality of the NSA program. Specter asks, among other things, why the government did not ask Congress for new legislation to allow the spying.

Words, Deeds On Spying Differed (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Four years ago, top Bush administration lawyers told Congress they opposed lowering the legal standard for intercepting the phone calls of foreigners who were in the United States, even while the administration had secretly adopted a lower standard on its own.

DOJ_NMG_0012091

The government's public position then was the mirror opposite of its rationale today in defending its warrantless domestic spying program, which has come under attack as a violation of civil liberties.

Government wiretapping — and who sets the rules — has emerged at the center of a growing debate between the White House and Congress since the disclosure last month of the administration's warrantless spying program.

A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Wednesday the administration had opposed changing the law in 2002 in part because it did not want to publicly debate the issue.

"There was a conscious choice not to have a public discussion about it. It could have exposed the program. This was a military defense intelligence program," said the spokesman, who asked not be named because of the sensitivity surrounding the still-classified presidential order on wiretapping.

After the terrorist attacks of September 2001, lawmakers proposed several changes that would make it easier for the government to detect terrorists and their allies who might be operating in the United States.

Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) proposed making it easier for officials to obtain warrants to conduct wiretapping. The current law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, said officials must have "probable cause" to believe someone was an agent of an international terrorist group before they could obtain a warrant to tap their phones.

This high standard proved to be a stumbling block at times. When Zacarias Moussaoui — the man later dubbed the 20th hijacker of the Sept. 11 attacks — was arrested in Minnesota in August 2001, officials in the Justice Department did not seek a warrant to search his laptop computer because they did not have probable cause to believe he was an Al Qaeda operative.

This was later judged to be a mistake. DeWine cited this when he proposed to lower the standard for obtaining a warrant to one of "reasonable suspicion." This would permit the government to move quickly to search or eavesdrop on suspicious foreigners such as Moussaoui, he said, even if they lacked "probable cause" to show they were members of Al Qaeda.

But when the proposal came before a Senate committee, the administration's lawyers testified that no change was needed.

"The administration at this time is not prepared to support it," the Justice Department's James A. Baker said of the DeWine amendment in congressional testimony. As counsel for intelligence policy at the time, he headed the office that sought search warrants from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court that meets inside the Justice Department.

The administration now defends the constitutionality of the warrantless domestic spying program and says it is necessary to avoid the "cumbersome" process of getting a warrant from the FISA court.

But in 2002, Baker told Congress it was not clear "whether a 'reasonable suspicion' standard for electronic surveillance would … pass constitutional muster."

Baker also said the existing standard was not a problem.

"We have been aggressive in seeking FISA warrants, and thanks to Congress' passage of the [Patriot Act] we have been able to use our expanded FISA tools more effectively to combat terrorist activities," he said. "It may not be the case that the probable cause standard has caused any difficulties in our ability to seek FISA warrants we require."

DeWine's proposal failed to pass the committee.

This week, top administration officials confirmed that before DeWine even made his proposal, they had adopted a "reasonable basis" standard for this eavesdropping.

"The president's authorization allows us to track this kind of call more comprehensively and more efficiently. The trigger is quicker and a bit softer than it is for a FISA warrant," Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the No. 2 ranking intelligence official and the former head of NSA, told reporters Monday.

Asked whether the key change was to switch from "probable cause" to a "reasonableness" standard, Hayden said, "I think you have accurately described the criteria under which this operates."

A Senate Democrat, Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, accused the administration of having tried "to paper over the legality of a secret spying program. If they really believed the current law is too burdensome, the Bush administration should have asked Congress to change it, but they did not. Instead a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite."

Timothy Edgar, a lawyer on national security policy for the American Civil Liberties Union, also accused the administration of "remarkable duplicity" for having testified in public against the legal change while carrying it out in private. "It seems they were being incredibly deceptive," he said.

The Justice Department's conflicting statements came to light Wednesday after Glenn Greenwald, a New York lawyer, posted the differing statements on a blog.

In 2002, Justice Department Said Eavesdropping Law Working Well (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012092

WASHINGTON - A July 2002 Justice Department statement to a Senate committee appears to contradict several key arguments that the Bush administration is making to defend its eavesdropping on U.S. citizens without court warrants.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the law governing such operations, was working well, the department said in 2002. A "significant review" would be needed to determine whether FISA's legal requirements for obtaining warrants should be loosened because they hampered counterterrorism efforts, the department said then.

President Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top officials now argue that warrantless eavesdropping is necessary in part because complying with the FISA law is too burdensome and impedes the government's ability to rapidly track communications between suspected terrorists.

In its 2002 statement, the Justice Department said it opposed a legislative proposal to change FISA to make it easier to obtain warrants that would allow the super-secret National Security Agency to listen in on communications involving non-U.S. citizens inside the United States.

Today, senior U.S. officials complain that FISA prevents them from doing that.

James A. Baker, the Justice Department's top lawyer on intelligence policy, made the statement before the Senate Intelligence Committee on July 31, 2002. He was laying out the department's position on an amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. The committee rejected DeWine's proposal, leaving FISA intact.

So while Congress chose not to weaken FISA in 2002, today Bush and his allies contend that Congress implicitly gave Bush the authority to evade FISA's requirements when it authorized him to use force in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks three days after they occurred - a contention that many lawmakers reject.

Glenn Greenwald, an Internet blogger, first connected the earlier Justice Department statement to the Bush administration's current arguments on his Web log, called Unclaimed Territory.

Baker's 2002 statement drew new attention Wednesday as the White House continued its campaign to justify eavesdropping on Americans who are suspected of being in contact with al-Qaida or other terrorist groups, despite possible violation of FISA.

Bush visited the NSA's sprawling complex at Fort Meade, Md., on Wednesday to deliver a closed-door morale-boosting talk to its workforce.

He later repeated to reporters that the eavesdropping operation was limited to communications in which one participant was outside the United States.

"When terrorist operatives are here in America communicating with someone overseas, we must understand what's going on if we're going to do our job to protect the people," Bush said.

The administration insists that Bush has the legal and constitutional authority to order the NSA program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But Democrats and some Republicans contend that Bush may have violated FISA, which governs how the government can monitor international calls and e-mails.

The law requires the government to show a secret federal court that it has "probable cause" to believe that a target for domestic eavesdropping is an agent of a foreign government or involved with a terrorist organization like al-Qaida.

DeWine's bill would have lowered the "probable cause" standard to one of only "reasonable suspicion" for warrants involving foreigners in the country.

Baker said in 2002 that because the "proposed change raises both significant legal and practical issues, the administration at this time is not prepared to support it."

He said that Justice Department lawyers were trying to determine whether the lower standard would pass "constitutional muster."

Baker also said that the Justice Department had "been aggressive in seeking FISA warrants" and that congressional approval of the USA Patriot Act had allowed investigators "to use our expanded FISA tools more effectively to combat terrorist activities."

"It may not be the case that the probable cause standard has caused any difficulties in our ability to seek the FISA warrants we require," he said then.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said Wednesday that Gonzales stands by the administration's current view that FISA warrant requirements impose "additional layers of review" that sacrifice "critical speed and agility."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, sent Gonzales a letter detailing a series of pointed questions that he intends to ask during a Feb. 6 hearing into the NSA program's legality.

The letter noted that under FISA, federal authorities can wiretap anyone and then seek a warrant within 72 hours.

Specter said he wanted Gonzales to explain why Bush didn't ask Congress to change FISA to make it easier to conduct surveillance with judicial approval.

DOJ_NMG_0012093

He also indicated that Congress could have adjusted the law when it passed the anti-terrorism Patriot Act in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks.

To read Greenwald's posts on the 2002 Justice Department statement, go to http://glenngreenwald.blogspot.com/

Knight Ridder Newspapers correspondents William Douglas and James Kuhnhenn contributed to this report.

Bush PR Blitz Races To Frame Spying Debate (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration raced this week to defend its warrantless domestic spying program, with several aims in mind, experts say: Win over a conflicted public; force Democrats into an arena that plays to GOP strength; and head off talk of impeachment and special prosecutors.

With polls showing the public sharply divided over the controversial surveillance program, the White House and its critics – Democrats, small-government conservatives and civil libertarians – are engaged in a high-stakes contest to frame the debate.

"If it's defined primarily as 'government abuse, the president out of control, the White House running roughshod over basic constitutional rights,' it would be a major problem for an extended period of time for the president – both on Capitol Hill but also with the voters," said political analyst Stuart Rothenberg.

"If the issue is defined more as 'protecting national security, keeping people safe, stopping terrorism,' then what the Democrats immediately saw might be a good issue for them could actually be turned around for the president and the Republican Party."

Though the court of public opinion is key, some suggest that the political system or the courts will be the ultimate arbiter of the program's legality – and the far weightier question of whether Mr. Bush is claiming executive powers outside the bounds of the Constitution or the law.

"This is the dangerous side of what's going on," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union.

He argues that the White House has gone too far in its assertion of presidential powers.

"It sets the stage for a clash between institutions of government because what the executive claims, when it claims the inherent power to do anything it wants in times of war, is saying that what Congress thinks doesn't matter and ultimately what the courts think doesn't matter."

Little oversight?

But Caroline Fredrickson, head of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, said she fears that clash won't materialize because the GOP-led Congress has shown little appetite for oversight of the administration's anti-terrorism efforts.

"Where you have bipartisan groups of individuals from the broadest spectrum of American political life suggesting that the president's actions are illegal, I think this is where Congress should be undertaking extensive hearings," she said.

Thus far, the Senate Judiciary Committee is the only one committed to hold hearings, with Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., voicing skepticism about the program's legal justification.

Mr. Specter has summoned Attorney General Al Gonzales for a Feb. 6 hearing and is under pressure from Democrats to invite former Deputy Attorney General James Comey and other administration officials who reportedly raised concerns about the legality of the domestic surveillance.

Mr. Gonzales and other top aides joined the president this week in a public relations blitz to assert that Mr. Bush had full authority to initiate warrantless surveillance of Americans believed to be engaged in communication with people overseas suspected of ties to al-Qaeda or its affiliates.

"We must be able to quickly detect when someone linked to al-Qaeda is communicating with someone inside of America," Mr. Bush said Wednesday during a visit to NSA headquarters in Maryland.

But critics say that can be done, with court review, under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Though administration officials complain that the law is too cumbersome for "hot pursuit" surveillance, FISA backers note that the law permits emergency eavesdropping so long as court approval is sought within 72 hours.

Legal challenges

While the ACLU and the Center for Constitutional Rights have sued to challenge the spy program's constitutionality, some suggest that the controversy may not be settled in the courts.

"It's very unlikely it will ever make it to the Supreme Court or a federal court because it basically is a disagreement between the executive branch and the legislative branch over who has power," Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said Wednesday. "And the truth is, both branches have a responsibility and have authority."

The groups' lawsuits were brought on behalf of Americans troubled by the thought of domestic spying without court oversight.

But they will probably be deemed to lack legal standing because the groups weren't wiretap targets, said Kate Martin, head of the Center for National Security Studies. And while lawyers for defendants charged in terrorism cases have sued to learn if the warrantless wiretaps were used against their clients, Ms. Martin predicted that they are unlikely to pierce the veil of secrecy around the program.

Her solution? Congressional hearings. And if lawmakers deem that Mr. Bush exceeded his power, Congress should censure him.

Asked on a recent Sunday news show what he thought the remedy would be for a president breaking the law, Mr. Specter said, "Impeachment is the remedy."

He quickly noted that he was speaking theoretically. And thus far, impeachment isn't being touted by the political establishment. Nor is the possibility of a special prosecutor, though a new USA Today /CNN/Gallup poll found that 58 percent of Americans favor appointment of a special prosecutor.

But Bruce Fein, who served in the Nixon Justice Department, noted that it took many months for impeachment to gain currency during Watergate.

"I think that it would be premature to write off the impeachment option," Mr. Fein said.

Impeachment is not likely to gain political traction, said Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia political scientist. "Only hard-core Democratic partisans want to see Bush impeached, so it just turns people off."

Congressional Democrats, who have been burned at the polls after jousting with Mr. Bush over national security issues, are far less likely to raise impeachment, Mr. Rothenberg agreed.

A better option for them, he said, is to push the question of whether Mr. Bush broke the law or abused his power.

Backlash predicted

Mr. Keene, typically a staunch Bush ally, predicted that the administration's stance would "create an institutional backlash," with Congress moving to assert its power.

The best outcome, Mr. Fein said, would be for the White House to seek a rewrite of the FISA law if changes are deemed necessarily – and to quietly renounce the idea that the Constitution grants the president unparalleled wartime power.

Few of those challenging the administration's actions have suggested that the spy program should be terminated, and congressional Democrats have urged the administration to come to Congress for legislative approval.

The White House sees no need to do so, spokesman Scott McClellan said. "The president has the authority and responsibility to do what he's doing to prevent attacks from happening," he said.

Mr. Keene and others predicted that resolution may be years away.

"I'm not sure how it plays out, but ultimately it plays out by getting some kind of balance," he said.

After all, he noted, executive excesses in the past – such as President Harry Truman's seizure of U.S. steel mills during the Korean War – ultimately were corrected.

NSA Surveillance Legality Debate Narrows (FOX)

Fox News, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — After three days of a Bush administration offensive and weeks of debate and accusations, some legal experts are coming to terms on what is illegal and what is not in the National Security Agency electronic surveillance program.

"When the president goes around and speaks ... and says we're monitoring calls from overseas from Al Qaeda to the United States, the NSA can go ahead and do that now under the law," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearing of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito.

But Kennedy said independent organizations, like the Congressional Research Service, have studied the legality of the NSA program and say the president has gone beyond what the rules allow. Bush, however, says the eavesdropping program is legal and doesn't overstep the boundaries allowed to him by the Constitution and congressional resolution.

"These tools include surveillance to protect and prevent further attacks by our enemies," Bush said Wednesday after visiting the NSA to give a morale boost to workers there. "I have the authorization both from the Constitution and the Congress to undertake this vital program. The American people expect me to protect our lives and our civil liberties and that's exactly what we're doing with this program."

On Monday, the president described exactly what the NSA is doing.

"What I'm talking about is the intercept of certain communications emanating between somebody inside the United States and outside the United States and one of the numbers would be reasonably suspected to be an Al Qaeda link or affiliate," Bush told an audience at Kansas State University.

He added that just because the United States hasn't been hit in more than four years, the threat persists.

"Listen to the words of Usama bin Laden and take them seriously when he says he's going to hurt the American people again -- or try to -- he means it," Bush told reporters. "I take it seriously and the people of NSA take it seriously and most of the American people take it seriously, as well.

"This enemy still wants to do harm to the American people. We cannot let the fact that we have not been attacked lull us into the conclusion that the terrorists have disappeared. They have not disappeared," he said.

According to legal experts, hypothetically, if the NSA had intercepted calls from alleged terrorists such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibb, both now in custody, while they were abroad, then U.S. intelligence agents could listen to the calls without a warrant. That goes for phone calls with people on the other end of the line who happen to be in United States.

Only when the person inside the United States becomes the target of surveillance is a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court required.

"You wouldn't need a warrant to do the initial interception, but afterwards, once you're targeting the American citizen, then you need that warrant," said Bruce Fein, a former official in the Reagan Justice Department and a fierce critic of the Bush' administration's terror surveillance.

Other experts agree that a warrant is not needed until the U.S.-based individual becomes a suspect.

"If ... you are not targeting the person in the United States, you get the conversations, you are perfectly free to use those, that information provide it to other government agencies, if you want," said Bryan Cunningham, a former official with the Bush National Security Council.

Once the government agencies are given the information, they can open investigations with warrants to conduct further surveillance.

But others argue that the law says domestic communications monitoring rules apply even when only one end of the call is on U.S. soil. They say that's why Bush signed a highly classified directive approving the program and has to re-approve it every 45 days.

Current and former government officials familiar with electronic monitoring say that accidental eavesdropping — so-called "incidental intercepts" — are also a dark part of the business. When it happens, the NSA has procedures to protect the identities of Americans and their privacy.

Lt. Gen. Michael Hayden, the former head of the NSA at the time the president first authorized surveillance of terrorists, addressed that issue and others in a speech at the National Press Club on Monday.

"When you're talking to your daughter at state college, this program cannot intercept your conversations. And when she takes a semester abroad to complete her Arabic studies, this program will not intercept your communications," Hayden said.

He added that it would be impossible to monitor all phone calls between the United States and abroad because in 2003 alone, Americans participated in 200 billion minutes of international calls.

"The purpose of all of this is not to collect reams of intelligence, but to detect and prevent attacks. The intelligence community has neither the time, the resources nor the legal authority to read communications that aren't likely to protect us. And NSA has no interest in doing so. These are communications that we have reason to believe are Al Qaeda communications," Hayden said.

Critics say they don't believe Bush or administration officials when they say the program is limited. Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said Wednesday that Senate Democratic leaders as well as Kennedy and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin have signed a letter to Bush outlining their concerns with the program and the fact that they know very little about it.

Durbin noted that while an emergency exception to current law allows domestic wiretaps without court approval in the case of an emergency, it should not be the norm that the court is circumvented.

"This is not about whether we should wiretap terrorists. Democrats believe we should use every legal resource we have to put an end to Usama bin Laden's deadly franchise," Durbin said. "It isn't a matter of missing an opportunity; the government can act instantly to deal with a wiretap on a suspected terrorist and has 72 hours to contact the [FISA] court and advise them of the action that's been taken. If the president thinks the current laws are inadequate to wiretap terrorists, he should come to Congress."

Durbin said most lawmakers only know what the media has been reporting about the program. Although it appears from those reports that the president has gone beyond his authority, Durbin said, he's waiting to make his own judgment on that.

"I'd like to, before I reach that point, at least know how the program is being used," he said. "I'm not sure any member is looking for political confrontation. We want to establish a legal framework to keep America safe. I am concerned on a constitutional basis this president is saying, 'I don't need a political framework.' And that, I think, goes too far."

Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., echoed complaints about how the president created the program but not about its importance. Defending Congress' oversight responsibilities and the need for civil liberties protections, Schumer said he worried about abuses similar to those before the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act was enacted in 1978.

"My view has generally been that when the president needs powers to protect us, he ought to get them, but there ought to be debate and it ought to be done with safeguards in place so that there aren't abuses, which we've seen in other wiretaps such as in the days of (J. Edgar) Hoover," Schumer said.

The latest Gallup Poll, taken just before the administration's public relations blitz this week shows a slight majority, 51-46, thinks the administration was wrong to allow warrantless wiretapping. The 5 percent difference is equal to the survey's margin of error.

After a Justice Department briefing Wednesday for former government officials on the president's so-called "terrorist surveillance program," former FBI and CIA Director William Webster, who served under Republican and Democratic presidents, expressed his support.

Asked if the U.S. government has done its due diligence regarding the law and civil liberty protections, Webster said, "I'm confident that we're, that they do have their act together."

Former CIA Director James Woolsey sides with the president, but recently said it's a close call.

"If anyone says it's a crystal clear issue one way or another, that is the only position I regard as wrong," he said.

All kinds of congressional hearings have been demanded regarding the program. The only one scheduled to date is on Feb. 6 by the Senate Judiciary Committee where Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to testify.

On Wednesday, Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., sent Gonzales a letter with 15 opening questions on the legality of the communications intercepts, and he warned that the committee would want to question him the entire day.

"Would you consider seeking approval from the FISA court at this time for the ongoing surveillance program at issue? ... Why did the White House not ask Congress for changes to a 1978 foreign surveillance law? ... Why didn't the administration go to an established intelligence court to get approval for the monitoring?" are some of the questions asked by Specter.

Democrats say they want to see the committee call more witnesses than now planned, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft Deputy Attorneys General James Comey and Larry Thompson and White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card.

FOX News' Jim Angle, Carl Cameron and Liza Porteus and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Bush Says Takes Threats From Bin Laden Seriously (REU)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, January 26, 2006

President George W. Bush said on Wednesday he took Osama bin Laden's threats of another attack seriously and invoked the al Qaeda leader's recent audiotape to defend a domestic eavesdropping program.

"I understand there are some in America who say, 'Well this can't be true, there aren't still people willing to attack.' All I would ask them to do is listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously," Bush said at the National Security Agency.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again or try to, he means it. I take it seriously and the people of NSA take it seriously and most of the American people take it seriously as well," Bush said.

Democrats have criticized Bush for authorizing the warrantless monitoring of international telephone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of aiding al Qaeda.

Critics say the program, conducted by the NSA, violates the U.S. Constitution and the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which makes it illegal to spy on U.S. citizens in the United States without the approval of a special secret court.

Bin Laden in an audiotape that aired last week warned that al Qaeda was preparing attacks in the United States but was open to a conditional truce with Americans.

"Just last week ... we heard from Osama bin Laden," Bush said. "The terrorists will do everything they can to strike us. I am going to continue to do everything I can within my legal authority to stop them."

Top Senate Democrats sent a letter to Bush on Wednesday asking he outline, by February 1, any changes in current law he would propose to improve surveillance of suspected terrorists.

"We are ... gravely concerned that sometime in 2001, in apparent violation of federal law, you authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on Americans in the United States without court approval," said the letter, signed by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and others.

The senators noted that in a speech in 2004, Bush said, "When we're talking about chasing down terrorists, we're talking about getting a court order before we do so." They quoted Bush saying, "A wiretap requires a court order."

Democrats have noted that in special cases the NSA is allowed to conduct domestic surveillance but has to obtain a warrant within 72 hours.

Democrats in the Senate and House of Representatives also pressured Republicans on Wednesday to submit Bush's domestic eavesdropping program to the scrutiny of Congress' intelligence oversight committees.

DOJ_NMG_0012097

'FAR-FETCHED'

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said the administration's argument it needed to bypass the warrant process in order to go after al Qaeda was "far-fetched."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, plans hearings on the NSA program on February 6.

Bush told reporters he would continue to authorize the eavesdropping program.

"The American people expect me to protect their lives and their civil liberties and that's exactly what we're doing with this program," he said.

Touring the NSA in Fort Meade, Bush visited a room with a large screen highlighting statistics about cyberspace, including one saying over 592 billion instant messages were sent daily. That was projected to grow to 1.38 trillion by 2007.

The NSA is one of the most secretive of the U.S. spy agencies. Founded in 1952, it uses high-tech equipment such as satellites and bugs to pick up foreign electronic signals such as telephone calls and computer messages.

(Additional reporting by Tabassum Zakaria, Richard Cowan and David Morgan)

Bush: Bin Laden Should Be Taken Seriously (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 26, 2006

President Bush, defending the government's secret surveillance program, said Wednesday that Americans should take Osama bin Laden seriously when he says he's going to attack again.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it," Bush told reporters after visiting the top-secret National Security Agency where the surveillance program is based. "I take it seriously, and the people of NSA take it seriously."

It was Bush's first comment about bin Laden since the al-Qaida leader warned in a tape aired last week that his fighters are preparing new attacks in the United States. Bin Laden offered a truce, without specifying the conditions, and the White House responded that the United States would never negotiate with the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Bush's NSA visit was part of an aggressive administration effort to defend the surveillance program. Experts and lawmakers from both parties have questioned whether it's legal for the government to listen to conversations in the United States without a warrant, which the administration could get through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Four leading Democratic senators wrote Bush Wednesday saying they support efforts to do everything possible within the law to combat terrorism, but that the NSA program is an "apparent violation of federal law."

"If you or officials in your administration believe that FISA, or any law, does not give you enough authority to combat terrorism, you should propose changes in the law to Congress," wrote Sens. Harry Reid, Edward Kennedy, Richard Durbin and Russ Feingold. "You may not simply disregard the law."

Reporters traveling with the president were only allowed to see a few minutes of Bush's NSA tour, as he walked through the high-tech Threat Operations Center where intelligence experts monitor Internet traffic. He spoke to reporters from a podium set up in a hallway after completing his tour, but did not take questions.

In keeping with the NSA's secrecy, reporters were required to leave their cell phones, pagers, laptops and wireless e-mail devices outside the complex. The White House negotiated so that the journalists could bring in cameras and video equipment, but they were allowed only to take photos of the president, not the inside or outside of the facility itself.

Bush said the NSA program is limited to communications between the United States and people overseas who are linked to al-Qaida. He said it has helped prevent terrorist attacks and save American lives, although the government has not given any specifics.

Bush urged that people "listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously."

His critics say the law requires him to get permission from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to eavesdrop on communications involving Americans.

"Obviously, I support tracking down terrorists," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said in a speech Wednesday. "I think that's our obligation. But I think it can be done in a lawful way."

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the administration should have asked Congress to change the law if it wanted additional surveillance powers.

"Instead, a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite," Leahy said Wednesday, circulating 2002 testimony from a Justice Department official who said the administration had no position on a bill that would have made it easier to get warrants from the FISA court.

DOJ_NMG_0012098

Bush said he had the legal right to do whatever he could to prevent further attacks and that the NSA program "is fully consistent with our nation's laws and Constitution."

"I'll continue to reauthorize this program for so long as our country faces a continuing threat from al-Qaida and related groups," Bush said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he's eager to learn more. Asked on NBC's "Today" show, if Bush broke the law, McCain replied: "I don't know. I want to be perfectly clear. I don't know the answer."

Bush Reiterates Spy Authority (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday defended National Security Agency employees who eavesdrop on suspected terrorists, even as the legality of the program was questioned by senators from both parties.

"I have the authority, both from the Constitution and the Congress, to undertake this vital program," Mr. Bush said after a private speech to employees at the NSA headquarters in Fort Meade, Md.

"The American people expect me to protect their lives and their civil liberties, and that's exactly what we're doing with this program."

The president took the unusual step of imploring Americans to heed the warnings of Osama bin Laden, who threatened additional attacks against the U.S. in an audiotape that surfaced last week.

"Listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously," Mr. Bush said. "When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it. I take it seriously, and the people of NSA take it seriously."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was skeptical of such arguments by Mr. Bush and his advisers, who are in the midst of a public-relations offensive to justify the eavesdropping program.

"Their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after al Qaeda is far-fetched," the New York Democrat told reporters at a gathering of the nation's mayors. "Their argument that it's rooted in the Constitution inherently is kind of strange."

Mrs. Clinton, who is widely expected to run for president in 2008, questioned the legality of the program, which targets conversations between Americans and overseas terror suspects.

"Obviously, I support tracking down terrorists -- I think that's our obligation," she said. "But I think it can be done in a lawful way."

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, said the legalities of the program will be explored in Senate Judiciary Committee hearings scheduled to begin Feb. 6. The committee chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, yesterday outlined 15 areas of inquiry in a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who has agreed to testify.

Asked by NBC whether the president "broke the law," Mr. McCain said, "I don't know the answer. That's why I welcome the hearings. If I was sure whether it's legal or not, then I wouldn't feel that these hearings are important."

Still, Mr. McCain said the program serves a vital purpose.

"There's no American that wouldn't want us to absolutely be able to listen in on al Qaeda cells," he said. "This is a new threat, and frankly, a lot of us are very concerned."

The president was unambiguous about the legality of the program, which allows eavesdropping without a warrant.

"This terrorist surveillance program includes multiple safeguards to protect civil liberties, and it is fully consistent with our nation's laws and Constitution," he told reporters. "Federal courts have consistently ruled that a president has authority under the Constitution to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance against our enemies."

Mr. Bush suggested that some of the same people who criticized him for not doing enough to prevent the terrorist attacks of September 11 are now criticizing him for doing too much.

"Two of the hijackers who struck the Pentagon were inside the United States communicating with al Qaeda operatives overseas," he said. "But we didn't realize they were here plotting the attack until it was too late."

He added, "The 9/11 commission made clear, in this era of new dangers we must be able to connect the dots before the terrorists strike so we can stop new attacks. And this NSA program is doing just that."

In a letter sent yesterday to Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Specter said he will ask the Bush administration why it didn't seek expanded congressional authority for the program.

"Was it because you thought you couldn't get such an expansion as when you said: 'That was not something that we could likely get?' " he asks, referring to a press briefing by Mr. Gonzales in December.

Mr. Specter said he also plans to ask the Bush administration why it bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, the secretive judicial panel designed to consider issuing warrants for surveillance.

DOJ_NMG_0012099

In a separate letter, Democrats yesterday called on Mr. Bush to immediately notify Congress of the changes in current law to "permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists."

"When you concluded over four years ago that existing law did not provide you sufficient authority to conduct the program, you had an obligation to propose changes in the law to Congress," wrote Sens. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, Harry Reid of Nevada and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Also yesterday, the Senate Democratic "war room" released a "fact check" that said "there is evidence that the spying program is diverting valuable FBI resources and making America less safe."

Sen. John Cornyn, a member of the Judiciary Committee and chairman of the emerging threats and capabilities subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, chided the Democrats, asking the rhetorical question, "Are the Democrats just playing politics with national security? You decide."

The Texas Republican noted that Mr. Reid, the Senate minority leader, "has been briefed on the NSA's efforts, as have the heads of the intelligence committees in both houses of Congress. Are they now calling for the president to stop intercepting al Qaeda-related calls?"

Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

President Bush, defending the government's secret surveillance program, said Wednesday that Americans should take Osama bin Laden seriously when he says he's going to attack again.

“When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it,” Bush told reporters after visiting the top-secret National Security Agency, where the surveillance program is based. “I take it seriously, and the people of NSA take it seriously.” It was Bush's first comment about bin Laden since a tape was aired last week in which the al-Qaeda leader warned that his fighters are preparing new attacks in the USA.

Meanwhile, four leading Democratic senators sent Bush a letter Wednesday saying they support everything possible within the law to combat terrorism, but the NSA program is an “apparent violation of federal law.” The letter was signed by Sens. Harry Reid of Nevada, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Dick Durbin of Illinois and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Few soldiers seek money for body armor

Just 29 Army soldiers have sought reimbursement for body armor and other equipment they bought to protect themselves on the front lines, the Associated Press reported. It said the requests, mostly for updated ceramic body armor, total $21,000 under a repayment program begun in October. Defense Department officials said last year that the program could be costly if people pressed for reimbursement for large amounts of protective gear. “It hasn't been what we thought it would be, but we didn't have any real judgment what it would be,” said Army Maj. Paul Cucuzzella, who runs the program at Fort Meade in Maryland. Troops and their families had complained that soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan weren't getting vital pieces of body armor from the Pentagon.

Alito heads closer to confirmation

Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito accepted congratulations from Republican leaders as lawmakers moved toward confirming him in a largely party-line vote.

A few hours after the Senate debate began, Alito thanked “all of the senators who supported me and were kind enough to meet with me.”

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat and one of 22 Democrats who have announced their opposition, said Alito “will tip the balance against protecting our basic privacy and personal freedoms. He will tip the balance in favor of presidential power even when it violates the law.”

Alito, a judge of U.S. 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, has enough support from 51 Republicans and Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska to ensure his confirmation. He would replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring.

Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

In a pep talk yesterday to intelligence experts at the National Security Agency, President Bush defended eavesdropping on overseas communications to and from U.S. residents as legal and imperative to stopping terrorists.

In the latest sign of the escalating debate on the issue, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called Bush's rationale a "strange" and dangerous legal stretch.

DOJ_NMG_0012100

The conflicting views of the NSA spying program highlighted by the Bush-Clinton exchange reflect a widening divide over warrantless eavesdropping, and how leaders in both major parties are trying to shape the debate in preparation for upcoming congressional hearings and this year's elections.

Bush, whose aides said they consider the issue a clear political winner, is resurrecting tactics from the last campaign to make the NSA spying program a referendum on which party will keep the United States safe from terrorists. He has dispatched top White House officials almost daily to defend the program and has sent a message to party activists that he considers fighting terrorism with tools such as NSA eavesdropping the defining issue of the November elections.

Exhibiting an obsession to detail not seen in the Social Security rollout a year ago, the White House is even waging a war on the semantics being used in the debate, lashing out at reporters who call the program "domestic" spying, because the monitored calls involve a person overseas. It is also putting out pages of highly detailed -- and often hotly disputed -- legal analyses of the program and drawing what Democratic critics and many independent analysts regard as questionable historical parallels to show Bush is following a long wartime tradition.

Speaking to reporters, Clinton took aim at what she called a lawless assertion of power: "My question is, why can't we do what we want to do within the rule of law?"

Her comments came after an appearance at the winter meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors. Clinton, a leading contender for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, rejected Bush's argument that the president had power to order surveillance after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. She said established procedures for approval for such spying from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act would have protected civil liberties and national security.

"Their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after al Qaeda is far-fetched," Clinton said. "Their argument that it's rooted in the Constitution inherently is kind of strange because we have FISA, and FISA operated very effectively and it wasn't that hard to get their permission."

Bush staged his latest defense at NSA headquarters at Fort Meade, Md. Speaking to the code breakers, analysts and linguistic experts who help sift through the information obtained with the warrantless searches of overseas phone calls and e-mails involving at least one person in the United States, Bush called the program a "vital" defense tool.

The issue is different but the message is similar to the one many political analysts credit for Bush's 2004 victory: He can be trusted to protect U.S. citizens, and Democrats cannot. In a recent speech to the Republican National Committee, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove previewed a similar strategy for this year's elections, in which the GOP majorities in the House, Senate and governorships are at risk. When news of the NSA program broke, Bush was put on the defensive, but he and strategists quickly decided this fight could be an asset at a time when the president was struggling to regain his balance, advisers said.

"It is amazing to me -- not only are the Democrats not learning from costly policy mistakes, they are not learning what happened from the political mistakes of 2002 and 2004," said RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman.

Some Democratic strategists say the NSA program is a political loser for Democrats, whom many voters still see as soft on national security. But there is no way for elected Democrats to avoid the fight -- and few want to. With congressional hearings on the topic expected early next month, Democrats and several Republicans have serious policy differences with Bush and consider the NSA fight part of a much larger battle over presidential power and congressional oversight.

"I don't think it's bad politics," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "I don't think the national security attack works this time," he said, because "we have a politically weakened president whose poll numbers are down and whose credibility is under increased scrutiny."

Although arguments about the legality of the eavesdropping program are boiling, details about what the NSA is doing remain hidden from all but eight members of Congress: the House speaker and minority leader, the Senate majority and minority leaders, and the chairmen and ranking minority members of the House and Senate intelligence committees.

Pressed yesterday by Democratic members of the Senate intelligence committee for a closed hearing or briefing on the NSA program, Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) said he had scheduled a Feb. 1 Justice Department briefing on the legal issues involved but not on the program itself. Under Roberts's proposal, the committee will meet on Feb. 16 "to discuss the terrorist surveillance issue" but apparently will not be briefed on what it entails.

Democrats told Roberts yesterday they want a business meeting of the committee Tuesday, when they will call for a vote on whether to hold a hearing or briefing with NSA witnesses, congressional sources said.

In The Eye Of The Spying Storm (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer
The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012101

WASHINGTON — President Bush made a rare visit Wednesday to the National Security Agency, the office at the center of the controversy over warrantless eavesdropping, telling employees there: "When terrorist operatives are here in America communicating with someone overseas, we must understand what's going on."

And he urged Americans to take seriously the words of Osama bin Laden, likely the NSA's No. 1 target, in an audiotape released last week.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it," Bush said. "I take it seriously, and the people of the NSA take it seriously."

Challenging assertions that his approval of the wiretapping and inspection of e-mail violated the law, Bush said, "The American people expect me to protect their lives and their civil liberties, and that's exactly what we're doing with this program."

Bush's visit to NSA headquarters at Ft. Meade, Md. — a site once so secret that NSA was said to stand for "No Such Agency" — was part of a stepped-up campaign in recent days to gain public support for the spying program.

Earlier, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan defended Bush's decision not to ask a special court for warrants to monitor people in the United States.

"This is a time of war. This is about wartime surveillance of the enemy," McClellan said, adding a refinement of his earlier arguments: "We don't ask our commanders to go to the court and ask for approval while they're trying to gain intelligence on the enemy."

The administration contends that Bush's inherent powers as commander in chief and a congressional resolution approved after the Sept. 11 attacks, authorizing him to use all necessary force to fight terrorism, gave him the power to order domestic intelligence-gathering without getting warrants.

With the administration focused on Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the eavesdropping which are to begin Feb. 6, the panel's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), signaled the approach he would take.

He sent 15 questions to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, one of the witnesses from the executive branch.

Among the questions:

· Why didn't the administration seek the authority to conduct such surveillance when Congress passed the Patriot Act, the post-Sept. 11 expansion of anti-terrorism law?

· Didn't President Jimmy Carter's signature on the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and the statement Carter issued at the time, amount to a renunciation of presidential authority "to conduct warrantless domestic surveillance"?

· When foreign calls are made through U.S. switches, isn't such monitoring against the law or a violation of regulations that restrict the NSA from conducting surveillance inside the United States?

The last question goes to the heart of an argument McClellan has made in recent days that takes issue with calling the program "domestic spying."

The administration has said it allows the surveillance only when at least one end of the phone call or e-mail traffic is outside the United States and one person involved is a suspected terrorist.

"I think it leaves an inaccurate impression with the American people to say that this is domestic spying," McClellan said. "You don't call a flight from New York to somewhere in Afghanistan a domestic flight. It's called an international flight."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), speaking at a meeting of the nation's mayors, joined the criticism of the program, challenging Bush's contention that he has the authority to conduct the monitoring.

"Their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after Al Qaeda is far-fetched. Their argument that it's rooted in the Constitution inherently is kind of strange," Clinton said, citing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, under which she said it would not be hard to gain permission for the wiretaps.

Bush Visits Security Agency And Defends Surveillance (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — President Bush went Wednesday to the heart of the debate over the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program, the supersecret agency itself, where he sought to bolster employee morale and make a case for ordering a surveillance program that has come under increasing political attack.

"It's just such an honor to be able to tell these people that the work they do is vital and necessary, and I support them a hundred percent," Mr. Bush told reporters during a rare presidential trip to the agency at Fort Meade, Md., in the suburban sprawl between Baltimore and Washington.

Mr. Bush's trip was part of a weeklong news media offensive to push back against lawmakers who argue that the program may be illegal. Hearings into the program by the Senate Judiciary Committee are to begin next month.

Mr. Bush first met privately with employees at the agency, then told a small group of reporters who accompanied him that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda, had been a crucial tool in fighting terrorism.

"We've seen that part of the terrorist strategy is to place operatives inside of our country," the president said. "They blend in with the civilian population. They get their orders from overseas, and then they emerge to strike from within. We must be able to quickly detect when someone linked to Al Qaeda is communicating with someone inside of America."

The National Security Agency, the largest American intelligence agency, specializes in eavesdropping on foreign communications. It is so secret that for years the joke has been that its initials stood for "No Such Agency."

But its heavily guarded campus just off the Baltimore-Washington Parkway opened up a bit to the news media in recent years under the leadership of Gen. Michael V. Hayden, now the principal deputy director of national intelligence and Mr. Bush's point man on the eavesdropping program.

While the president was visiting the agency, the two parties on Capitol Hill spent the day in an exchange of dueling letters. Senate and House Democrats pressed their Republican counterparts to hold additional hearings beyond those already scheduled by the Senate Judiciary Committee, while Republicans suggested that Democrats were trying to use the issue for political advantage and jeopardizing national security.

In a letter released Wednesday to the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, all nine Democrats on the panel said that only public hearings could provide the kind of "vigorous oversight" needed to answer questions about the program.

Likewise, all seven Democratic members of the Senate Intelligence Committee urged the panel chairman to hold hearings to address, among other issues, "the legal justifications for the program."

Leading Democrats, in another letter, told Mr. Bush that they were "gravely concerned" about the eavesdropping program. Rather than going to the court that governs foreign intelligence for wiretaps warrants, the letter said, "you have apparently chosen to ignore the law." The letter was signed by four Senate Democrats — Harry Reid of Nevada, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin.

In yet another letter, Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican who leads the Intelligence Committee, fired back expressing annoyance over the Democrats' complaints.

Mr. Roberts said he was already planning a closed-door briefing for the committee by the Justice Department on Feb. 1, and another closed-door meeting related to the program two weeks after that. He suggested that Democrats had bypassed protocol by making their pleas public before giving him a chance to respond.

"I think we can all agree that intelligence issues, especially in the middle of a war, should not be used as fodder for political advantage," Mr. Roberts said. "Doing so is unnecessary, unwise and potentially dangerous."

So far, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, who leads the Judiciary Committee, is the only Republican to commit to a public hearing on the N.S.A. program. It is scheduled for Feb. 6 with testimony from Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

But in a letter to Mr. Specter, Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who sits on the Judiciary Committee, said the committee should seek testimony from other former administration officials who may have had misgivings about the program, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft and James B. Comey, the former deputy attorney general. If necessary, Mr. Schumer said, the committee should subpoena the former officials to testify.

The New York Times reported this month that Mr. Comey refused to reauthorize the continuation of the N.S.A. program in 2004, prompting senior White House officials to visit Mr. Ashcroft in a hospital after an attack of pancreatitis to press for his agreement. He was also said to have voiced concerns about the program. The episode led to the suspension of the program for months.

Mr. Specter said Friday that he was already considering calling other witnesses beyond Mr. Gonzales.

Spying By Another Name (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WITH POLLS SHOWING THE American public increasingly skeptical about the need to abridge core constitutional freedoms to wage the war on terrorism, the Bush administration launched a major PR offensive this week to justify its decision to conduct warrantless wiretapping within the United States. The White House deserves credit for at least making its case. Unfortunately for the president, it's a weak case, and repetition doesn't make it any better.

Indeed, the administration's marketing team may be more adept than its legal theorists. All White House references to the National Security Agency's eavesdropping now call it a "terrorist surveillance program." That sounds far less objectionable than the media's blanket term, "domestic spying program." After all, it's hard to support domestic spying, but who wants to oppose "terrorist surveillance"? Maybe the Los Angeles Police Department could suspend the 4th Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches by launching a "criminal surveillance program."

Semantics aside, the administration's legal case remains wobbly, which may explain President Bush's churlish attitude toward his critics. On Wednesday, Bush defended the need for the program at NSA headquarters in Maryland. "Now, I understand there's some in America who say, well, this can't be true that there are still people willing to attack," he said. He then referred to Osama bin Laden's latest threatening audiotape.

Get it? The president is equating concerns about the legality of bypassing the courts to obtain a warrant to eavesdrop on Americans with a lack of appreciation for the threats posed by Al Qaeda. In Bush's world, only appeasers stand up for the Constitution.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which created courts that act quickly and secretly to approve such requests for wiretaps, remains a sensible law. It strikes the proper balance between the need for judicial oversight and the requirements of national security — and helps to ensure that the government does not trample on individual liberty. These courts are extremely accommodating to government requests, which sometimes needn't be supported until after the wiretapping has taken place.

In a long letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales said that the FISA law itself allows for the possibility that Congress could authorize electronic surveillance in another statute, and argued that the post-Sept. 11 congressional authorization "to use all necessary force" in response to the terrorist attacks is just such a statute. For anyone who feels it's a stretch to think that Congress meant to suspend basic 4th Amendment principles by supporting military action against the Taliban and Al Qaeda, Gonzales is quick to point out that warrantless wiretapping also took place in the Civil War.

The administration is also de-emphasizing the fact that the eavesdropping is taking place on American soil by pointing out that it is only targeting communications that involve one party outside the United States. This is irrelevant as a legal matter. And as a practical matter, it's not entirely true. Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who led the NSA in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks and is now the nation's second-ranking intelligence official, conceded on Monday that some purely domestic communications might be accidentally wiretapped under the program.

Senate hearings on the NSA program are scheduled to begin Feb. 6. They could prove interesting if GOP senators opt to cast themselves as defenders of the Constitution, and not of their president.

U.S. Must Submit Papers To Moussaoui Team (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal judge has ordered the government to give admitted terrorist conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense team documents describing what officials knew before Sept. 11, 2001, about al-Qaeda threats and some of its hijackers.

With a trial to determine Moussaoui's sentence set to begin next month, U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema granted part of a Jan. 20 defense motion for documents without waiting for the government's response.

"Several of the categories of information are so critical to the issues in this case that the court can address some of the requests without a response," Brinkema wrote. "Moreover, given the increasingly shortening time before the start of the trial, discovery issues must be resolved quickly."

Granted Tuesday under seal, her order was released Wednesday after government censors blacked out about five lines of it.

She ordered the government to immediately turn over any threat assessments, especially those completed in the year before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Defense attorneys also will get all reports, cables, slides, talking points, memos and other documents about Moussaoui's arrest a month before the attacks and about two Sept. 11 hijackers, Khalid al-Mihdahar and Nawaf al-Hazmi, whose presence in the United States was known to federal officials before the attacks.

That data clearly was sought by the defense for use in the first part of the upcoming court proceeding, in which prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaeda's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings.

The defense will argue that agents had more information about the plot than Moussaoui could provide but still could not prevent the attacks. If the jury disagrees with prosecutors, Moussaoui will receive life in prison. If jurors agree with prosecutors, they will decide whether he should be executed.

Brinkema also ordered that she be given both an unclassified and a classified version of a CIA inspector general report. Defense attorneys already have seen the unclassified version, but Brinkema said she wanted to determine for herself that the deletions from the original were appropriate.

A 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent, Moussaoui is the only person who has been charged in the United States as part of the Sept. 11 al-Qaeda attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Last April, he pleaded guilty to six conspiracy charges, but insisted he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot. However, he said he was taking flight lessons to prepare to hijack a 747 jet later and fly it into the White House if the U.S. government refused to release a radical Egyptian cleric serving a life term for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and 1995 plots against New York landmarks.

Moussaoui was in custody in Minnesota on immigration violations when the hijacked jets crashed on Sept. 11.

Copyright 2006 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

WASHINGTON Judge Orders Release Of Pre-9/11 Attack Assessments (SCRIPPS)

By GREG GORDON, McClatchy Newspapers

Scripps Howard, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge has ordered the government to turn over to Zacarias Moussaoui's defense lawyers pre-Sept. 11 documents assessing the threat of an al Qaeda attack, calling the material "critical" to his upcoming trial, it was disclosed Wednesday.

It could not immediately be determined whether the ruling by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema of Alexandria, Va., will create a significant, 11th-hour snag over protection of classified data in the only U.S. prosecution to stem from the suicide hijackings.

The ruling could create a legal showdown, for example, if it requires intelligence agencies to produce classified information that they consider too sensitive to release, even to defense lawyers with government security clearances.

Jury selection is set to begin on Feb. 6, with opening arguments slated for March 6 in a sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts last April, should live or die.

Defense lawyers asked the court last week to compel the government to release the intelligence assessments and an array of other documents shedding light about what U.S. counter-terrorism officials knew of al Qaeda's plans before the attack.

Brinkema said in her ruling, issued Tuesday and made public Wednesday in declassified form, that the intelligence assessments are "highly relevant" to the case.

She also ruled that the defense is entitled to copies of additional material surrounding the Minnesota arrest and investigation of Moussaoui and the government's tracking of two suicide hijackers who slipped into the United States in early 2000.

Moussaoui, who was arrested while learning to fly a jumbo jet at a Twin Cities flight school, has denied knowing details of the Sept. 11 plot despite his guilty plea.

Prosecutors contend that Moussaoui should be sentenced to die because he lied when he was interrogated by Minneapolis FBI and immigration agents after his arrest on Aug. 16, 2001, and failed to disclose his role in the hijacking conspiracy. They say they will prove beyond a reasonable doubt that if he had revealed the plot, the government would have been able to stop the attack or limit the toll of nearly 3,000 deaths when hijacked planes slammed into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and the Pennsylvania countryside.

Defense lawyers sought the pre-Sept. 11 records for the first phase of the two-stage trial, when a jury will be asked to determine whether he is eligible for a death sentence. Moussaoui's lawyers argue that counter-terrorism officials overlooked clues and made so many other missteps before the attacks that they never would have thwarted the attacks, even if Moussaoui had told them all he knew.

If the government complies with Brinkema's ruling, it could give defense lawyers new ammunition in their efforts to show that U.S. counter-terrorism agencies and national security officials knew more about the suicide hijacking scheme than Moussaoui did, and that his assistance wouldn't have changed the outcome. The threat assessments presumably were reviewed by the Sept. 11 Commission, which said in its public report in 2004 that U.S. intelligence agencies received a stream of warnings in the spring and summer of 2001 that al Qaeda was planning "something very, very, very big"

If the government fails to produce the records, Brinkema could issue a sanction, such as dismissing the case. In that event, prosecutors could ask an appeals court to intervene in the case for a third time or drop the charges. Even if the government scuttled the case, Moussaoui would face a minimum sentence of life in prison without parole.

The four-year-old case has been delayed repeatedly by legal tangles over classified information, though the 28-year-old federal Classified Information Procedures Act offers methods for moving ahead by using substitute language to shield national security secrets.

A Justice Department official declined to comment on Brinkema's ruling.

"I won't discuss it under any circumstances," said Edward MacMahon, a lawyer for Moussaoui.

Al-Arian's Attorneys Want Off The Case (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

TAMPA -- Defense attorneys for Sami Al-Arian asked a federal judge to let them off the case if prosecutors retry the former college professor on charges of aiding terrorists.

While federal prosecutors are deciding whether to retry nine mistrial counts on Al-Arian, attorneys Linda Moreno and Bill Moffitt are asking to withdraw from the case. A hearing is scheduled for Friday.

"We gave everything we had, and I'm too exhausted to give anymore," Moffitt, an attorney for the law firm Cozen O'Connor in Washington, said Tuesday.

Moreno, who works for a civil litigation firm in Tampa, declined to comment.

Al-Arian's wife, Nahla, said her husband was looking for other attorneys but had yet to find replacements.

After six months of trial jurors failed to return a single guilty verdict against Al-Arian and three co-defendants. Al-Arian was found not guilty on eight counts but the jury deadlocked on the nine others. Two of the defendants were acquitted of all the charges.

The four were charged with raising money for terrorist attacks by the Palestinian Islamic Jihad in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek told the court that if the case is retried, his team will need until June to present "a streamlined case," which should take about two months to present to a jury.

Two Get Prison In Exports To Syria, Libya (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

DALLAS — Two brothers convicted of sending exports from their U.S. company to countries considered sponsors of terrorism were sentenced Wednesday to federal prison, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Hazim Elashi was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison and will be deported after serving his sentence. His brother Ihsan "Sammy" Elashi was given a six-year term, which will run consecutively to the four-year sentence he is currently serving.

Hazim and Ihsan Elashi, their three brothers and their company were convicted in 2004 on charges of making illegal technology shipments to Libya and Syria.

The Elashis ran InfoCom Corp., a Richardson firm that did up to $5 million in business a year selling computers and Internet services to mostly customers in the Middle East. Prosecutors say they shipped computer products to Libya and Syria from 1997 to 2000, violating a ban on exporting technology, goods or software to countries the U.S. government lists as state sponsors of terrorism.

Agents from the FBI investigated InfoCom for years and raided the business the week before the Sept. 11 terror attacks. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the original indictments against the brothers, calling it part of a campaign against "the financiers of terror."

The men also were involved in the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a Muslim charity that was closed after the Treasury Department accused it of being a front for the militant group Hamas.

Bayan Elashi, Ghassan Elashi and Basman Elashi have not been sentenced on the exporting charges.

Lawsuit Filed In Support Of Muslim Scholar Barred From U.S. (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Citing the case of a prominent Muslim scholar who has been barred from the United States, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking to strike down a clause of the USA Patriot Act that bars foreigners who endorse terrorism from entering to this country.

The suit was filed in Federal District Court in Manhattan on behalf of the scholar, Tariq Ramadan, and three national organizations of academics or writers who have invited him to speak to their members. The groups, including the American Academy of Religion, the leading American organization of scholars of religion, say Mr. Ramadan has never expressed support for terrorism. They also argue that the Patriot Act clause has been applied to stifle academic debate in the United States.

Mr. Ramadan, a Swiss citizen, has been denied a United States visa since July 2004, when he was on the verge of moving with his family to Indiana to take up a tenured professor's position at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame.

In a telephone interview from Oxford University in England, where he is currently a visiting professor, Mr. Ramadan said he had never had an explanation why his visa was revoked, after he had been approved to teach at Notre Dame and had been a frequent traveler to the United States for many years.

"It's clear there is nothing in my record supporting terrorism," Mr. Ramadan said.

Speaking to reporters in August 2004, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, Russ Knocke, cited the Patriot Act clause as the reason that Mr. Ramadan's visa was canceled. The clause, adopted when the act was passed in 2001 and amended last May, bars foreigners who "endorse or espouse terrorist activity or persuade others" to support terrorism.

The author of some 20 books on Islamic theology and the place of Muslims in the Western world, Mr. Ramadan, 43, is an outspoken critic of the Bush administration's policies in the Middle East. He has also rejected Muslim terrorism, calling it "anti-Islam." Last August, he was invited by Prime Minister Tony Blair to participate in a task force to counter extremism after the London bombings in July.

The A.C.L.U., joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him. The American Association of University Professors and the PEN American Center are also plaintiffs.

After Notre Dame applied a second time for a visa for Mr. Ramadan and he waited for five months with no response, Mr. Ramadan resigned in December 2004 from his position there. R. Scott Appleby, the director of the Kroc center, said the government never gave an explanation to the university. Notre Dame saw Mr. Ramadan as a theologian who could help build ties between Middle Eastern Muslims and the West, Mr. Appleby said.

Mr. Ramadan filed a new visa application on Sept. 16, after receiving about 40 invitations for speaking engagements in the United States over the past year. Interviewed in December in Bern, Switzerland, by agents of the Homeland Security and State Departments, Mr. Ramadan said he was mainly questioned about his views of the war in Iraq.

"I told them what I have said many times publicly, that I think the war was a mistake and illegal," he said. "Even the United Nations has said that. I think the resistance is legitimate but the means they are using are not."

A State Department spokeswoman, Janelle Hironimus, confirmed Mr. Ramadan's 2005 visa application but said the department did not comment on pending visa or legal matters.

Mr. Knocke of the Department of Homeland Security also declined comment on the suit or Mr. Ramadan's status. But he noted that the criteria for revoking visas included "public safety and national security risks," among others.

"We have a strong commitment and clear responsibility to restore integrity to our immigration system, which includes preventing people who might present risks from entering the country," Mr. Knocke said.

The controversy about Mr. Ramadan's ideas arises in part because he is the grandson of Hasan al-Banna, a founder in 1928 of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Egyptian group that has turned to violent attacks in recent decades. Some critics say that he speaks with two voices, espousing moderate views in Europe but embracing more militant ideas when he addresses Muslims in the Arabic world.

Barbara DeConcini, the executive director of the American Academy of Religion, described Mr. Ramadan as "one of the most respected scholars of Islam working today."

He was invited to give a keynote address at the group's annual meeting in November, Ms. DeConcini said, but without a visa he was limited to giving a lecture to a small audience by videoconference, which she called a poor substitute for his participation in the group's discussions. He has been invited to address the next annual meeting, she said.

While the government has the authority to exclude terrorists, Ms. DeConcini said, the Patriot Act clause "is being used much more broadly to censor and manipulate academic and political debate."

Mr. Ramadan said the ban had damaged him professionally, and the disruption had been jarring to his wife and children. He said he has not been offered another tenured university position.

U.S. Sued Over Islam Expert's Visa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Three scholarly organizations sued the federal government over its 2004 decision to revoke a visa granted to a European expert on Islam, preventing him from taking a faculty position at the University of Notre Dame.

The lawsuit, on behalf of Tariq Ramadan, a visiting scholar at Oxford University and critic of U.S. policy in Iraq, intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the U.S.'s security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and U.S. scholars. A Department of Homeland Security spokesman and a State Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in New York City to declare unconstitutional a portion of the Patriot Act that denies entry on the grounds of "ideological exclusion" to those who have endorsed or espoused terrorist activity or who have persuaded others to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0012107

"There is simply no evidence" of Mr. Ramadan supporting terrorism, said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the American Academy of Religion, one of the plaintiff groups.

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Says Patriot Act Excludes Muslim Scholar From U.S. (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 25, 2006

NEW YORK – The ACLU sued the federal government Wednesday for blocking a Muslim scholar from entering the United States, arguing that the government should not use anti-terrorism laws as "instruments of censorship."

The lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union in U.S. District Court sought to open the way for Tariq Ramadan, a Swiss intellectual and Muslim scholar, to accept invitations to speak to audiences in the United States.

Ramadan was blocked from accepting a tenured teaching position at the University of Notre Dame when his visa was revoked in August 2004 because of a provision of the Patriot Act, said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU staff attorney.

Jaffer said the provision blocks entry into the United States by any prominent alien who has used his status to endorse or espouse terrorism or to persuade others to endorse or espouse terrorist activity.

"We don't think there's any evidence at all that he has endorsed terrorism," Jaffer said. "In fact, there is overwhelming evidence that he has condemned terrorism."

Academic Groups Suing To Stop U.S. From Denying Visas To Scholars Based On Their Political Views (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Three academic groups, backed by the American Civil Liberties Union, sued the Bush administration Wednesday to stop it from barring foreign scholars from the United States based on their political views.

The lawsuit seeks to overturn the government's use of the so-called "ideological exclusion" provision of the USA Patriot Act, which the Bush administration cited in revoking a visa for Tariq Ramadan, a prominent Islamic scholar, in August 2004.

Ramadan has sought to reconcile the Islamic and Western worlds and was offered a teaching position at the University of Notre Dame. His case has become a symbol for concerns over restrictions on academic freedom.

"If the instance of Ramadan is any indication, we are concerned about scholars ... who may be prevented from coming to speak with us, to meet with us," said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the Georgia-based American Academy of Religion, which invited him to speak at its annual conference in 2004.

The group, which calls itself the world's largest association of scholars of religion, rarely takes stands on public policy issues. "It was important for us to step up to the plate," DeConcini said.

Megan Gaffney, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, said she had no comment on the lawsuit.

It was filed by the ACLU on behalf of the religion group, the American Association of University Professors and the literary group PEN American Center.

Many scholars are expressing concern that security restrictions invoked in the name of fighting terrorism have constricted academic debate on controversial issues.

Knight Ridder reported last month that the State Department has been using ideological litmus tests in a program that sends American experts overseas to represent the United States, weeding out critics of the Iraq war. The department denied it was doing so.

In the last two years, the government also has barred 61 Cuban scholars who were to have attended a 2004 conference, and Dora Maria Tellez, a Nicaraguan scholar and former minister of health.

"The government has resurrected a practice that existed during the Cold War of excluding people because of their views" and is manipulating immigration laws to do so, said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU staff attorney.

The Bush administration has never fully explained its decision to revoke Ramadan's visa days before he was to come to the United States.

Russ Knocke, a Department of Homeland Security spokesman, said at the time that the decision was based on "public safety or national security interests."

DOJ_NMG_0012108

A provision of the Patriot Act, amended last May, allows the government to exclude a foreigner who's found to "endorse or espouse terrorist activity or persuade others to endorse or espouse terrorist activity or support a terrorist organization," according to the lawsuit. The suit seeks to invalidate that provision.

Ramadan's many defenders say that, although he's been highly critical of the Bush administration's foreign policy, he has condemned terrorism.

Ramadan, a Swiss citizen, was invited by British Prime Minister Tony Blair last year to join a government task force on the sources of extremism in Britain.

Critics, including analyst Daniel Pipes, say Ramadan's been much more equivocal on the issue of terrorism. Pipes called Ramadan "Islamist royalty" in an article because his grandfather, Hassan Banna, founded the Muslim Brotherhood, the Middle East's oldest Islamist group.

Ramadan reapplied for a U.S. visa but was told last month that it could take almost two years to get an answer, the suit says.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ACLU Decries 'Spying On Georgians' By Feds, Locals (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2006

In the name of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government and police agencies from the federal to the local level have been spying on Georgia anti-war rallies, peace and social action groups, and even a vegan protest, the state legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged Wednesday.

Documents and surveillance photos obtained by the ACLU through a Freedom of Information Act request reveal a pattern of "spying on Georgians who are our friends and neighbors, and are leading lawful lives," attorney Gerald Weber said at a chilly morning news conference Wednesday outside the Georgia Homeland Security offices in downtown Atlanta.

"We have just seen the tip of the iceberg, but it's clear that citizens throughout Georgia have been spied upon by their own government," said Weber. "It's clearly an intimidation process."

"Many of us remember the days of J.Edgar Hoover, and this is another reminder," said state Rep. Nan Grogan Orrock (D-Atlanta). "If excessive power is not challenged, it can and will lead to abuse of power."

Officials from state and federal Homeland Security offices did not respond to requests for comment Wednesday.

Weber said some of the documents involve the National Security Agency, whose surveillance program has come under fire since it was disclosed in December by NBC News. That program, approved by President Bush, allowed the agency to eavesdrop, without warrants, on communications within the United States.

Weber said the released documents from a classified Pentagon database of suspicious people revealed that two local protests by the pacifist group Georgia Peace and Justice Coalition were monitored by federal agents last spring. The demonstrators were termed a "credible threat" in the documents. The surveillance was done at a meeting at the Piedmont Drive Quaker headquarters and at a vigil at an Atlanta Army recruiting station on Ponce de Leon Avenue.

"Why is our government spying on us?" asked Coalition organizer Ann Mauney. "While not the terrorist threat that the Bush administration claims as a rationale for all its surveillance, we are indeed a threat to the Bush administration's policies ... spying by the government has long been the first line of attack on citizens who challenge those in power."

A special agent at the FBI press office in Washington who would not give her name said the FBI "investigates groups or individuals when we have information or allegations of federal law being broken. We do not investigate groups or persons exercising their constitutional right of protest or dissent."

Other local organizations that complained of being targeted by surveillance include two other anti-war organizations, Atlanta Refuse and Resist and WAND (Women's Action for New Directions); a media watchdog group, the Atlanta Independent Media Center; and even a group of Georgians who eat only plants.

Vegan Caitlin Childs recounted Wednesday how she was detained for close to two hours last September for writing down the license plate number of a plainclothes DeKalb Homeland Security officer taking pictures of her and five others picketing outside a HoneyBaked Ham store on Buford Highway just before Christmas 2003.

"I was handing out fliers and couldn't help noticing the unmarked [police] car ... I wanted to know who was taking our pictures," Childs said.

A handout provided by Weber included copies of 20 photos taken by DeKalb Homeland Security of Childs and the other vegan protesters.

DOJ_NMG_0012109

DeKalb's director of Homeland Security, Moses Ector, declined to discuss it. "We understand they have filed an intent to sue, so it's now a legal issue. Whatever I might say could come back to haunt us for years in that case, so I can't make any comment," said Ector.

The Associated Press contributed to this article.

ACLU Releases Documents It Says Show Government Spied On Georgians (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

ATLANTA - The American Civil Liberties Union has released two documents from the FBI and DeKalb County Homeland Security related to an anti-war protest and a vegan protest that it says show those agencies spied on Georgia residents.

The ACLU's Gerry Weber said during a news conference in Atlanta Wednesday that the documents are part of a case the group is building that will show that officials at all levels of government are doing surveillance of government critics.

Weber says so far the ACLU has received complaints from six organizations and nearly two dozen people who fear they have been spied upon, photographed, videotaped or had their events infiltrated by government agents.

He says none of them did anything that would justify surveillance but rather are critics of the Bush administration.

Democratic State Representative Nan Orrock of Atlanta says Congress must check what she calls the government's excessive power.

The leader of an umbrella pacifist organization -- the Georgia Peace and Justice Coalition -- says her group is the one that organized two Atlanta peace events cited in a Defense Department database as ``credible threats'' to the Pentagon.

The coalition's Ann Mauney says spying is the government's first line of attack in trying to silence those who dissent.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter says all FBI investigations are conducted in response to information that the people being investigated were involved in or might have information about crimes.

A Mountain Of Documents On Hurricane Response, But Democrats Seek More (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — In their four months of digging, House and Senate investigators have collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents and testimony from governors, mayors, Homeland Security and Pentagon officials and dozens of others touched by Hurricane Katrina.

To the Republican leaders of the two committees, the mountains of still-accumulating evidence are sufficient to answer questions about why the government did not do more to prevent a well-predicted disaster scenario from turning into a catastrophe.

Democrats say crucial holes still remain, particularly related to what senior White House aides and the president knew, and how they reacted to this knowledge, right before the storm and after it.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut and other Democrats on the investigative committees say they are not looking for a smoking-gun document implicating the White House. Instead, they say, they are trying to resolve contradictions and questions that have come up.

"What do they have to hide?" Representative Gene Taylor, Democrat of Mississippi, said in a telephone interview on Wednesday. "Why don't they just come forward and say, 'This is what we knew, when we knew, and this is how we reacted?' "

The White House said on Tuesday that it would deny requests for e-mail and other correspondence among top White House aides, including the chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr. and the homeland security adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend.

In September, speaking in New Orleans, President Bush vowed to "work with members of both parties to make sure this effort is thorough," and his aides say he has done that.

"There are some 120 administration officials that have been made available to the committees for interviews or for hearings," Scott McClellan, Mr. Bush's press secretary, said Wednesday, adding that 15,000 pages of White House documents were provided. "We believe they're getting the information they need to do their job."

Yet certain questions remain. Michael Brown, the former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, testified to the House committee that he repeatedly e-mailed or spoke on the telephone to Mr. Bush, Mr. Card and Mr. Card's deputy, starting Saturday and Sunday before the hurricane struck.

Asked what kind of aid he requested, Mr. Brown replied, "I'm being advised by counsel that I can't discuss with you my conversations with the president's chief of staff and the president."

Documents uncovered during the investigation show that the White House was notified early Monday, hours before the storm hit later that morning, that it was probable that Hurricane Katrina would "lead to severe flooding and/or levee breaching," adding, "This could leave the New Orleans metro area submerged for weeks or months."

DOJ_NMG_0012110

That night, after the storm passed, a report sent to the White House warned of a quarter-mile breach "in the levee near the 17th Street Canal" and that "an estimated 2/3 to 75 percent of the city is underwater."

Yet Mr. Bush and the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, in interviews after the storm hit, said they never expected the levees to be breached. They said that after the storm had passed Monday, they were convinced that the city had survived without catastrophic damage.

"There was a sense of relaxation," Mr. Bush said at a news conference in New Orleans on Sept. 12, recounting his reaction. "I was listening to people, probably over the airways, say, the bullet has been dodged."

Mr. Lieberman wants to know more about how the White House could have felt it was appropriate to relax.

"That is central to the investigation," Mr. Lieberman said in an interview Wednesday.

A closed-door briefing provided to investigators by Ken Rapuano, Mr. Bush's deputy domestic security adviser, did not resolve these and other discrepancies, Mr. Taylor said.

At the briefing, Mr. Rapuano acknowledged that the government's response was deeply flawed, participants said. But when asked about the involvement of Mr. Bush, Mr. Card or Ms. Townsend, he also declined to offer details, saying, "I am really not here to discuss specific information that was passed to the president," according to a written summary of the briefing prepared by Democratic staff members.

"It was as shallow and phony a presentation by the administration as they possible could conceive," Mr. Taylor said, adding that he walked out in frustration.

Democrats also said that the documents provided by the White House consisted largely of news conference transcripts or e-mail sent to many people, instead of correspondence disclosing the decision-making process at the White House.

But Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, said that based on what his committee had, he was convinced that the report would be complete.

"The Select Committee has all the information we need to fulfill our duties and produce a comprehensive, fair, no-holds-barred report about the failures in response to Hurricane Katrina," Mr. Davis said Tuesday.

Mr. Lieberman said Wednesday that he realized it was unlikely he could get the information he wanted by threatening to subpoena. Even if one were issued, the administration would probably fight it in court.

Mr. McClellan all but invited such a response Wednesday.

"The president believes that Senator Lieberman ought to have the right to confidential conversations with his advisers, just like all presidents have asserted they ought to have that same right," he said. "That's what this is about."

Rejection Of Building Plan Causes Dismay In Louisiana (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 25 — The White House decision to withhold support from a major Congressional reconstruction plan left Louisiana officials expressing bewilderment on Wednesday over what they characterized as the lack of a workable alternative from the Bush administration.

Congress has appropriated $6.2 billion in reconstruction aid, but officials say that is not enough to meet housing needs.

"The White House simply needs to tell us what their plan is," Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Wednesday at a news conference in Baton Rouge. "We don't see an adequate plan. You can't fix a $12 billion problem with $6 billion."

Other estimates have put the reconstruction cost much higher, with some going as high as $80 billion.

With whole neighborhoods in ruins nearly five months after Hurricane Katrina, officials of both political parties had lined up behind the Congressional reconstruction plan, which would have set up a federal agency to buy out flooded homeowners, cleaned up the land and sold it to builders.

Planners and officials had described the proposal, by Representative Richard H. Baker, Republican of Louisiana, as the best hope for avoiding what is starting to occur, islets of rebuilding in seas of destruction.

A measure setting up the agency, the Louisiana Reconstruction Corporation, was approved by the House Financial Services Committee before Congress adjourned last month. White House officials told Mr. Baker on Monday, however, that they would not support his bill.

He joined Ms. Blanco at the news conference on Wednesday.

Thousands of homeowners remain in limbo. Officials here say the storm destroyed or damaged more than 200,000 houses.

Emerging from the officials' statements on Wednesday was a sharp disagreement with the White House over the state's needs. Although Mr. Baker and Ms. Blanco described a sight that has become grimly familiar to residents, block after block of ruined houses, the administration has begun to concentrate on a much smaller picture of destruction.

Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, spoke this week of helping homeowners who lacked flood insurance because they were not in the federally designated flood plain, a number that comes to 20,000, an aide said. The $6.2 billion in block grants for Louisiana will be enough to help them, Mr. Powell said.

Louisiana state officials say that number understates the problem, failing to include tens of thousands of other homeowners whose houses were destroyed .

"Our count indicates far in excess of 200,000," Mr. Baker said. "What happened to the other 185,00?"

Administration officials have suggested that Louisiana follow Mississippi's lead in providing grants to homeowners. Ms. Blanco, a Democrat, rejected that approach on Wednesday, saying the state did not have enough money for it.

Representative Bobby Jindal, a Republican from New Orleans suburbs, also said 20,000 homeowners represented a significant understatement.

"I very strongly disagree with their methodology in terms of the final numbers," Mr. Jindal said.

Administration objections to Mr. Baker's bill centered on two aspects, Mr. Powell suggested. The bill would add a federal bureaucracy and set up what would be a government real estate agency, "which we don't think is a good business," said Mr. Powell, a former chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The cost of Mr. Baker's plan— he and an aide used figures from $30 billion to $80 billion — prompted wariness, too. Old suspicions about how Louisiana spends its money have not disappeared.

Mr. Powell has all but put state officials on notice that close watch will be kept on the Community Development Block Grant money.

"I think it's important for Louisiana to spend this money in a very prudent and wise manner," he said on Tuesday.

That was echoed by an administration supporter on a rebuilding committee, Donald T. Bollinger, a shipbuilder, who said, "I think we have to demonstrate to Congress and the president that we are going to handle our C.D.B.G. grants responsibly."

Mr. Bollinger, a major fund-raiser for President Bush, was not so pessimistic about the rejection of Mr. Baker's plan.

"Everybody wants to think that if the Baker bill fails we have no other solution," he said. "I don't agree with that at all. I know we need a tool similar to that."

More typical of the disappointment was a statement by Walter Isaacson, a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, created by Governor Blanco.

"We tried to have a prudent plan that was a way to build a safer city," Mr. Isaacson said. "This undercuts us, and undercuts the credibility of a president when he says he wants New Orleans to be able to rebuild itself."

Bush Eyes Grants, Not Agency, For La. Recovery (REU-Y2)

By Kristin Roberts

Reuters, January 26, 2006

The White House on Wednesday opposed a plan from a Louisiana Republican to create a federal agency to buy homes destroyed by recent Gulf Coast hurricanes, saying grants to state governments were a better approach.

The Bush administration said it was concerned about creating an outside entity to funnel federal money into housing redevelopment, and instead allocated $11.5 billion in previously approved funds to states hurt by the 2005 storms.

"We believe a more direct, better approach is to provide assistance directly to the local communities so that they can get that to the people through things like a Community Development Block Grant," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

But the Bush administration's rejection of Louisiana Rep. Richard Baker (news, bio, voting record)'s proposal was criticized by some government officials in Louisiana, which with Mississippi suffered most of the damage from hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma last year.

A group representing mortgage bankers also said President George W. Bush had yet to offer an alternative that was comparable to the plan proposed in Baker's legislation to create the Louisiana Recovery Corp.

"We'll really pay attention to the State of the Union address because we'll be anxious to see what the president is going to propose as a plan for rebuilding those devastated areas," said Kurt Pfotenhauer, senior vice president of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association.

"It's clear that some plan has to be in place in order to spur the investment of private capital."

Pfotenhauer said he expects to see an increase in property abandonment and foreclosures over the coming months as people in the Gulf region are unable to make mortgage payments on homes that were destroyed or damaged by the storms.

Baker's legislation, already approved by a House committee, would create a corporation to buy and redevelop tracts of land devastated by the hurricanes, helping property owners in Louisiana avoid defaults on home and business loans.

The bill would redirect $17 billion in previously approved funds to pay for rebuilding in Louisiana, including $13 billion in Community Development Block Grant money.

The corporation would take over destroyed properties at the request of owners and pay off lenders. Under the legislation, the U.S. Treasury Department could sell bonds to pay for the corporation's property purchases.

"If there truly is a better way, then we should ask to see it, and I will help lead the fight to get it done," Baker said in a prepared statement. "But if there isn't, or if other plans prove unfair or ineffective, then we should not accept that this matter is settled."

Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby, an Alabama Republican, said he would hold hearings on the proposal.

"It's an ambitious program," he said. "We'll look at it real thoroughly; that's what hearings are for."

GRANT APPROACH

The U.S. Housing and Urban Development Department on Wednesday afternoon set distribution levels for $11.5 billion in grants authorized under a bill Bush signed in December.

Louisiana will receive $6.21 billion in grants -- the statutory maximum. Mississippi will receive $5.06 billion and another $231.8 million in grants will be sent to three other states affected by the storms.

"This program allows states' leaders -- who are closest to the people -- to decide exactly how this grant money should be spent," said Donald Powell, a former bank regulator who took over as coordinator for the federal government's Gulf Coast rebuilding effort.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said the grant funds were a "good step."

"The question that I'm going to raise is, are the dollars enough to really stand up our economy," he said.

Katrina Aid Falls Short, Blanco Says Grant To Give $6.2 Billion For La. Areas (USAT)

By Oren Dorell And Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Storm-ravaged areas of Louisiana will get $6.2 billion in federal relief funds in a controversial plan that recommends giving the money to a small fraction of homeowners affected by the storm.

Donald Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, suggested that money from the government's funding grant, announced Wednesday, be doled out to roughly 20,000 homeowners who weren't in a flood zone and did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit. State officials must draw up plans for disbursing the money and get federal approval. Louisiana officials had proposed a far more ambitious $30 billion initiative to rebuild ruined areas and said the government's relief effort would exclude at least 140,000 homes.

“It simply will not work,” said Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, adding that she won't use the money as the White House recommends. “We are not in the business of choosing between our citizens.”

Powell told reporters the money should go to homeowners without flood insurance who lived outside the area where federal officials thought flooding would occur. Under that proposal, homeowners who lived inside the flood zone and did not buy flood insurance would not be eligible for the federal funds.

Four other states affected by Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma also will get relief money from the grant, Powell said. Alabama will receive $74 million; Florida, $83 million; Mississippi, $5.1 billion; and Texas, $74 million.

Areas that were severely hit by the storm, including large portions of New Orleans and nearly all of St. Bernard Parish, would be excluded from the compensation plan.

Blanco spoke at a news conference in Baton Rouge with Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., architect of a proposal for the federal government to buy and later resell damaged homes. The White House rejected the plan, but Baker said Wednesday, “I've had inquiries from the House and the Senate in the last 48 hours for more information on the bill.” He said he has passed bills before that initially were rejected by the White House.

Blanco said she appreciates the government's effort, but “they've almost designed this as a prescription for failure. … They gave us a ladder but took away the top two rungs.”

In Mississippi, where 65,000 homes were left uninhabitable by the storm, authorities expect to be ready to accept applications for federal funds from homeowners in about a month, said Scott Hamilton, spokesman for the Mississippi Development Authority.

Mississippi plans to spend about $4 billion on homeowner assistance and the rest on public works, transportation and economic development. People who accept federal money will have to abide by new, stricter building codes and new Federal Emergency Management Agency flood maps, which might mean they will have to elevate their homes to rebuild, Hamilton said.

Powell said the government is leaving the door open for more money, should the grant not be enough.

'Chocolate' Aftertaste: Bittersweet, Indeed (WP)

By Wil Haygood

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin blew into the original Chocolate City yesterday. Everywhere he goes these days, there seem to be things to explain, his words and comments tossed about as if, well, in yet another hurricane.

"Everything I say gets zoomed in on," sighs Nagin, in town to attend the winter meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors at the Capital Hilton. "I don't get what all the fuss was about when I talked about New Orleans being a chocolate city. I mean, I understand the frustration with my 'God' comments. Maybe I went a little overboard. But Chocolate City? Come on."

In the aftermath of the horrific Hurricane Katrina, the mayor has been richly and routinely quotable.

He said, "How do I make sure New Orleans is not overrun with Mexican workers?"

He said to federal officials, whom he criticized for a feeble response to Katrina, "Get off your asses."

He said, "Surely, God is mad at New Orleans. He sent us hurricane after hurricane after hurricane, and it's destroyed and put stress on the country."

And he said, of God, "But surely he is upset at black America also."

And he said that New Orleans will be a "Chocolate City" again.

The Chocolate City reference, Nagin has explained, exploded when he did not mean it to. The term was widely used by Washington's black radio announcers in the early '70s and referred proudly to the city's majority-black status and its prominent place in the black cultural scene. It gained wider recognition as the title of a 1975 album by the funk band Parliament.

Before Katrina, New Orleans was 67 percent black. Nagin says he was appealing to those evacuated to come back to a welcoming New Orleans. But there were those who believed his comment could be interpreted to mean that whites were no longer wanted.

Nagin says he wants anyone and everyone to return to New Orleans, heretofore known as the Crescent City.

"I thought, personally," says San Bernardino, Calif., Mayor Judith Valles, "with his 'Chocolate City' comment, he was just saying to the people who left -- and let's face it, most were African American -- that this is still your city. I think he meant it in a positive way. But it was politically incorrect, I guess. It missed the proper gesture." Then she says: "I'm a Democrat. That's why I understand the 'Chocolate City' phrase."

"I stepped out there and did something bold and unique," Nagin was saying yesterday. "I created a need for people to try to corner me. I think it's just me stepping out and being right."

Nagin is a tall, confident man with a shaved head and a bright smile. He was dressed in a smart black pinstriped suit and wore a Mardi Gras-like bracelet of black and white beads on his right wrist. A native of New Orleans, he had never run for political office before winning the mayor's race in 2002. He's married with three children. He's got a degree from Tuskegee University and one from Tulane. Before he entered politics, he was a vice president at Cox Communications. Before Katrina hit, much of the world did not know of Clarence Ray Nagin.

"It has been tough," acknowledges Seletha Smith Nagin, the mayor's wife. "It takes a toll on you." She says she has been gratified by outpourings of support. "We'll be okay. We'll be fine."

Nagin is up for reelection this year. He figures his chances are pretty good.

"At the end of the day, people look at my track record," he says. "Before the hurricane hit, real estate purchases were up, people were coming off the poverty rolls."

Many in the city gave him credit for tackling corruption, a chronic problem in the city government. Then came Katrina, and verbal clashes with the White House and with the administration of Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

"He's a human being. He's stressed," says Camden, N.J., Mayor Gwendolyn Faison, a conference attendee. "How many people say 'God has forgotten me' when there's been an accident in their family? He's human. It's not easy. His city has been destroyed and he's getting criticized for everything he does."

In a brief address to the conference yesterday, Nagin was rueful, hopeful and candid, offering a kind of "Our Town" look back, and ahead, for New Orleans.

"Imagine, if you will, being the mayor of a city where 80 percent of the city took on water and the water stayed three weeks. Imagine that city in the midst of an awful crisis, and 40,000 people are stuck. Then, the cavalry arrives and sends your devastated citizens to 44 different states. On airplanes. With one-way tickets."

He went on:

"Think of those people, who have gone through hell, sitting on that airplane. They don't know where they're going next. Some went to Alaska. And so the doors of the plane opens and after having gone through hell, you are in Alaska. And you see Eskimos and penguins."

The mayor's narratives have often been revealed to be apocryphal. He went on to say he didn't mind the criticism that has been heaped upon him, much of it from inside New Orleans. "I had to be their psychological punching bag."

He cautioned the gathering that the woes of FEMA need to be addressed. He said government infighting must stop. "We don't need to do a dance between the governor and the president when people are suffering." He said too many in New Orleans didn't have flood insurance because they had been told by mortgage lenders it was unnecessary. "We must take care of the people who did the right thing and got caught up in the worst disaster in the history of this country."

He was very warmly received.

Nagin said at the start of his address he would not be controversial. When he said it, a man sitting behind him grinned. It was Anthony Williams, the often-praised, often-maligned mayor of Chocolate City.

Changes Are Sought In Flood Insurance (NYT)

By New York Times Regional Newspapers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

New York Times Regional Newspapers

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The administrator of the National Flood Insurance Program asked Congress on Wednesday to allow the elimination of discounts on as many as 1.2 million policies and suggested that the government consider requiring millions more homeowners to buy coverage.

The program expects to borrow $23 billion from the Treasury to pay claims from Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma. In written testimony to a Senate committee, David I. Maurstad, the administrator, said the program would reach its debt limit by mid-February and require another infusion of up to $5.6 billion.

About 1.2 million policyholders, or about 24 percent, receive discounts on premiums because their homes predate flood maps. Mr. Maurstad asked Congress for the authority to phase out those discounts.

Mr. Maurstad also asked Congress to order the program's parent agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to study expanding coverage requirements to properties in areas known as 500-year flood plains, with a 0.2 percent chance of flooding in any year, and to properties protected by levees and dams. He estimated that would affect four million to six million properties.

Massive Hurricane Claims Force U.S. Flood Insurance Overhaul (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid massive claims from last year's Gulf Coast hurricanes, the Senate Banking Committee is preparing to overhaul the federal flood insurance program, resulting in much higher premiums for many homeowners and a likely taxpayer bailout.

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita put the National Flood Insurance Program so deeply in the red that experts are calling for radical surgery. So far, 239,000 damage claims have been filed by property owners around the Gulf Coast. Costs amounting to $23 billion are expected to dwarf the $2 billion in premiums and fees the program collects each year. "The flood-insurance program is in need of fundamental reform if we expect it to exist in the long term," said David Walker, who heads the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit and investigative arm.

While broad legislation hasn't yet been proposed, several committee members and experts who appeared before the banking panel yesterday agreed that the insurance program needs to be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company. They suggested that subsidies given many policyholders now must be cut back and coverage should be curtailed for properties that are repeatedly flooded. Congress has rejected such moves in the past, but the program hasn't faced such a cash crunch. "We don't have the luxury of doing nothing. We have to make this program as actuarially sound as possible," said Committee Chairman Richard Shelby of Alabama.

The debate is over creating a premium and cost structure to allow the program to build surplus reserves that would cover costs of unusually expensive natural disasters. But it is unrealistic to think premiums could be raised high enough to repay the Treasury Department for the costs of last year's hurricanes, some committee members said. Property owners are required to buy the policies -- which for residences can cover as much as $250,000 in structural damage and $100,000 in lost belongings -- if they meet two conditions: They live in the most flood-prone parts of more than 20,100 communities that participate in the flood-insurance program, and they have mortgages from federally regulated banks or the Federal Housing Administration.

Legislation likely will roll back the program's premium subsidies, valued at about $1.3 billion a year, that go to about 25% of policyholders whose properties were built in the most flood-prone areas before the program's creation. The annual average premium for regular policies was $340 last year, while the average subsidized policy cost $710, according to the Congressional Budget Office. If the subsidy were removed the average premium on those risky properties would jump to about $1,800 a year.

DOJ_NMG_0012115

WAR NEWS:

Insurgent Attacks Repelled (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 -- U.S. Marines and Iraqi soldiers repelled coordinated attacks on the provincial government headquarters in the western city of Ramadi on Tuesday afternoon, killing seven insurgents, the military said Wednesday.

Five insurgents -- whose assault included mortar, small-arms and machine-gun fire -- were killed by a strike from a Marine Harrier jet as they gathered in a nearby cemetery, according to a statement from Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool, a Marine spokesman in the city. Two other fighters died in a firefight after insurgents used a rocket-propelled grenade to attack a military convoy entering the city's main government compound.

No U.S. or Iraqi forces were wounded in the clashes, the statement said.

During the fighting, Zaal Shehan Mahmoud, 30, a cameraman for the Baghdad TV network, was killed by more than 20 bullets to the head, abdomen and legs, according to Mohammed Dulaimi, a doctor at the Ramadi hospital.

Baghdad TV is owned by the country's dominant Sunni Arab political organization, the Iraqi Islamic Party, which recently re-entered politics after boycotting elections held a year ago. A party official, Baha Aldin Naqshabandi, said Marines mistook Mahmoud for a fighter while he was gathering footage in the city's main market. He had been sent to Ramadi to report on the condition of residents after the recent outbreak of violence.

Ramadi, capital of the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, has in recent months experienced some of the heaviest exchanges between U.S. and Iraqi forces and Sunni-led insurgents, who in early January killed dozens of police recruits in a suicide bombing.

Tension also mounted Wednesday in the predominantly Shiite southern city of Basra. Several hundred protesters took to the streets to denounce raids conducted Tuesday by British forces in which at least a dozen people were detained, most of them members of the city's police force.

Provincial Gov. Muhammed Waili joined the protesters, many of whom were of the same tribes as the detainees. They chanted slogans calling for independence from the foreign forces that police their region.

The police forces in Basra and across southern Iraq have increasingly come under the control of sectarian militias blamed for widespread kidnappings, assassinations and other acts of political violence. In September, British troops plowed armored vehicles through the wall of a police station in an attempt to free two service members believed to be detained there. The men were later found in a house nearby controlled by militiamen.

In Samarra, north of Baghdad, where more than 40 police recruits were killed by gunmen this week, Sunni Arab cleric Abdul Karim Jasim Muhammed was shot dead by police at a checkpoint on the road to the Iraqi capital on Wednesday.

Muhammed's mother, who was traveling with him in the vehicle, said police "shot randomly to frighten the people and force them to go back. I was about to tell my son to go back, but it was too late. One of the bullets reached his head and killed him immediately."

Meanwhile, a U.S. government audit of its spending in Iraq published Tuesday revealed irregularities and improprieties, including tens of millions of dollars in cash deposited and withdrawn from a vault without any tracking documentation and up to $60,000 in reconstruction funds gambled away by an American soldier traveling in the Philippines.

U.S. officials "did not effectively manage" more than 2,000 contracts worth $88 million, according to the report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, which covered spending during 2003 and 2004 in six southern and central provinces.

In the southern city of Hilla, the document said, the United States paid $108,140 for renovations that were never made to an Olympic-size swimming pool and signed off on repairs to an elevator in the city's general hospital that later crashed to the ground, killing three people.

Special correspondents Salih Saif Aldin and Bassam Sebti contributed to this report.

General Sees Rift In Iraq Enemy Local-foreign Divide Could Aid U.S. Goals (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — A deepening rift between radical foreign-led fighters and native Iraqi insurgents has turned violent, the top U.S. intelligence officer in Iraq says. That creates an opportunity for American forces to try to persuade local guerrillas to put down their weapons and join the political process, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0012116

"Now you actually have a wedge, or a split, between the Sunni population and al-Qaeda in Iraq," said Maj. Gen. Richard Zahner, deputy chief of staff for intelligence for multinational forces in Iraq. "It poses a significant crossroads for these groups as they look at where they head."

The U.S. military cited incidents of insurgent infighting in a rare public description of a split:

·At least six ranking members of al-Qaeda in Iraq have been assassinated by Sunni insurgents or tribal gunmen in separate incidents since September, Zahner said. The killings are usually in retaliation for al-Qaeda's role in violence, such as the execution of local police officers, he said.

·In Ramadi, in western Iraq, he said, armed clashes have erupted between local Iraqi insurgents and al-Qaeda operatives in recent months. At least one high-ranking al-Qaeda member, Abu Khatab, was recently run out of Ramadi by insurgents loyal to the local tribe.

·Near the Syrian border, members of the Albu Mahal tribe, which attacked U.S. positions as recently as March, have lately been pointing U.S. troops to al-Qaeda hideouts, Zahner said.

Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, also said there is a rift in the insurgency, calling it a "a major step forward in our fight against terrorism."

However, the significance of fighting among Iraq's diverse insurgent groups is difficult to determine. In the past 10 weeks, 18 groups have claimed responsibility for separate attacks in Iraq, said Ben Venzke of IntelCenter, a Washington-area think tank that works for U.S. intelligence. "With all those different moving pieces, you're going to see this constant movement and realignment," he said.

The U.S. military has described the insurgency as a mix of former Saddam Hussein loyalists, foreign militants and disenfranchised Sunni Arabs.

Zahner said the insurgency consists of about 12,000 to 15,000 hard-core Iraqi fighters and supporters, as well as 1,000 militants loyal to al-Qaeda in Iraq, of which about 10% are foreign.

Several trends have accompanied the split:

·The constitutional referendum in October and parliamentary elections in December attracted more Sunni voters than in the past. Voter turnout in the largely Sunni province of Anbar, for example, climbed from 2% in elections Jan. 30, 2005, to 55% in the vote last month. Al-Qaeda insurgents, however, have continued to attack voters and people involved in politics.

·Iraq's complex network of tribes and family relations means some families have members on both sides of the conflict. The foreign fighters' killing of police and government officials is beginning to trigger a response from local insurgents who are more loyal to tribe and family than to ideology, Zahner said.

·Al-Qaeda's aim of turning Iraq into a strict Islamic caliphate has turned some Iraqi fighters against the group, Zahner said.

Insurgents Give U.S. Valuable Training Tool Video Of Attacks Provides Up-close Look At Fighters' Tactics And Capabilities (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Videotapes of insurgent attacks in Iraq have become a potent propaganda tool for militant Islamists but also a handy training aid for U.S. forces, according to Army briefing documents being given to U.S. officers deploying for duty in Iraq.

Insurgents routinely videotape their attacks and sometimes post the footage on the Internet as propaganda to show tactical victories against U.S. military convoys or helicopters.

A briefing report prepared by the intelligence division of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command shows how the Army is mining the insurgent tapes for ways to avoid casualties.

"Insurgent videos have grown complex and sophisticated, with detailed graphics, English subtitles, English narrators, Jihadist 'humor,' and insults directed at the coalition to weaken (coalition forces') resolve and popular support," the report says. The document warns U.S. soldiers that "any non-media or not-CF (coalition forces) personnel with a camera should be considered suspicious."

The briefing is presented in the form of PowerPoint slides that have also been shown to soldiers already deployed in Iraq. It offers insights into insurgent tactics with the help of videos and photos taken by the insurgents themselves.

One shows an incident Aug. 10 when an Army supply truck passed a homemade road sign that concealed a bomb. In one image, the tractor-trailer is completely obscured by the fiery blast. The briefing warns that some roadside bombs are "victim activated," meaning that the motion of a passing vehicle sets off the explosive.

DOJ_NMG_0012117

The overall thrust of the report is to show Army officers how and where Americans are dying in Iraq. The information in the report was current up to last month.

The briefing report says 55% of U.S. military deaths in Iraq are attributed to improvised explosive devices, the military's term for roadside bombs, and small-arms attacks. It says 59% of U.S. military deaths occurred in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar province, which runs from just west of Baghdad to the Syrian border.

Designed to help soldiers know what to expect and how to counter insurgent tactics, the briefing also warns that Iranian-backed Shiite militants as well as Iraqi Sunnis and foreign Sunni fighters are regularly mounting attacks.

Maj. Mark VanHout of the Training and Doctrine Command, based at Fort Monroe, Va., confirmed the authenticity of the report, which is unclassified but not released publicly.

Training commanders had asked for the report to give officers "a statistical analysis of what enemy tactics, techniques and procedures kill most soldiers," according to Gary Phillips, a threats specialist at the command's intelligence branch at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

Phillips, a retired Army colonel who travels to military bases around the country preparing officers for duty in Iraq, says the roadside bombs are the most worrisome threat.

"They continue to move forward in how they're emplaced, how they're configured and how they're used," Phillips says.

His son, Army Capt. Dustin Phillips, deploys to Iraq in late February to train Iraqi police. "I told him this weekend, the issue is, don't let complacency set in. Don't think everything's copacetic. There is no safe spot."

The briefing characterizes insurgents as difficult to find, let alone defeat, and able to change their tactics as the U.S. military changed its own. Adjustments have included more powerful roadside bombs as the number of armored U.S. military vehicles has increased, the use of secondary bombs to kill those responding to initial roadside bombing attacks, and coordinated daylight raids.

The threat of small-arms fire, often directed at military checkpoints and convoys, "comes from all ages and sexes," according to the briefing, and usually originates from homes, vehicles or crowds that allow quick escape. The insurgents have also emulated the U.S. military's preference for "stand-off" style attacks in which the enemy can be hit without exposing the attacker, it says.

US To Release Five Female Prisoners In Iraq (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD - A US military spokesman in Baghdad confirmed Wednesday statements by Iraq Justice Ministry officials who said five women detainees are scheduled to be released Thursday.

Iraqi officials have been at odds with their US counterparts over the release of the five, among nine women terrorism suspects in American custody in Iraq.

The Justice Ministry said last week that six women were about to be freed. Reuters reported that Iraqi officials have suggested the delay in releasing the women was linked to the demands of the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll, who threatened to kill her by last Friday unless all women prisoners were freed.

The deadline passed with no word on Ms. Carroll's fate. The US says it does not negotiate with kidnappers.

The handful of Iraqi women in detention at any given moment are a source of particular anger for average Iraqis and insurgents alike.

The US military says it makes special efforts to process women more quickly than men, because of the anger and violence generated by US detention of women. Many Iraqis assume that women are abused in US detention, and in a culture in which a family's honor is seen as tied up with their ability to protect their women, female detainees are an especially emotional issue.

Sunni Arab political leaders complain frequently about women in detention here. Demands that women be released have been made in other cases than Carroll's.

Shortly after the abduction of Iraq Interior Minister Bayan Jabr's sister on Jan. 4, for instance, her captors demanded that all women be released from the ministry's jails. She was later released unharmed.

The American military spokesman said Thursday's release of the female Iraqi detainees is unconnected to Carroll's abduction. He stated that the US military and Iraqi government had processed the women's cases according to normal procedures and determined they did not need to be held any longer.

The US military is holding about 14,000 security detainees following the release of about 500 guerrilla suspects last week. An Iraqi Justice Ministry official said the women would be among 424 prisoners released Thursday.

Deputy Justice Minister Busho Ibrahim Ali told the Associated Press that an Iraqi government commission had reviewed the six women's cases and suggested they be released due to lack of evidence. US authorities would not comment on his claim.

DOJ_NMG_0012118

Carroll was kidnapped on a Baghdad street on Jan. 7 and her translator was killed. Muslim leaders have joined her family, friends, and colleagues in calling for her release.

· Wire material was used in this report.

Female Detainees Will Be Freed (WT)

By Jay Deshmukh

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq will release women detainees from the infamous Abu Ghraib prison today in a move that might help free a U.S. reporter abducted by insurgents, one of a number of foreigners taken hostage in recent weeks.

An Iraqi Justice Ministry official said 424 detainees were to be freed today after a review of their cases by a joint Iraqi-U.S. board. These would include six of the nine women known to be in detention.

The kidnappers of U.S. journalist Jill Carroll, seized on a Baghdad street on Jan. 7, have threatened to kill her unless all Iraqi women detainees are set free. The deadline set for her has passed; her condition is unknown.

The official denied that the release of the women had anything to do with kidnappers' demands, and U.S. forces have stressed they do not negotiate with hostage-takers.

But a recent spike in hostage-taking of foreigners has embarrassed the government.

"Government services are doing all they can to free people kidnapped and detained," President Jalal Talabani's office said yesterday, quoting National Security Minister Abdul Karim al-Anizi, who met with the president.

More than 250 foreigners have been seized since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein. A number of them, including Westerners, have been killed.

U.S. and Iraqi forces are searching for two German engineers, Rene Braunlich and Thomas Nilzchke, the most recent kidnap victims, seized at gunpoint Tuesday by men posing as Iraqi soldiers in Beiji in northern Iraq.

"We are trying at the moment to obtain any information possible," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said in Berlin, adding that no contact had been established with the captors yet.

The two Germans arrived in Iraq only on Sunday for a brief assignment at a detergent plant, the Associated Press reported citing German and Iraqi officials.

Two Kenyan telecommunications engineers were abducted last week after their bodyguards were gunned down in Baghdad, and there was still no news on the fate of four Western peace activists seized in November.

Meanwhile, a Jordanian hostage said in a videotape his captors had set a new deadline to execute him.

Meanwhile, the military said a U.S. Marine was killed by small-arms fire Tuesday in Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad.

A prominent Sunni Arab cleric, Karim Jassim Mohammed, 39, was fatally shot yesterday by police at a checkpoint heading into the northern city of Samarra, police said.

The Other Beat Of Her Heart (WP)

By Jackie Spinner

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

That can't be Jill, I whispered to myself, over and over, even as her picture hung on the TV screen.

No, it's not her, I said to myself in denial. Jill? Jill Carroll? Being kidnapped in Iraq, sitting cross-legged with black-hooded, gun-toting men behind you, was there any worse fate for an American reporter in Baghdad? I couldn't imagine it. This was my friend, a correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, who, like me, had fallen in love with Iraq.

The day I left to join The Post's Baghdad bureau in May 2004, my twin, Jenny, told me that if anything happened to me, she would never feel joy again. I went anyway, selfishly clinging to an ideal, a quest for truth, grasping for a sense of purpose that even my twin could not give me.

In our 34 years, Jenny and I had never been apart for more than a few months at a time. She was always my identity, the other half of the Spinner twins who grew up in a blue-collar town in the Midwest, chasing lightning bugs and a sense that the world extended beyond the corn and soybean fields surrounding us.

For 13 months in 2004 and 2005, my half was in Baghdad, dodging mortar rounds, roadside bombs and potential kidnappers, while Jenny worried from home that I would not be able to keep my promise to my nephew, her young son. "Aunt Jackie always comes back," I told him each time I returned to Baghdad, to a place that began to feel more like home the longer I stayed.

Although I had tucked Jenny's warning words deep inside of me when I left, I realize now that on this journey of a lifetime, I had gone alone. And I was alone that day outside Abu Ghraib prison, when a stranger grabbed my arm and began dragging me toward a car.

DOJ_NMG_0012119

* * *

After the kidnapping and killing of Nicholas Berg in May 2004, journalists were more careful when gathering outside Abu Ghraib to cover the release of U.S. security detainees. These releases occurred outside the secure compound, on an open stretch of highway between Baghdad and volatile Fallujah. Post reporter Daniel Williams had been ambushed on that road, his car raked with bullets. We reporters had become targets, forced to send our Iraqi translators out to interview those being released from Abu Ghraib.

Frustrated with this awkward interview system, I devised a new plan -- to cover the release from inside the prison. No other reporter had done this. It would be a good exclusive. I persuaded the military officials on the ground to let me do it, then consulted with my more experienced colleagues about the best way to get there. We decided it would be safer if a driver dropped me off with Post photographer Andrea Bruce. I had an abaya for disguise and a bodyguard with an AK-47. We would go at dusk. Our overnight bags for prison would be dirty hotel pillowcases, because they looked like the flour sacks Iraqi women often used. Abu Saif, who was working for The Post as an interpreter, made sure I knew a few words in Arabic. "Say it like this," he instructed. " Ani Sahafiya ," I repeated after him. "I am a journalist."

On Sunday night, June 13, 2004, Andrea and I slipped out of the car and walked into Abu Ghraib under a pink sky.

We settled into a small, whitewashed cell in a large warehouse and plotted how to cover the next day's story. The Army had painted the cell's walls, but the stains were still there: sweat, dirt, blood. Saddam Hussein had crammed as many as 64 prisoners into the same space where Andrea and I had two single cots, separated by only an arm's length.

Jenny. Her name often came out of nowhere when I found myself in a nearly unimaginable place. I needed to describe this to her. I needed her to see the colorful murals of Hussein still painted above the cell blocks: Hussein in a white military uniform surrounded by white doves, with the snow-capped mountains of the Kurdish north over his left shoulder; Hussein in dark glasses and a white fedora against a splashy black and orange background; Hussein in a dark suit, his eyes scratched by vandals.

I took my satellite phone outside and pointed it southeast, spinning around to get a signal. Bats fluttered in the artificial lights as I talked to Jenny a half-world away. "You'll never guess where I am. Abu Ghraib! The prison. Yes, I'm inside. It's so creepy, Jenny. I have to sleep in a cell. And I'm looking up right now, and there are all these bats, which makes it even more creepy. But I had salad for dinner."

With Jenny, I could be wide-eyed, excited, sad, scared, elated, real. In the bureau and with my editors, I had expectations to meet. The other correspondents were so hardened. They had seen war many times, had faced down dictators, guerrilla leaders and warlords in exotic, far-off places. This -- Iraq -- was all I had. I could not pretend to be more experienced than I was. But I could hide how green I was. I didn't need to act like a clown who had just joined the circus. No, I saved that for Jenny.

My words gushed out, as usual. I tried to call her at least once a day, never talking long, to check in, to bring her with me, when I just needed to hear her voice, when I was full of new sights and sounds and had to empty some of it. I could tell Jenny the part of the story that could not go in the news articles. I could tell her my story.

Back on my cot in the cell, I could not sleep. I kept imagining the ghosts of the detainees who had died in that room, kept hearing their screams, their voices finally growing hoarse, then fading into the nothingness that had already consumed them.

Andrea and I got up early the next morning to watch the release of about 500 detainees. The prisoners lined up according to the direction they were headed, Tikrit here, Baghdad there. They clutched homemade bags sewn from brown plastic MRE packages. Most professed their innocence to me.

From a guard tower, Andrea and I watched for hours as the buses with released prisoners rolled out, the crowd of nearly 600 waiting family members slowly thinning as the morning went on. Ghazwan and Bassam, our driver and interpreter for this trip, were outside the prison watching for us to come out. I wanted to wait until most of the onlookers had left so we would not attract as much attention.

Andrea decided to follow a bus of released detainees and jumped into a car with an Associated Press photographer and reporter. I called Bassam to let him know I was on my way and asked the Marines in the tower to make sure I made it to my car. I said it with such breeze, as if I were leaving a movie theater in the United States and getting ready to walk across a dark parking lot.

I followed a narrow path through barbed wire that led from the prison to a small parking lot near the front. Several cars idled in the noon heat. No one seemed to pay much attention to me. I walked along the perimeter of the parking lot and headed for the highway. I could not see Bassam or Ghazwan, but based on our telephone contact, I knew they were waiting in Ghazwan's yellow sedan.

Suddenly, a man ran toward me, grabbed me by the wrist and began pulling me toward an orange and white car. At first I said in Arabic, " La. La. Rajan. " No. No. Please. I pointed to the highway, where Bassam and Ghazwan were hidden from view. But he kept pulling me by the wrist. Another man came up behind me and grabbed me around the waist. Someone else grabbed the pillowcase that held my belongings and threw it aside. At first I couldn't fathom what was going on. What was happening to me? Were they trying to kidnap me? They were trying to kidnap me! My heart pounded.

DOJ_NMG_0012120

I had avoided watching the video footage of Berg's beheading that played repeatedly on Arab satellite television. I imagined it now anyway. I could not let these men put me in that vehicle.

I was trying to remember how to say "I am a journalist" in Arabic as Abu Saif had instructed. I couldn't find the words. Instead, in a panic, I told them that I was a vegetarian. Ani Nabatiya! Ani Nabatiya! I fell to the ground and started kicking them. It did not stop them. They just dragged me on the ground, still trying to pull me by my hand. Someone yanked me up, and the man who first grabbed me ripped off my abaya. They saw the blue bulletproof flak jacket that foreigners wore in Iraq. He said, "No Iraqi, no Iraqi." I realized instantly: They think I'm CIA. So I screamed back, Washington Post! Washington Post! Until then, I had tried not to raise my voice. I did not want to attract the relatives still waiting for the detainees, but our tussle finally drew their attention, and a crowd formed around me. Where was Bassam? Where were the Marines I had asked to watch me as I walked to my car?

I looked over at the faces in the crowd, and I didn't see a single person who saw me as a human. I tried to plead with a woman standing there, plead with my eyes, and she looked like she wanted to spit on me. I was an American woman, no better than the American soldier in the photographs of the abused detainees who dragged one of their bloodied sons or husbands naked on a leash.

Bombs were going off almost daily. Iraqis were dying. They blamed the Americans. This is not what they had imagined when they imagined democracy. There was no distinction made between the American press and U.S. soldiers and contractors who had promised electricity and had not delivered it. They felt occupied, and I was part of that occupation.

I saw the helicopters blaze in the sky coming out of the prison, while the Marines followed on foot, pointing their weapons and shouting at the crowd. I didn't hear anything at first but the sound of my own voice, which had grown hoarse from my mantra: Washington Post! Washington Post!

Once the men who grabbed me saw the Marines, they let go, and everyone scattered. Bassam came running as the crowd parted. He had been trying to get a better look at what had drawn the people. But he had not seen me. Please, my bag, I mimed to Bassam, as the Marines led us back inside Abu Ghraib.

I balled up my head scarf and threw it on the dirt. "It didn't even work!" I yelled. I was furious that something about me -- my walk, my body, the way I carried myself -- had tipped them off that I was a foreigner. I leaned against a concrete barricade inside the prison, folding my hands in my lap to stop them from shaking. My entire body convulsed. I looked over at Bassam. "When we get back to the office, you tell them I didn't cry. Tell them," I insisted until he agreed. I needed them to know. I had not buckled. I had not broken down. I was intact.

When I called Jenny later, my voice shook. "These guys tried to kidnap me!" I exclaimed. I had already talked to my editor back in Washington, had heard myself begging: "Please, do not make me come home. I want to stay. Please, do not call me home."

Although I could tell Jenny the truth that I could not tell my editor -- that I was rattled but also resigned -- I did not tell her that I had pleaded to stay in Iraq. I did not want her to know that I had gotten so close to terror, so far from her, and yet I could not bring myself to come back, so that I could take away her own fears.

* * *

In the book, Jenny Spinner, an English professor, writes about getting Jackie's call about the attempted kidnapping.

I always knew it was her before she said anything, my "hello" met by a long pause, then the "click click" of the satellite phone as it attempted to shrink the miles between us. Sometimes I waited for her to speak; other times, I shouted eagerly into the phone, "Jackie? Is that you, Jackie? Can you hear me?" When she left for Iraq, she promised to call me as often as she could. We usually talked every few days, taking advantage of her journalist's access to the world outside Iraq. When she couldn't call, we e-mailed, often several times a day. As far away as she felt to me, it helped that I rarely went half a day without communicating with her, and we both understood what a privilege that was. But it also made her journey to Iraq seem closer, easier, than it truly was -- at least for me. As long as I could reach her, she was within my grasp.

This phone call, though, was different -- the pause longer, heavier, before I heard her voice. "Jenny," she whispered.

"What's wrong?" I asked, leaning into the kitchen counter where I had been cleaning breakfast dishes, steadying myself for whatever dark and unimaginable news she was about to share. I recognized that tone, the way she wrapped the letters of my name around a barely contained gasp. "Somebody tried to kidnap me," she said.

My world heaved. "Say that again," I said, even though I heard her the first time. Say it again and again and again. Say it until I begin to reconcile the bright Connecticut morning, happy and oblivious, with your world in Iraq. "I fought like a dog," she said, the narrative steadying her shaky voice. "I kicked and screamed until the Marines finally rescued me."

I tried to picture it: my thin sister, on the ground, her hands digging into someone else's dirt, scrambling for freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0012121

"I don't understand," I stammered.

"I'll be okay," she said, shifting into protective mode. "We left the prison and are -- " She stopped, interrupted by a loud voice. "Oh, no," she said, before the phone clicked and went silent.

I stood at the sink, unsure what to do, how to go about the morning, the day, the rest of my life.

It would be hours before she would call again, and by then she was a new self, resolved, distant, yes, farther away than ever before.

Adapted from "Tell Them I Didn't Cry: A Young Journalist's Story of Joy, Loss, and Survival in Iraq" by Jackie Spinner. Copyright 2006 by Jackie Spinner. Printed by permission of Scribner, a division of Simon & Schuster Inc., N.Y.

Abduction Forces A Grim Look At What A Story Is Worth (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — When Jill Carroll was kidnapped, other journalists in Iraq were aghast that something so horrible had happened to someone they knew. But many insisted privately that it never would have happened to them.

They would have traveled in an armored car. They would have taken two vehicles so the second, the chase car, could have scared off the gunmen. They never would have gone to that neighborhood.

Maybe, maybe not. You could avoid western Baghdad, where she was abducted, only to be nabbed in the southern district. You could have two cars and the second could have its tires shot out and careen off the road. You could be in an armored car and your driver could lose his nerve.

The truth is that we are working in a war zone where no rules apply. No one is safe: not Iraqis, not Westerners, not men, not women.

For most journalists in Iraq, it's hard to be honest about danger, even though we talk about it all the time. We follow daily reports about the number of roadside bombings, suicide attacks and abductions. We chart violence the way other people watch the weather.

But talking about the danger in Iraq for what it is — my life, my death — is too scary. So we make it ordinary. "Oh, did you see any gunmen on your way over, there were some at the intersection yesterday, and would you like a cup of coffee?"

To family and friends not in Iraq, it is incomprehensible why you came here, and certainly why you returned twice, three times — in my case, over and over for nearly three years.

I could say something like "The cycle of risk and survival makes life more valuable," but that wouldn't be true, although some journalists do become addicted to the danger, to the high of sidestepping death.

Witnessing History

For me, at least, what is true is that once in a while as a journalist you get the chance to witness history, a moment when tectonic plates shift, when more is at stake than you ever imagined you would touch or see. It's the adrenaline surge of being in a place where people's lives are in the balance, where every decision counts and where what you're writing might, might just matter.

And you feel more alive than you've ever felt — but you're also often closer to being killed. You notice I wrote "often." I needed a qualifier.

As I said, I wasn't drawn to the danger; it crept up on me. I put out of my mind unsettling questions about just how close I might be to getting killed. But it lurked out there, inescapable. Is a 50-50 chance of survival acceptable? Or are you only comfortable if the odds are better than 80-20?

These are the calculations I've made every day, sometimes several times in a day. Calculations about the odds of being caught in a suicide bombing, abducted, shot by mistake or on purpose. I've become a bookmaker of sorts. I can tell you that the chance of being caught in a suicide bombing is slight, unless you have to go through a checkpoint, at which point it skyrockets. But the chances of my being kidnapped, well, I don't even want to write about that.

I remember an American security contractor with a faraway, almost happy look telling me in 2003, when we could still drive around Baghdad without worrying about it, "Nothing clarifies your thought like a gun to the head." Well, I assured myself, I'm not that far gone.

A year later, I had a chance to test his assertion. I had gone to a hospital in Fallouja to report on the killing of four Iraqis, reportedly by U.S. Marines. But a relative of one of the dead saw in me an infidel intruding on his family's private grief, and in a rage he pulled a gun on me and my interpreter. In that moment, I learned that with a gun near my head, I didn't feel clear about anything except that what I was doing wasn't worth it and that I had put my interpreter, whom I cared about deeply, in danger. He had four children and a wife. What did I think I was doing? And I couldn't bear to think about my family and what it would do to them if I were killed in a foreign place.

DOJ_NMG_0012122

The waves of nausea came hours later and I kept trying to breathe more deeply, but for almost a day I felt like I couldn't fill my lungs.

Trying to Blend In

Still, it took nearly two years before I turned back from an assignment. Because something changed for me when Jill Carroll, an American freelance journalist for the Christian Science Monitor, was abducted Jan. 7.

I had always told myself that despite my blue eyes and pale skin, I would slip unnoticed through Iraq with my hijab, head scarf and black abaya. The abaya was my cloak of invisibility, my body armor.

I studied the way many Iraqi women walked — with a slight shuffle, from wearing slip-on mules much of the time. I studied how they linked arms with other women when they walked in the markets. I noted the kind of purses they carried — large and black. I blended. I was thrilled when people addressed me in Arabic; perhaps they really thought I was one of them.

Carroll had gone one better than me — she actually spoke Arabic — and still she was unable to avoid the wash of fury and hatred that now confronts Westerners. We are not wanted.

The words of a dear colleague floated to my consciousness on my most recent trip to Iraq. We used to argue daily about safety, and each thought the other took unnecessary risks — the truth was that we each took risks in our own way. I had proposed driving to Najaf, a city south of Baghdad, at a time when the road was known for ambushes, kidnappings and beheadings. "Alissa, an abaya is not bulletproof," he had said.

So when Carroll was kidnapped, although I did not know her, my heart went out to her.

I was aware of the statistics: Since the beginning of the war, 60 journalists, five of them women, had been killed in Iraq and at least 37 abducted, according to a tally by the Committee to Protect Journalists. But like all the other foreign journalists in Iraq — fewer than 75 of us, down from more than a thousand after the war — I needed to believe that I was going to slip through.

After Carroll's abduction, I don't feel that way anymore.

Last week I set out in the early morning for Kut, a city about two hours south of Baghdad. We left early so that we could get back in a day, adhering to the rule that you shouldn't stay long in a single place because word will get around that a Westerner is in town.

I roused one of our British security advisors at 7 a.m. and had him remind the drivers of protocol (keep the cars apart, don't look like a convoy, rely on radios to communicate). But when I went out, it turned out the driver had brought his own vehicle, not an armored car.

Moment of Truth

Carroll's experience hung in my mind. She had been abducted in part because she lacked the protection of an armored car, and her interpreter had been shot dead. I looked at my interpreter, a beautiful young Iraqi woman who loved to read English literature, had helped me buy Iraqi shoes so that I would appear more local and had taught me about the world of Iraqi women. But I pushed ahead.

Then it turned out we didn't have a Thuraya satellite phone in the car. Cellphones are notoriously unreliable in Iraq because the U.S. military often blocks signals during its operations. Traveling without a satellite telephone as a backup is at best foolhardy. But we had already left, so I resigned myself to traveling without it.

We weaved through the Baghdad traffic. The road was crowded and people could easily see us through the car windows. Although I usually look out at the passing scene, I forced myself to look into the car so that my eyes and skin would not be visible.

The most dangerous part of the trip is the 15 miles of road immediately south of Baghdad proper. It runs through a largely Sunni farming area, one where mutilated, headless bodies have turned up often. It feels like outlaw country: Someone could grab you and no one would say anything.

As we went through the last Baghdad checkpoint, a policeman told our driver that a new security plan was in effect and we would not be able to reenter the capital for 48 hours. The driver pulled over and turned to me: Did I still want to go?

It was a moment of truth. I had to get back that night. Was there any other way I could get into Baghdad if the roads were closed? Yes, my driver said. "You can walk across the Diyala bridge and the office can send a car to meet you."

He nodded to a stream of people who were doing that right then — women in swirling abayas picking their way through the mud, men striding along. "How far would I have to walk?" I asked. About a mile. "Is it safe?" The driver shook his head. "There are bad people here. Everyone can see you when you are walking. We cannot honestly tell you it is safe."

I appealed to my interpreter. "What do you think, Zainab? Is it that unsafe?" She turned and looked at me. "I'll go with you if that's what you decide to do, but the driver wants to know what he can do with his car. He can't leave it outside Baghdad on the road for the night. It would be stolen. He can't stay with it — it's dangerous. And then we have the chase car. What do you want them to do? "

'We Can't Go'

DOJ_NMG_0012123

I was silent. I had come back to Iraq to do a small number of interviews. If I didn't go to the one in Kut, I wouldn't be able to finish the story.

I thought about close calls I had had in the past. About my interpreter, who said she would go with me no matter what. About my parents, who hated that I was in Iraq. About Carroll, whom I imagined alone in a room, perhaps cold, perhaps not knowing that thousands of people were thinking about her.

And I thought about an autumn night more than a year ago when a colleague had rushed off into western Iraq to cover a suicide bombing. I remembered how worried I had been, and when I finally reached him on the satellite phone I had said: "It's not about us. We can die if we want to here, but we can't put those who work for us in more danger than they already are. We're making decisions for more than ourselves."

I remember that he had listened and, hard as it must have been, said, "You're right, I'm coming back."

I heard my own words now in my head. There was no choice. "We can't go. There's no way to make it a safe trip," I said. "Let's turn around and go back to the office."

Was it the right decision? Could I have walked across the bridge unnoticed? Did the drivers really assess the danger correctly? I don't know. But what I do know is that Iraq is hostile ground and nothing I do can make it safe.

Kurd's Writings Land Him In Jail: A Critic Of Party Corruption, Or A Reckless Defamer? (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

ERBIL, Iraq, Jan. 25 — Kamal Sayid Qadir had just returned here from Austria in late October when two trusted former students invited him for coffee at the Hotel Avista.

For Mr. Qadir, the meeting held the promise of a reunion of kindred spirits from Salahaddin University where, as a faculty member a few years back, he had clashed with administrators allied with the Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani. From Austria he had written articles accusing Mr. Barzani's all-powerful Kurdistan Democratic Party of corruption while calling members of its intelligence service, the Parastin, criminals and its chief — Mr. Barzani's son — a "pimp."

But Mr. Qadir said he never made it home from the hotel that night. Betrayed by his former students, who unknown to him had joined the Parastin, he says he was abducted after he left the hotel. He is now imprisoned here, sentenced last month to 30 years for defaming the Parastin and Kurdish political leaders after a trial that he said had lasted 15 minutes.

His case, while extraordinary, is by no means unique. Two journalists from Wasit Province in east central Iraq face 10 years in prison for suggesting that Iraqi judges kowtow to the American authorities just as Saddam Hussein's courts rubber-stamped edicts of the Baath Party. The journalists, Ayad Mahmoud al-Tamimi and Ahmed Mutair Abbas, had also accused the then-governor of Wasit of corruption and labeled him a bastard, a grave insult here.

Taken together, the prosecutions indicate how much remains at play in newly democratic Iraq. The nation has made remarkable steps away from totalitarian rule: the overthrow and prosecution of a genocidal dictator, two national elections and the adoption of a Constitution. But it remains to be seen how far Iraq will ultimately travel toward true Western-style democracy.

In much of southern Iraq, for example, real power increasingly lies with Shiite militias that serve religious leaders and enforce a rule of strict Islamic mores and second-class treatment of women. Now, the prosecutions of journalists suggests that the new Iraqi government is at another crossroads. Will it revert to state-sanctioned intimidation of the news media or allow the sort of free-flowing exchange of ideas that flourish in newspapers, blogs and other media in the Western world?

"These cases set a terrible precedent and are sure to make any Iraqi journalist think twice before writing about powerful political figures," said Joel Campagna, senior program coordinator for the Middle East and North Africa for the Committee to Protect Journalists, a watchdog group in New York.

As with other nations newly liberated from authoritarianism, Iraq is still testing the limits of responsible free speech, and some of the name-calling and rumor-mongering that goes on clearly oversteps the boundaries. Many of Mr. Qadir's criticisms exceeded what would be tolerated in other Middle East countries, particularly his assertions about the sexual proclivities of the Barzani clan.

A number of Kurdish journalists who have called Mr. Qadir's imprisonment outrageous say they are nevertheless uncomfortable with some of his writings, calling them offensive and reckless. Indeed, Mr. Qadir said in a prison interview that he had apologized for parts of articles he now says contained improper personal insults. But he vowed to continue to criticize official corruption, including what he says are secret abductions by the police.

But the Iraqi authorities increasingly go beyond merely responding to unfair or false claims, Mr. Campagna and other observers say, using the courts as an instrument of intimidation to discourage reporting on corruption and abuses of power. Iraq, he added, "is following the poor example of its neighbors who routinely detain, criminally prosecute or imprison reporters for their work."

DOJ_NMG_0012124

For its part, the Kurdistan Democratic Party says almost all Mr. Qadir's accusations are false. His arrest came after he was served with a proper warrant, said a senior official of the K.D.P. and the Parastin, who asked that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the case. He said Mr. Qadir had been given a fair trial and had not, as he has asserted, been abused in prison, forced to sleep in his own excrement, threatened with torture or denied food and water. Massoud Barzani "has nothing against him," the official added.

The Kurdish party tolerates reporting of official corruption and supports narrowing defamation laws so fewer types of articles might be subject to criminal prosecution, the official said. But he also said defamatory writings intended "as a political weapon" should still be subject to prosecution. Mr. Qadir's writings would fall in this category, he said.

Mr. Qadir's case has drawn international attention and put enormous pressure on Kurdish leaders. The senior official of the K.D.P., which controls western Kurdistan, said that Mr. Qadir's sentence would be reduced to one year and that his family would be permitted to bail him out. The senior official said a court would make the ruling in the next few weeks.

But Mr. Qadir still could face serious criminal jeopardy from complaints yet to be prosecuted, said Ismael Khalil Shakeeb, the presiding criminal court judge in Erbil and one of the judges who sentenced him last month. "He has insulted many other people," he said.

Mr. Qadir, 48, credits a statement issued by the United States over the Voice of America for possibly saving his life. An American official in Baghdad said Washington had discussed the case with Kurdish officials. Delegations including Austrian officials have paid prison visits, he says, adding pressure that greatly improved his living conditions.

Kurdistan is, in most respects, the most westernized and prosperous part of the new Iraq, having experienced a decade or more of virtual independence even before the American invasion. But writers here face threats and arrest for running afoul of the K.D.P., Mr. Qadir says.

"We have no freedom of the press," he said in an interview conducted Friday afternoon in the Erbil prison. "It's all arbitrary; they can arrest anybody. I never thought I'd be a victim of the Kurds."

Mr. Qadir's complaints about curbs on press freedoms are supported by Rebin Ismael, a former senior editor of a large Kurdish newspaper who now runs an American aid organization in Erbil.

In Kurdistan, he says, it is not unusual for the secret police to threaten or arrest journalists who fail to toe the line of the K.D.P. More than a dozen journalists have been arrested in recent years, he says, but the cases are never reported on in Kurdistan because other journalists fear saying anything critical of the party.

"Generally, any journalists or writers not connected to the party are under threats," Mr. Ismael said. "If you write anything not in their interest, they will arrest you or call your cellphone and threaten you."

He said he and his wife, a Kurdish reporter whose articles have mocked the party, had not slept in their house for nearly a month, having fled after she received threatening calls.

The senior Kurdish party official described Mr. Ismael as a credible and respected journalist but took issue with his comments. Told the names of four of the writers Mr. Ismael said had been arrested, the official said the four had not been arrested but had been called to "interviews" by the police.

He said he did not know how many other journalists had submitted to such police interviews. He said only one writer aside from Mr. Qadir had been sent to prison in recent years.

Mr. Qadir, born and raised in Kurdistan, is now a citizen of Austria, where he studied and lived until 1991, when Kurdistan was effectively liberated after the Persian Gulf war. He returned to teach law and political science at Salahaddin University but clashed with the administration as he lectured students about K.D.P. abuses, he said. Nepotism and graft are still rampant today, he said.

He left the university a few years ago, he said, and returned to Austria, where he continued to write about Kurdistan for Internet publications, adopting a strident and disparaging tone that pushed his criticism well past what anyone living here would contemplate. He accused K.D.P. officials of siphoning public funds and spying for the K.G.B. and the Israeli Mossad, and he wrote that one Barzani clan member was homosexual and another had had trysts with Russian women.

He say he regrets calling Massur Barzani, the Kurdish leader's son, a pimp. But he argues that the Parastin often use prostitutes to gather information.

The senior K.D.P. official said the criticism of the Parastin and the personal attacks on the Barzanis were all false. But he admitted he did not know whether the Parastin used prostitutes to aid intelligence gathering.

If freed and allowed to stay in Kurdistan, Mr. Qadir says he will continue to criticize what he characterizes as the police-state atmosphere in Kurdistan. "I never knew Kurdistan was in this shape, where people get abducted by the secret police," he said.

British Arrests Of Police Strain Relations In Basra (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — Tensions continued to simmer Wednesday between local Iraqi officials and British troops in the Shiite-dominated southern city of Basra, where the British this week arrested 14 law enforcement officials, including two senior police intelligence officers, allegedly linked to political corruption and assassinations.

The British released several of the men Wednesday, but a spokesman for the Basra provincial council said that eight remained in custody, including three who had been transferred to a prison facility after British authorities said they had bomb-making materials in their possession.

Among the officers still being held by the British are Maj. Jasim Qasim Hassan Daraji, Basra's deputy chief of intelligence, and intelligence officer Capt. Abbas Munis Abdalali Hilfi.

The province has responded to the arrests by threatening to cut off all cooperation with British forces in Iraq's second-largest city.

"For some time, the British forces have made random arrests in a provocative way against the citizens of Basra without the knowledge of the local government," said a statement released by provincial officials. "We have demanded over and over that these forces stop these arrests and release detainees, but all in vain."

Iraqi officials also demanded the unconditional release of the police officers and threatened to "suspend all dealings with British forces" if the men were not freed by Wednesday afternoon.

Maj. Peter Cripps, a British military spokesman in Basra, said the arrests were part of an ongoing investigation of police corruption.

"These men were all part of the former internal affairs department that was disbanded by the Ministry of Interior and are now in the criminal intelligence unit and the serious crimes unit," Cripps said. "They are alleged to be following their own agenda, including corruption, assassinations and persecutions of citizens."

Although Basra, a predominately Shiite Muslim port city and oil hub, has experienced less of the insurgent violence that has wracked Baghdad, it has seen a wave of sectarian-driven killings and political attacks since the beginning of last year. Shiite militia members are believed to have a strong presence in the police force.

In October, scores of Iraqi policemen raided the Thar Allah Party headquarters, a small militant Shiite political organization based in Basra, and burned the building down. Four Thar Allah members were killed in the incident. Party leaders blamed Al Fadila al Islamiya, or the Islamic Virtue Party, which holds a narrow majority on the Basra provincial council, and Al Mahdi militia. Both groups are associated with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

And in September, Shiite militiamen clashed with British troops after tanks rescued four British soldiers from a Basra jail.

In recent months, British officials in Iraq and in London have also complained that Basra militiamen may be involved in bomb attacks against British troops, using ordnance fashioned in Iran. Basra is a suspected hub for Iranian intelligence agents.

"The Iranians have interests in Basra and have organizations in Basra, Amarah and Nasiriya," said Mansour Alkanaan, an Iraqi National Assembly member from Basra.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, members of the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite bloc that won the most seats in the parliament elected Dec. 15, named four Shiite candidates for prime minister to be chosen by its members. Candidates include current Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, Adel Abdul Mehdi of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, deputy parliament speaker Hussein Shahristani and Fadila party member Nadim Jabiri.

In initial negotiations with Kurdish and Sunni Muslim Arab legislators on the new government, United Iraqi Alliance member Baha Araji said the Shiite bloc would not consult with other coalitions on the selection of prime minister, but would offer the presidency to a Sunni Arab candidate.

However, Saad Ilyan, a member of Iraqi National Dialogue, a Sunni Arab party, said he would be satisfied to keep the incumbent president, Jalal Talabani, a Kurd. The Kurdish slate won the second-highest vote total in the December election.

"We only now want the security situation to be better, whether the government is going to be Sunni, Shiite or Kurdish," Ilyan said.

In other developments, the Iraqi Ministry of Justice announced Wednesday that it would release five of eight female detainees today as part of a larger release program. This month, a group claiming to be the abductors of American freelance journalist Jill Carroll issued a statement demanding the release of all female prisoners in Iraq.

The five are in U.S. custody, but Iraqi and U.S. officials have denied any connection between the planned releases and the kidnappers' demands.

Carroll's condition is unknown, as is the fate of two German contractors who were kidnapped near the northern oil refinery in Baiji and two Kenyan engineers seized last week. More than 250 foreigners and hundreds of Iraqis have been kidnapped since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0012126

Times staff writers Suhail Ahmad, Shamil Aziz and Saif Rasheed, special correspondent Asmaa Waguih and a special correspondent in Basra contributed to this report.

On Iraq's Front Lines, Digital Memorials For Fallen Friends (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

The night his buddy was killed by insurgent gunfire in Iraq last March, Army Spc. Mitchell Bass hopped out of his bunk and grabbed his laptop. He searched his computer for every digital photo he could find of the friend, Staff Sgt. Juan Solorio, and then wandered around the camp in Mosul with his portable hard drive asking other soldiers whether they had any photos or video clips.

They gave him shots of Sgt. Solorio sporting a newly shaved head and leaning against a burned-out truck on an Iraqi roadside. They found footage of Sgt. Solorio reaching for his pistol, dropping it in the mud and laughing. Spc. Bass strung all the images together into a video and added a soundtrack, "The Night That the Lights Went Out in NYC" by punk band the Ataris. Then he played it at a memorial service in Iraq.

"As a joke he grew this huge, disgusting mustache," Spc. Bass said of his friend. "I made sure to add a few of those photos in there."

Digital photography, video and Internet access have let soldiers in Iraq stay closer to distant friends and family than troops in any other war. Now, these electronic records are also creating a powerful and raw new wave of war memorials.

A dusty tent in Mosul served as Army Capt. Kevin Latham's studio, where he made videos to honor the four soldiers in his unit who had died just before Christmas 2004 when a suicide bomber detonated explosives in the camp's mess hall. Mortars boomed in the distance as he worked long past midnight to carefully select music to go with the videos.

Paul Rieckhoff, who served in the Army National Guard in Iraq in 2003-2004, said that in the early days, soldiers in his unit made action videos of themselves raiding insurgent hideouts and carrying out other wartime tasks. "It was kind of like the ESPN highlight reels -- the music is pumping and everyone was running around," said Mr. Rieckhoff, who founded the advocacy group Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America.

When a fellow soldier, Spc. Robert Wise, a 21-year-old from Tallahassee, Fla., was killed in Baghdad in November 2003, his friends used a laptop to create a digital slideshow, set to music, of photos of Spc. Wise. It was projected onto a screen at his memorial service in Baghdad.

"When soldiers are killed in Iraq, all you see in the paper is name, rank and age," said Mr. Rieckhoff, a first lieutenant. The videos, he said, are "cathartic and a way to eternally honor their memory."

DIGITAL MEMORIES

Watch the memorial videos for Sgts. Juan Solorio1, Zachary Wobler2 and Christopher Pusateri3. (Windows Media Player required4)

In another memorial video, Army Master Sgt. Brian Mack, who died in Mosul a year ago this month, is shown in photos riding in a Blackhawk helicopter and in a short video clip rushing a stationary target during gun practice, shooting repeatedly while friends laugh. It's set to the melancholy song "Clocks" by Coldplay.

"Every time someone was killed, we put together a little thing like that," said Sgt. Emmet Cullen, a sniper who fought alongside Master Sgt. Mack. "It helps the grieving process putting them together. Talking about them, seeing them with a big goofy smile on -- it helps."

Wartime cinematographers say commanders ask to review the videos before they're shown at memorial services to make sure they don't degrade the image of soldiers with, for example, footage showing them drinking. In Master Sgt. Mack's video, some officers initially objected to a clip that showed the soldier firing his weapon without wearing his helmet, a violation of military safety standards, said soldiers who helped make the video. But the clip was allowed to go into the finished product.

Lt. Col. Christopher Gibson, who has completed two tours in Iraq as commander of an 82nd Airborne battalion, said he watched the videos for two of his troopers -- Sgt. Christopher Pusateri and Staff Sgt. Zachary Wobler -- several times in advance of their memorial services "so I could keep myself together when I delivered my remarks," he said.

When Sgt. Pusateri was shot to death last winter, Col. Gibson turned to members of his communications team to make his memorial video because they were familiar with computer equipment. One of them was Capt. Jerrold Castro, who met with fellow troopers and laid out a storyboard of sorts, to select the order of the photos and video clips. On his laptop, he used Microsoft's Movie Maker to fiddle with the photos, changing some to a sepia tint and adding special effects.

The final product is set to the song "Rough and Ready" by country singer Trace Adkins, a funny song that he said matched Sgt. Pusateri's personality. The video shows Sgt. Pusateri smirking in his floppy camouflage hat and gritting his teeth in full battle gear.

"Going through the process of building it was a little emotional," said Capt. Castro. "It's a feeling inside of you saying you have to honor this person. If it wasn't them, it could have been me."

A couple of weeks later, a member of that unit who was home on leave from Iraq presented the video to Sgt. Pusateri's mother, Brenda West. Ms. West watched it two or three times and then put it away.

"I don't know if it's something every parent can handle," said Ms. West. "It's almost like being outside of yourself watching it. It's not real."

She says she plans to look at it again Feb. 16, the anniversary of her son's death.

For Spc. Bass, the process of creating Sgt. Solorio's video was therapeutic, he said. "He was like a dad to me," said Spc. Bass, 20 years old, who was with 32-year-old Sgt. Solorio when he was killed.

After he put the finishing touches on the video, Spc. Bass offered an advance screening to a few members of his platoon, who gave their approval. The video finally had its premiere on the big screen in a darkened auditorium where soldiers gathered for Sgt. Solorio's memorial service in Mosul.

"The whole time I was working on it, it didn't really hit me what it was. I just wanted to get it done," said Spc. Bass. "When it started playing at the actual service, it got pretty sad."

Where Iraq Goes Now (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Iraq's official election returns bring glad tidings for Ibrahim Jafari, the country's nebulous interim prime minister. For a chastened Bush administration, Jafari becomes something better than an unknown entity: He is a known nonentity.

Jafari's sudden strength in his bid to stay on stems entirely from his weakness: He does not command a major political party or militia. He has done little since taking office nearly nine months ago but give poetic and confusing speeches. If some leaders suck all the oxygen out of a room, Jafari fills it with mist and will-o'-the-wisp.

It is this elusive quality that belatedly recommends him to Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad and crafty overseer of American efforts to be a midwife to a new coalition government.

Iraq's Dec. 15 balloting was orderly and inspiring, but it has created an aftermath that is neither of those things. It has also forced the Bush administration into a silent reassessment of where Iraq is going and how it is going to get there. Increasingly, the country drifts toward the future as two relatively stable autonomous regions and a violently unstable central zone, all linked by a weak central government and a reduced, reactive U.S. military presence.

All things considered, such a loose, imperfect federalism is not the worst outcome that could befall Iraq. Totalitarian systems, whether run by Saddam Hussein or Soviet commissars, create weak power centers when they collapse. A decade of managing their own affairs and security could provide an important transition stage for Iraq's Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to sort out oil revenue, relations with neighbors and other troublesome issues.

That kind of future -- and a renewal of Jafari's term in office that would make it more likely -- did not figure in the hopes and predictions of U.S. policymakers before the December parliamentary election. Back then, the word passed to Iraqi officials visiting Washington was to form a strong central government, much more quickly and transparently than after the January 2005 election, when Jafari emerged from electoral stalemate as the lowest common denominator in Iraqi leadership.

The administration now gives no sign of trying to hurry things along as it concedes it must deal with the election results it has, not the results it wanted. Those were canceled by the poor showing of Ayad Allawi and Ahmed Chalabi -- secularists who conceivably could have been strong, independent executives -- and successful electioneering by Iranian-backed Shiite parties distrusted by Washington.

As the largest bloc in parliament, the United Iraqi Alliance -- dominated by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and the radical cleric Moqtada Sadr -- will ultimately choose the prime minister. Jafari's Dawa party is a junior partner in the alliance and, unlike its Shiite allies, does not have a large militia.

The release of the final results has triggered a new round of three-dimensional chess to allocate cabinet positions among Iraq's three major population groups -- the Shiite majority of the south, the Kurds of the north and the Sunni minority that is the source of central Iraq's continuing violent rebellion.

The Sunnis voted in greatly increased numbers this time and now have a serious claim on cabinet posts. President Bush has hailed this as a breakthrough, portraying voting as an alternative to insurgency.

But a renewal of violence since the election suggests that the Sunnis, egged on by neighboring Arab regimes and Baathist remnants, may be adopting a long-term "vote and fight" strategy to reclaim the kind of power they wielded under the Baathists. That is one outcome far worse than a de facto partition of Iraq, if it comes to that.

DOJ_NMG_0012128

Working with nudges, winks, long sit-downs with Iraq's fledgling politicians and inexhaustible patience -- qualities alien to L. Paul Bremer and John Negroponte, his two predecessors as U.S. proconsul -- Khalilzad seems to be maneuvering toward a cabinet that would effectively be run by strong deputy prime ministers while Jafari floats effortlessly above the hard work.

Allawi, both proud and lazy, is reportedly resisting U.S. entreaties to take such a post under Jafari. Chalabi and Sadoun Dulaimi, a Sunni who is currently defense minister, are other possibilities. But Khalilzad's dealmaking talents will be stretched to their limits in getting the Shiite parties to accept U.S.-inspired limits on the political victory they have achieved.

Reality has bitten the Bush administration in Iraq and forced the president to settle for less than he wanted. Let's hope that reality can now do the same with Iraq's newly empowered Shiite leaders.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Dec. 28, 1998, statement by the president:

President Clinton: Ladies and gentlemen, before I get into my remarks ... I think I should say a few words about an incident early this morning over the skies of Iraq, where American and British air crews were enforcing a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq. They were fired on by Iraq[i] surface-to-air missiles. They took evasive action, returned fire on the missile site, and returned safely to their base in Turkey ... They attacked because they were attacked. And they did the appropriate thing. We will continue to enforce the no-fly zones.

Pakistan Pledges To Push Forward On Iran Pipeline (WSJ)

By Marc Champion And Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland – Pakistan's president said his country would build a planned natural-gas pipeline from Iran without India's participation if talks among the three nations continue to produce no result.

The threat came at a delicate time for Gen. Pervez Musharraf, while he is having to balance domestic public opinion and relations with the U.S., India and Iran. Gen. Musharraf also said a suspected U.S. missile attack on a Pakistani village that killed civilians this month "probably" killed five or six al Qaeda operatives, but had "harmed our interests" by violating his country's sovereignty and feeding domestic unrest.

In an interview during the annual meeting of the World Economic Forum in the Swiss Alps, Gen. Musharraf said Pakistan had opened bilateral talks with Tehran to build a gas pipeline that would run from Iran, which has the world's second-largest natural-gas reserves, after Russia. Negotiations to build a line that would run on to India have proved difficult, he said, although Pakistan remains open to "the trilateral track if it comes through."

"We aren't reaching any agreement and our [energy] requirements have increased with our growth and the increasing foreign investment in Pakistan," he said, noting foreign direct investment has grown 500% over the past five years. "We are energy-short."

Indian government officials have expressed concern about recent attacks on existing gas and power lines in Baluchistan, the region of South Western Pakistan through which a pipeline from Iran would pass. Gen. Musharraf played down the threat posed by Baluchistan militants, dismissing the conflict as limited to one isolated local tribe.

The Pakistani president's tough line on the pipeline talks contrasts with that of his prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, while in New York last week. Mr. Aziz stressed the project's potential to help stabilize still-strained relations between Pakistan and India. Gen. Musharraf, too, said a three-way deal remains the best option, but said Pakistan's energy needs couldn't wait forever.

Pakistan's gross domestic product grew 8.4% in the fiscal year ended June 30. Analysts in the past have doubted that the $4 billion pipeline would be viable for Pakistan alone if it didn't continue to India, but Gen. Musharraf said that is changing.

Gen. Musharraf, whose term as president expires in 2007, said his goal is to transform Pakistani society by ending conflicts like the one in Baluchistan, defusing Islamist extremism and generally calming "a nation in turmoil."

Partly for that reason, Gen. Musharraf said the recent U.S. missile attack by an unmanned drone on a village where al Qaeda leaders were expected to have dinner had been against Pakistan's national interests. The attack, which killed women and children, has sparked a series of street protests in Pakistani cities. The U.S. hasn't officially acknowledged a role in the missile strike.

Gen. Musharraf said that he hadn't been informed ahead of time of the attack and that Pakistan had told the U.S. that "we don't want anyone to operate in Pakistan" -- even if that means responding more slowly to intelligence about al Qaeda. Pakistan doesn't have unmanned drones.

DOJ_NMG_0012129

"We want to guard our own sovereignty," he said. But he also said his close cooperation with the U.S. in the fight against terrorism hadn't been damaged, and that Pakistan needs the technical help the U.S. can offer to gather intelligence. "Intelligence is far more significant and difficult than operating against [al Qaeda]," he added.

Gen. Musharraf said human, technical and aerial intelligence-gathering had helped Pakistan sweep up 95% of groups that carried out terrorist bombings within Pakistan, including assassination attempts on himself. "There is a perception that everything we do with al Qaeda is in the U.S. interests. I would like to clarify -- it is first of all in our interest," he said.

Gen. Musharraf also rejected criticism that he has failed to deliver on promises to shut down religious schools, known as madrassas, that preach violence. He said 80% of madrassas had accepted that they should teach subjects on the secular state school curriculum, although talks were continuing because the madrassas wanted to set their own exams for the subjects. He said troublesome foreigners at the schools had been expelled from the country as promised, although perhaps 150 remain in hiding.

Stressing success in the campaign against al Qaeda, Gen. Musharraf said he is able to move around the country freely. "I go to marriages, I visit my friends in their houses. I take people out to restaurants," he said.

He declined to say whether he would give up his military command or attempt to extend his term.

India Sends Aid, Despite Pakistani Block (WT)

By Erica Lee Nelson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India has poured more than a half-billion dollars of foreign aid into Afghanistan in the past three years in an attempt to create a friendly and stable neighbor in a volatile part of the world.

The effort, which continues despite a Pakistani blockade of Indian goods bound for Afghanistan, touches all aspects of life -- biscuits for 1 million children, planes for the national airline, artificial limbs for thousands of land-mine victims, jeeps for the military, scholarships, energy, dams, telephone lines and even satellite downlinks.

India also has helped train those deprived of an education during the Taliban rule -- from diplomats to doctors to elevator operators. Indian engineers are even helping to design and build the new Afghan parliament building.

"We would like to see Afghanistan develop in our own image -- pluralistic, democratic, free from interference from its neighbors and prosperous," a senior official in New Delhi said.

But Indian officials say Pakistan is putting up obstacles to the effort.

The historic rivalry between India and Pakistan has complicated proposed energy pipelines from Afghanistan, which would have to run through Pakistan on the way to India.

Additionally, Pakistan usually refuses to let Indian aid pass through its borders to reach Afghanistan.

"There was much trade between India and Afghanistan before, but Pakistan is creating problems. They allow Afghan goods to go to India, but not Indian goods to come to Afghanistan," said Younus Momtaz, first secretary at the Embassy of Afghanistan in New Delhi.

Officially, Pakistan has said the blockade will not stop until steps are taken to resolve the long-standing dispute over Kashmir, a territory claimed by both India and Pakistan since they achieved independence in 1947.

However, some analysts think Pakistan is more worried about losing its dominant position in Afghan trade.

Since the fall of the Taliban, Pakistan's trade with Afghanistan has risen exponentially, from $192 million in 2001 to '02 to more than $1 billion in 2004 to '05.

Indian trade with Afghanistan, meanwhile, is estimated by the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industryat $202 million for 2004 to '05. Total Indian aid to Afghanistan since 2003 is approaching $600 million.

In ancient times, Afghanistan traded easily with the Indian subcontinent. Merchants traveled on the Grand Trunk Road from the fertile plains of northern India, through Pakistan and onward to Kabul, Afghanistan.

Now, Indian aid and trading goods are unloaded at ports in Iran and trucked to Kabul over winding mountain roads.

Indian aid often takes a month to reach its destination -- and sometimes cannot get through at all. The same goods could be transported through Pakistan in about a week.

India's aid effort includes an $84 million joint project with Iran to build a 136-mile road from Iran's Chabahar and Bandar Abbas ports to Afghanistan. That will eliminate a detour of 900 miles and cut travel time substantially.

It is hoped that the road will also bring development to a relatively lawless region of southwestern Afghanistan, which has turned into a center of opium farming in recent years.

Travel in the region remains highly dangerous; one Indian worker on the project was kidnapped and killed in November.

India and Pakistan backed contending factions during Taliban rule in Afghanistan, with the rebel Northern Alliance being allowed to maintain an embassy in New Delhi.

DOJ_NMG_0012130

Now, 10 movie theaters in Kabul screen India's Bollywood blockbusters throughout the day, and a Bollywood film is being made in the Afghan capital for the first time in more than a decade.

"We have a long relationship, we share our joys and sorrows," said Mr. Momtaz of the Afghan Embassy in New Delhi.

Rumsfeld Says Army Isn't Overextended (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday disputed reports suggesting that the U.S. military is stretched thin and close to a snapping point from operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, asserting "the force is not broken."

"This armed force is enormously capable," Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters at a Pentagon briefing. "In addition, it's battle-hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

Mr. Rumsfeld spoke a day after the Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq.

Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress.

Reports suggesting that the U.S. military is close to the breaking point "is just not consistent with the facts," he said.

In an apparent shot at the Democratic Clinton administration, Mr. Rumsfeld said a number of components of the armed forces were underfunded during the 1990s, "and there were hollow pieces to it. Today, that's just not the case."

He said there were over 1.4 million active U.S. troops, and some 2 million -- counting National Guard and Reserve units -- of which only 138,000 people were in Iraq.

"Do we still need more rebalancing? You bet," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The secretary suggested he was not familiar with reports suggesting an overburdened military. But, he said, "It's clear that those comments do not reflect the current situation. They are either out of date or just misdirected."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and former Secretary of Defense William Perry, both members of the Clinton administration, were credited among the authors of the study that congressional Democrats released.

It said that U.S. ground forces are under "enormous strain," adding, "This strain, if not soon relieved, will have highly corrosive and potentially long-term effects on the force."

In the earlier report obtained by the Associated Press, Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer who wrote it under Pentagon contract, concluded that the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to break the back of the insurgency.

As evidence, he pointed to the Army's 2005 recruiting slump -- missing its recruiting goal for the first time since 1999 -- and its decision to offer much bigger enlistment bonuses and other incentives.

Mr. Rumsfeld said that "retention is up" and that recruitment levels must meet higher goals, ones raised because of the operations on the ground.

At the same time, Mr. Rumsfeld added: "There is no question if a country is in a conflict and we are in the global war on terror, it requires our forces to do something other than what they do in peacetime."

"The force is not broken," Mr. Rumsfeld said, suggesting such an implication was "almost backward."

"The world saw the United States military go halfway around the world in a matter of weeks, throw the Al Qaida and Taliban out of Afghanistan, in a landlocked country thousands and thousands of miles away. They saw what the United States military did in Iraq.

"And the message from that is not that this armed force is broken, but that this armed force is enormously capable," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The Army fell more than 6,600 recruits short of its goal of enlisting 80,000 troops last year, the first time it missed its annual target since 1999 and the largest shortfall in 26 years.

But the Army exceeded its monthly recruiting goal in December for the seventh consecutive month, though some of those targets were lowered from last year's. It will have to increase its recruiting pace, however, to meet its target of 80,000 that it has set for the budget year ending next Sept. 30.

A new law will let the Army attract older recruits, raising the top age from 35 to 42. In addition, financial bonuses for enlistments and re-enlistments have increased.

Also, according to Mr. Rumsfeld, an increased emphasis and spending on Special Operations forces and intelligence operations results from lessons learned in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0012131

The Pentagon's next budget and a broadbased review of U.S. defense strategy should be seen as "the next step in a long line of bold changes" for the military, rather than a list of program adjustments, he said. Both the budget for fiscal 2007 and an update of the Pentagon's long-range plans are to be released early next month.

Special operations and intelligence are among the programs expected to see increased funding in the new spending plan. Mr. Rumsfeld said that improvements in the programs reflect setbacks and successes since the first days of combat in Iraq.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

Rumsfeld Says Army 'Not Broken' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld sparred from afar yesterday with a Pentagon consultant and former Clinton administration officials who say the Army is in danger of "breaking."

A report by retired Army officer Andrew F. Krepinevich Jr., who directs the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the Army could not meet war-fighting missions unless the demands slacken in the coming years.

The report surfaced as former Clinton administration officials and retired officers who backed the presidential bid of Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, put out a similar study saying that the 1.4-million-active-member military is frayed.

Mr. Rumsfeld responded with a combative appearance at a Pentagon press conference. He reminded reporters that during the Clinton years, when the military was sent on about 50 war and peacekeeping missions, that the force suffered from lack of funding and that some units were "hollow pieces."

The Bush administration has requested huge spending increases for the military, with this year's budget at $442 billion, plus about $350 billion to fund operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Mr. Rumsfeld said anyone who concludes that the Army is breaking does not know what he or she is talking about.

"I suspect the people writing these things don't know, either, because I suspect that they don't have any more insight than the other people around here do," he said. "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case."

He said, "The force is not broken ... the world saw the United States military go halfway around the world, and in a matter of weeks throw the al Qaeda and Taliban out of Afghanistan, in a landlocked country thousands and thousands of miles away. They saw what the United States military did in Iraq, and the message from that is not that this armed forces is broken, but that this armed forces is enormously capable."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he was at the White House yesterday, where a group of senators asked about the Army. He said Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, responded that "it's just not correct" that the Army is breaking.

The Associated Press obtained a copy of the Krepinevich study, which contains one chapter titled "The Thin Green Line."

The Army has been a frequent target of such criticism. Last year, the active-duty Army and the Army National Guard missed recruiting goals, as the force of 500,000 active soldiers and reserves waged two wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, forcing year-on, year-off overseas deployments for many.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, heightened the criticism by calling for a quick pullout from Iraq.

The Army issued a statement that although the force is stressed by commitments in the global war against terrorism, it is far from broken. The Army has met recruiting goals for seven consecutive months, after raising enlistment bonuses to as much as $40,000, deploying more recruiters and changing advertising.

Rumsfeld Denies Military Is Stretched Too Thin Defense Secretary Says Troop Retention Up (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday dismissed two new reports warning that the U.S. military is badly stretched by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, calling their authors ill-informed about America's “battle-hardened” forces.

The Clinton administration military had “hollow pieces” that have now been fixed under his leadership, Rumsfeld said. Worries about recruiting and keeping veteran troops are also unfounded, he said.

“People just don't fully understand,” he told reporters at a news conference. Today's military is “battle hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons.”

On Wednesday, former Defense secretary William Perry, former secretary of State Madeleine Albright and congressional Democrats released a report calling on the Bush administration to increase the size of the Army and spend more on replacing equipment worn out in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The two members of the Clinton administration cited the Army's failure last year to meet its recruiting needs as an early sign of trouble. The Army missed by almost 6,600 its goal of 80,000 new recruits in the fiscal year ending Sept. 30. To help prevent another shortfall, this year the Army has increased its percentage of recruits who scored in the lowest category on an aptitude test that every soldier must take.

The Bush administration's actions “fall far short of what is required,” Perry said.

“In order to carry out effective diplomacy, you have to have an effective (military) force,” Albright said. Things are so stretched today that the United States was unable to contribute troops for Haiti's elections, she said.

Their report said U.S. ground forces are under “enormous strain.” It warned of “highly corrosive and potentially long-term effects on the force” if nothing is changed.

The Democratic report came a day after a Pentagon-sponsored review by a retired Army officer issued a similar warning. The study, first reported by the Associated Press, said the military was on “a thin green line,” especially in recruiting, that could snap because of the strain of extended deployments. The author, Andrew Krepinevich, said commanders were weighing their battle plans against the potential strain on forces.

Rumsfeld called such assertions false. “The force is not broken,” he said, and not breaking.

“And there isn't any reason in the world why we shouldn't be able to maintain, with an active and reserve total force … of over 2 million people, why we shouldn't be able to maintain 138,000” troops in Iraq, he said.

Rumsfeld also said the retention of troops is up.

Pentagon sponsored studies such as the one by Krepinevich, head of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, are good to have because they present differing viewpoints, Rumsfeld said.

“It's a useful thing to invite people to make comments and critiques and to opine on this and to opine on that,” he said.

Rumsfeld said he hadn't yet read the Democratic report. However, he said, “These are the people basically, who did that report, who were here in the '90s. And what we're doing is trying to adjust what was left us to fit the 21st century.”

Rumsfeld: Army Not 'Broken' (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday strongly rejected warnings in a Pentagon-contracted study that the Iraq war risks "breaking" the U.S. Army, and he said a recent decision to scale back U.S. troop levels in Iraq did not grow out of a need to relieve the strain on American ground forces.

"The force is not broken," Rumsfeld said at a Pentagon press briefing yesterday. "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case."

On the contrary, Rumsfeld said, the U.S. military is "battle-hardened" and an "enormously capable force," as demonstrated to the world by its swift overthrow of governments in Iraq and Afghanistan. Such proven capability "ought to increase the deterrent rather than weaken it," he added.

Rumsfeld's remarks came in response to questions about two studies released yesterday -- one by a Democratic advisory group chaired by former defense secretary William J. Perry, and another by a military analyst contracted by the Pentagon -- that warned of the long-term consequences of strains on U.S. military manpower and equipment from repeated war-zone deployments. Such stress, if not alleviated, could worsen recruiting and undermine retention, threatening the all-volunteer force, the studies found.

"Soldiers and brigades are being deployed more frequently, and for longer periods, than what the Army believes is appropriate in order to attract and retain the number of soldiers necessary," Andrew F. Krepinevich, executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, wrote in a November 2005 study for the Pentagon first disclosed Tuesday by the Associated Press. "It is not clear, even to Army leaders, how long this practice can be sustained."

Krepinevich concluded that "vigorous efforts should be made to enable a substantial drawdown in U.S. force levels" from Iraq, because "the Army simply cannot sustain the force levels desired to sustain the momentum needed to break the back of the insurgent movement."

Rumsfeld, however, expressed confidence yesterday that the Pentagon could maintain the current troop level of 138,000 in Iraq indefinitely, although he said he did not expect to do so. "There isn't any reason in the world why we shouldn't be able to maintain, with an active and reserve total force concept of over 2 million people, why we shouldn't be able to maintain 138,000," he said.

Rumsfeld also said that a decision announced in December to cut the number of troops in Iraq by this spring to about 130,000 was not driven by a need to ease strain on U.S. forces. "That's just false," Rumsfeld said in response to a reporter's question. He said Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, "is not making his recommendations based on that."

DOJ_NMG_0012133

Since mid-2004, troop levels in Iraq have ranged from about 135,000 to 160,000, requiring Army and Marine combat units to rotate into Iraq with shorter-than-usual stays at home in between. Active-duty Army units, for example, have been spending a year in Iraq and then 15 to 22 months at home -- less than the goal of two years set by Army leaders.

The prospect of serving in Iraq contributed to a shortfall in Army recruiting of nearly 7,000 soldiers last year, Army officials have said, despite large increases in bonuses and incentives. High overall retention helped make up for the deficit, Army figures show.

The second study, by the group commissioned by congressional Democrats and chaired by Perry, criticized what it called the Bush administration's inadequate planning for Iraq. It said not sending sufficient troops and equipment has put the Army and Marine Corps under "enormous strain" that risks undermining national security.

The active-duty Army has a deficit of about 18,000 junior enlisted personnel, the study found. Army manpower has dropped over the past year, falling to the current level of about 492,000 -- about 10,000 short of the goal of 502,000 authorized by Congress, Defense Department figures show.

The study proposed increased funding for recruiting, equipment, as well as a permanent increase of 30,000 soldiers in the Army's active-duty deployable forces. That would allow the Army to increase active-duty combat brigades from 37 to 48, the study said.

But Rumsfeld reiterated yesterday that Army leaders do not seek a permanent growth of 30,000. Moreover, the Army, which had planned to increase its active-duty combat brigades from 33 to 43, last week announced that it seeks to grow to 42 as a result of a top-level review of Pentagon strategy and resources. Together with a cut in National Guard combat brigades, from 34 to 28, that would give the Army 70 total combat brigades instead of the previously planned 77.

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey said in an interview that the change resulted from a new Pentagon goal of being able to sustain a deployment of 18 or 19 combat brigades around the world -- a reduction from a target set by Army leaders of 20 to 21 brigades.

Reserve Members On Active Duty Earn More, Pay Study Says Findings By RAND Counter Prevailing View Of Service (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nearly three-fourths of military reservists called to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq are taking home more money on duty than in their civilian jobs, according to a study on military pay released Wednesday.

In many cases, the troops earn a higher gross salary in civilian life. But when the federal tax exemption and other allowances approved by Congress for troops in combat are factored in, about 72% are better off, according to a study by the RAND Corp., a research institute.

The RAND study, which was funded by the Pentagon, showed an average benefit of 25% over civilian pay, about $10,000 a year.

The study results run counter to complaints by Reserve and Guard troops that they have suffered financially when activated. It is part of an effort to track the war on terrorism's effects on part-time troops. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, those troops have been called up by the tens of thousands.

The Army National Guard, heavily used in Iraq, missed its recruiting goals last year. Currently, about 108,000 Guard and Reserve members are activated.

News coverage of the National Guard and Reserves often focuses on the financial hardships of its members. In 2004, the Defense Department conducted a survey of reservists in which more than half said they lost income when they were deployed.

However, the RAND study found that only about one-fourth of reservists suffered a loss in income after being activated. RAND researchers compared Social Security earnings data for servicemembers before deployment with Defense Department records afterward.

RAND surveyed more than 110,000 Army and Air National Guard and Reserve members for the study.

Though the study ends in 2003, the beginning of the U.S. deployment of troops to Iraq, preliminary figures for later deployments show the pattern continues.

Deployed reservists may have an even higher comparative earnings advantage, said Jacob Klerman, a RAND senior economist and co-author of the study. That's because the data do not track the additional income provided by major corporations to their employees who are in the Reserves or Guard.

DOJ_NMG_0012134

Klerman said the study focused on earnings and doesn't include the extra expenses that reservists often must pay. Also, he said, more research is needed on the long-term effect that being called to active duty has on the careers of Guard and Reserve members.

"We are looking here at earnings while people are activated," Klerman said. "That's different than the question about what will happen when (they) get back."

Stephen Koper, a retired brigadier general and president of the National Guard Association, says the results do nothing to ease the concerns of current or potential Guard members. Koper said the Pentagon needs more professional people and entrepreneurs, but they're being driven away by financial problems caused by serving in the part-time military. "Guardsmen and reservists accept the fact that they are … going to run into certain shortfalls."

DOJ:

Judge Extends Appointment Of U.S. Attorney (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Register, January 26, 2006

Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade has extended the term of U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes, whose temporary appointment to the Mobile office expires this month.

Rhodes took over for David York, who resigned in September amid reports of an internal Department of Justice investigation into allegations that he had an improper relationship with an assistant prosecutor.

The U.S. attorney oversees all federal prosecutions in the Southern District of Alabama, which covers 13 counties. The office includes a staff of 25 lawyers and 27 support workers, and operates on an annual budget of about $5.7 million.

Under the law, the Justice Department could replace York for a maximum of 120 days. The statute gives the chief judge of the district the power to name the U.S. attorney beyond that, and Granade said Tuesday that she complied with a request by the Justice Department to extend Rhodes' tenure until President Bush names a permanent successor.

When appointed to Mobile, Rhodes, 47, was on special assignment to the Justice Department in Washington as a counselor to the assistant attorney general of the criminal division.

From 1990 to 2003, Rhodes served as an assistant U.S. attorney in San Diego, where she prosecuted large drug organizations and returned the first indictments against the leaders of the Tijuana cartel.

In Mobile, Rhodes said, she has not made major changes. "We've been focusing on our work and focusing on our cases," she said.

Rhodes, who eventually will return to the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego, said she has no guess as to how long her stint in Mobile might last.

That depends on how long it takes Alabama's two U.S. senators to agree on a recommendation to the president. With less than three years remaining in Bush's term, it is possible Rhodes will serve until the next presidential election, though Granade said that's unlikely.

"My guess is there will be an appointment. But when or who or how, I don't know," she said.

DHS Helps DOJ With Case Management Systems (FCW)

By Michael Arnone

Federal Computer Week, January 25, 2006

The Homeland Security Department is helping the Justice Department develop new case management systems for the entire federal government, DHS' chief information officer said today.

DHS is working with DOJ to create a Consolidated Enforcement Environment (CEE), which allows access to all available data, analyzes data and links relevant law enforcement partners, DHS' CIO Scott Charbo said.

One goal of the collaboration is to move beyond products and create a layer of information that can be used governmentwide, Charbo said. "The real core to solving the business problem is standardizing data" and real-time information sharing, he said.

Charbo said he didn't know if DHS will have a procurement for CEE because both departments want to leverage as much existing infrastructure as possible, Charbo said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Big Test Looms For Prosecutors At Enron Trial (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

In the court of public opinion, they were convicted long ago. But as Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the onetime leaders of Enron, step into a court of law next week, the outcome of their fraud trial is far from certain, creating one of the most closely watched and hotly contested white-collar criminal cases ever.

On one side of the Houston federal courtroom starting Monday will be two top-flight teams of defense lawyers, who will be taking the risky approach of proclaiming many of the controversial actions of Enron and some much-criticized statements of their clients to be legal and truthful.

On the other, the prosecutors for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who have racked up an impressive array of guilty pleas in the case, but whose performance at trial has been decidedly less dazzling.

"For the government, if they lose the Enron case, it will be seen as a symbolic failure of their rather significant campaign against white-collar crime," said John C. Coffee Jr., a professor at Columbia Law School. "It will be seen as some evidence that some cases are too complicated to be brought into the criminal justice process."

Of the three major Enron-related criminal cases brought by the government before juries, guilty verdicts stand from only one, which involved Enron's booking what the government said were phantom profits on the sale of Nigerian barges to Merrill Lynch. A second case, against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was thrown out by the Supreme Court on appeal. The third, involving the broadband division of Enron, resulted in no convictions, but the five defendants await a retrial.

Those cases involved narrower accusations of wrongdoing than those against Mr. Skilling, 52, who has been charged with dozens of counts, including fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, and Mr. Lay, 63, who is accused of seven counts of fraud and conspiracy. Indeed, this trial will be the first time that the government's theory of the existence of an overarching criminal conspiracy at the company has been put to the test.

Learning its lesson from previous corporate fraud trials involving Enron and other companies, the government is expected to keep this trial as simple as possible to avoid confusing and boring the jury. Riding on the prosecution's success, experts said, is public support.

The implications of the outcome of the case against Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, whose names have become fused to the scandals that have exploded across corporate America in recent years, are sure to be felt far beyond the courtroom.

"Most people in the white-collar world would agree that Enron is the granddaddy of all frauds in the last two decades," said Stephen L. Meagher, a former federal prosecutor who is now a lawyer in San Francisco. "How this comes out is a test of the limits of what the corporate community will tolerate in business practices."

The importance of the trial to the government and the defense is underscored by the millions of dollars each side is committing to the case.

Mr. Skilling, for example, has hired Daniel Petrocelli, a top civil lawyer who has no criminal trial experience but made his name winning a $33.5 million verdict for the family of Ronald Goldman in a wrongful-death suit against O. J. Simpson. Mr. Skilling alone has some two dozen people, half of them lawyers, working full time at a makeshift office near the courthouse. Several more are employed as trial consultants helping with jury selection, which begins Monday.

The government is also committing significant resources, with 8 lawyers and 10 agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation working exclusively on this case.

In presenting the case, the government will be depicting a company where law breaking was commonplace. In official reports from the government, the bankruptcy court and the independent directors of Enron, and in the guilty pleas of former executives, Enron has emerged as a company that failed to follow the dictates of federal securities laws, with executives who deceived investors, directors and, in some cases, one another. While that is helpful to prosecutors, experts said that the government would have to be wary of focusing too much on the broad problems within the company.

"To the extent this becomes more of a trial about Enron and less of a trial about Skilling and Lay, that is likely to play into the defense's strategy to put the accounting techniques on trial rather than the individuals," said Robert A. Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who is now head of white-collar criminal defense at McCarter & English in Newark.

The defense case will focus on the requirements and dictates of accounting and securities rules. While both defendants deny knowledge of some of the brazen crimes, like transactions that resulted in millions of dollars from Enron's coffers being drained into other executives' personal bank accounts, there will be little effort to distance themselves from some of the financial dealings that have become infamous over the last few years. These include Enron's use of byzantine off-books partnerships that helped pretty up the company's balance sheet and improve its income statement.

DOJ_NMG_0012136

Instead, according to people who know both men, their statements and actions will be defended with a simple response: their business practices may have been aggressive, but everything they did was lawful. Both men, who are expected to testify, plan to maintain that many of the accounting and financial decisions were both correct and appropriately disclosed, and their statements about them were truthful.

There are dangers to this strategy. At times, the defense — particularly that of Mr. Skilling, a former chief executive who is charged with playing a direct role in some of the partnership deals — will have to maintain that accounting rules allowed Enron to exaggerate earnings or hide losses, practices that strike outside experts as bizarre and that jurors may have a hard time accepting. There is the complexity of explaining why, if so much of what Enron did was legal and the company's finances were as strong as the executives maintain, the company quickly collapsed into bankruptcy.

There is also one final challenge, which experts refer to as the Simon problem. In a decision from the early 1970's in United States v. Simon, a federal court held that compliance with accounting rules is not, in itself, enough to disprove an accusation of fraud. In that case, the court held that there was also a positive duty for full and fair disclosure under the securities laws, which might not be met simply by following generally accepted accounting principles.

That these executives and this case would ultimately serve as a symbol of an era of corporate corruption might have seemed laughable five years ago, when Enron was repeatedly proclaimed by Wall Street and academics as among the best of the best, a cutting-edge company redefining the boundaries of business.

The government, however, hopes to bring in evidence that it contends will prove that Mr. Lay oversaw a reckless organization from soon after its founding as a gas pipeline company in 1985 with the merger of Houston Natural Gas and Internorth of Omaha. By early 1987, Mr. Lay, then the chairman and chief executive, was confronted with evidence of potential financial wrongdoing by top executives at Enron's oil trading unit in Valhalla, N.Y.

The government will seek to admit testimony that despite hearing the evidence, Mr. Lay allowed the executives to remain and, months later, those same executives committed other improper acts that exposed Enron to as much as $1 billion in losses. While prosecutors have been arguing that they should be allowed to present the Valhalla episode to the jury to show that Mr. Lay had a pattern of tolerating wrongdoers, the federal judge who is hearing the case, Simeon T. Lake III, has not issued a final ruling on whether he will allow such evidence.

A crucial witness in the government's case will be Andrew S. Fastow, the former Enron chief financial officer who has pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the prosecution.

Mr. Fastow was a specialist in the growing business of structured finance, a technique that companies use to gain access to new capital by essentially selling off portions of their risk through the use of off-books partnerships. When such transactions are done properly, at least 3 percent of the entity's capital is contributed by an independent investor. Under the accounting rules, assets sold to the entity can then be moved off the balance sheet and the purchase price can be reported as revenue.

By 1996, Mr. Fastow began committing crimes through use of the off-the-books entities for personal enrichment. He arranged to be the 3 percent investor himself — a strategy that would not have met the accounting standards for independence — then set up elaborate schemes in which bogus "investors" stood in as fronts for him. In one deal, called RADR, Mr. Fastow funneled money to various investors, who then returned profits to him. In another, called Chewco, Mr. Fastow allowed a close colleague, Michael J. Kopper, to control the 3 percent investor, then accepted kickbacks on the deal.

While neither RADR nor Chewco appear in the criminal indictments against Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, the defense lawyers have already argued that they need to explore both transactions in front of the jury to try to prove that Mr. Fastow had a pattern of hiding illicit personal profits from his bosses.

It is this point — from Mr. Fastow's crimes beginning in 1996 to the charges against Mr. Skilling for actions years later — that will serve as a crucial battleground, with both the defense and the government fighting over the questions that the jurors should be asking themselves.

If Mr. Fastow engaged in crimes involving RADR and Chewco without the knowledge of his superiors, the defense argues, how can the jury believe that he told his bosses in later years about similar illegal acts that were used to manipulate Enron's financial reports? But, the government will counter, would Mr. Fastow — along with other executives who have pleaded guilty, including Richard A. Causey, the former chief accounting officer — have engaged in subsequent illegal acts that seemed to solely benefit the company without consulting superiors?

Numerous allegations against both Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling relate little to Mr. Fastow. Instead, they portray the executives as consistently working to disguise the true economic realities of Enron in violation of federal securities laws.

DOJ_NMG_0012137

The economic underpinnings of Enron began to become unhinged in 1998. That summer, Enron entered into several capital intensive transactions that ultimately proved to be abject financial disasters, including a venture into the water business and the purchase of a portion of an electricity distribution plant in Brazil.

The government's case is built not so much on showing that Enron was destroyed by fraud, but rather on showing that fraud, including the suspected deceptions by Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, prevented the marketplace from knowing how badly things were going inside the company. But the cases against the two men are very different. Mr. Skilling faces the most complex series of allegations, which essentially accuse him of leading a concerted effort to make Enron appear more financially sound than it actually was.

Through the use of the off-books partnerships, the company avoided reporting losses and was able to generate tens of millions of dollars in profit. It wrote up the value of certain assets when it needed income, and did not write them back down when circumstances changed. It entered into transactions in which there were secret buyback agreements that would have required accountants, had they known, to remove the related profits from the company's books. All of this, according to the indictment, involved Mr. Skilling.

The charges against Mr. Lay are far narrower, on the other hand. He is not accused of involvement in the partnership machinations; rather, the vast majority of the allegations against him involve public statements he made in the final few months of Enron's existence. The government says that many of those statements, including upbeat assessments of the company's liquidity and business performance, were lies through which Mr. Lay continued the earlier deceptions involving Mr. Skilling.

In many ways, it is fitting for Enron's tale to end with a trial that is widely viewed as a verdict on business practices in the late 1990's. When it was flying high, the energy giant was celebrated from boardrooms to business schools as a lodestar for the future of the corporate world, the embodiment of a company that got everything right. But with its collapse into bankruptcy in 2001 — costing investors billions and pushing thousands of employees out onto the street — it became emblematic of everything wrong in corporate America.

"Enron has become a poster child for an era, so I think people will remember what happens at this trial more than any other white-collar trial that occurs," said Linnea Bernard McCord, associate professor of business law at the Graziadio School of Business and Management at Pepperdine University. "It made a real imprint on everybody's psyche."

Opportunity For Corporate Fraud Has Shrunk -- But It's Still There (WP)

By Carrie Johnson And Ben White

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Four years after the collapse of Enron Corp. spurred the most sweeping revisions in business regulation since the Great Depression, experts warn that the ingredients for a similar financial disaster remain.

Despite new laws and regulations, companies still face enormous pressure to meet short-term financial goals, creating a powerful motive for accounting fraud. Outsized executive compensation grows by the year, offering another rich incentive to cook the books. And there is no certainty that Congress will continue to fund regulatory budgets at current levels.

But some things have changed since December 2001, when Enron's sudden descent into bankruptcy protection rocked investor confidence and left the markets reeling. Accountants face independent oversight for the first time in 70 years. Most corporate board members take their jobs far more seriously. Wall Street is somewhat less willing to accommodate clients' interests.

Nearly a dozen experts contacted by The Washington Post, including regulators, accountants, chief executives, board members and investor advocates, agreed to fill out a corporate governance report card on the eve of the Enron trial.

The Houston energy trader's implosion exposed wide gaps in the safety net designed to protect shareholders, some of which remain today. Former executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling go to trial Monday on fraud and conspiracy charges.

Accountants exploited loopholes to curry favor with companies that paid their fees. Executives collected more than $400 million in salary and bonuses but denied knowing about fraud on their watch. Investment bankers engaged in sham deals to help clients meet quarterly profit targets. Boards of directors waived conflicts-of-interest policies and turned a blind eye to overly aggressive business practices. And overwhelmed regulators failed to devote enough resources to combat fraud.

Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in July 2002, imposing new duties on corporate executives, auditors and directors. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department spent tens of millions of dollars to root out malfeasance. Along the way, prosecutors won criminal convictions and decades-long prison terms for former leaders of Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and WorldCom Inc.

But in a sense, the government efforts may have backfired, inspiring a dangerous overconfidence among investors.

DOJ_NMG_0012138

"I just don't think we are as far along as we need to be," said former SEC chairman Harvey L. Pitt, who led the agency when it brought the biggest-ever fraud case against telecommunications company WorldCom Inc. in 2002. "Many shareholders may have been led to believe that [reforms] have cured all the problems, and we're home free. Unfortunately, that's a prescription for disaster."

The lingering problems were on display late last fall, when commodities-trading firm Refco Inc. collapsed in an accounting scandal just two months after an initial public offering, led by blue-chip investment bank Goldman Sachs and Co. Investors snapped up Refco shares even though the company admitted in its prospectus that there were serious problems with accounting controls. "Could Enron happen again? Sure it could. Just look at Refco," said Henry T.C. Hu, a law professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

The grades suggest that the greatest improvement has been in the regulation of the behavior of accountants who serve as gatekeepers to the markets. New York Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer said the profession has been "scared straight" by fallout from the scandals, which included the death of accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP and a $456 million deferred prosecution settlement by KPMG LLP last year.

Corporate boards get fair marks for meeting more often and paying more attention to the work of auditors. Last year, longtime directors at insurer American International Group Inc. overthrew Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg as chairman after nearly 40 years at the helm after regulators stepped up an accounting probe at the company. And Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board fired star chief executive Carly Fiorina because of dissatisfaction with the way she handled a merger. She was not accused of any wrongdoing at the company.

Even so, many board members still lack the financial know-how to interpret complex information, said Dennis R. Beresford, former chairman of the audit committee at MCI Inc.

At the same time, opposition to some of the changes made since Enron is growing. Increasingly, trade groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and securities law professors, have complained that boards and accountants spend too much time meeting meaningless criteria rather than getting to the root of more insidious problems.

Bob Merritt, the former finance chief at Outback Steakhouse Inc., noisily resigned his post last April after decrying "overzealous" regulations that tied him up in minutiae, far away from business decisions. Many other executives across the country privately applauded his stance.

Jeffrey Stone, a former federal prosecutor who now heads the white-collar defense practice at McDermott Will & Emery, said some new rules, especially one that requires a company and its auditors to examine financial controls, impose heavy costs "that far outstrip the protections that are afforded."

Each of the experts stressed that crooks bent on stealing from a company will still take their chances and some will succeed. Regulators can never pass laws that will force executives to act with integrity -- or force investors to do their homework before they buy stock.

Little has changed to shrink the incentives for taking big risks, business as well as ethical, that can give rise to misdeeds.

Wall Street analysts and reporters still seek guidance about company revenue each quarter. Businesses pay a price for missing targets by even a penny or two. The earnings guidance is "like heroin" for analysts, said Colleen Sayther Cunningham, who leads a trade group for corporate finance officials. "Once you put it into your arm, you can't kick it."

There has been no slowdown in the race for higher executive pay, the experts said. Chief executives won a median pay raise of 30 percent in 2004, twice the increase from 2003, according to the Corporate Library, a watchdog group that rates public companies on corporate governance. Repeated studies have shown virtually no connection between high compensation and good corporate performance.

"As long as CEO pay is so fundamentally out of whack, we cannot say that boards are doing their job or that corporate governance reform has been accomplished," said Nell Minow, an investor advocate and co-founder of the Corporate Library.

Some companies have moved away from compensating top executives with stock options now that they are required to count them as an expense. But in numerous cases, they have simply replaced options, which pay off only if a company's stock performs well, with restricted shares, which promise a gain for executives no matter what. Critics refer to such compensation as "pay for pulse."

William J. McDonough, former leader of an accounting industry oversight panel, said recent initiatives, including a drive by the SEC to beef up disclosures about executive pay, are heartening. In all, though, there is "not as much [progress] as I'd like to see. I don't think anybody including me has any theory of how executive compensation should be set."

In addition, investor advocates said they fear that once the Enron trial ends and the focus on corporate crime fades, regulatory budgets could again get squeezed. "Already, recent appropriations have not matched agency funding requests," said Barbara Roper, chief of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America.

DOJ_NMG_0012139

The outcome of the Enron trial could have a more profound impact on attitudes among corporate executives in the long run than the regulatory changes, said Harvey J. Goldschmid, a law professor and former SEC official.

"Deterrence is very important, and this trial is of large consequence for that reason," Goldschmid said.

Staff writers Brooke A. Masters and Steven Pearlstein contributed to this report.

Enron Woes Reverberate Through Lives Many Saw Retirement Plans Evaporate With Stock Price (USAT)

By Stephanie Armour

USA Today, January 26, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS — Roger Boyce was looking forward to retirement from Enron's Minneapolis Gas Pipeline Group in 2000.

His Enron stock was worth more than $2 million on paper. With that nest egg and other investments, Boyce anticipated a comfortable retirement that he'd spend traveling and funding his six grandchildren's college educations.

That didn't happen. At 71, he works full time in the summer months doing business consulting at a pool and spa company. Much of his savings evaporated in Enron's financial collapse in 2001, leaving him less able to travel and with little to contribute to the grandchildren's college expenses. Initially, there was a lot of bitterness and resentment because of the sense of betrayal that he and other former employees felt.

Four years after the Texas energy giant began its meltdown — and on the eve of a criminal trial for its former top executives — many former Enron employees still feel betrayed.

How did it happen? Like many employees, Boyce believed in Enron's stock. He bought and held Enron shares until it was too late to get out. About 20,000 participants in Enron retirement plans lost about $1.1 billion in their accounts, according to a lawsuit and lawyers for the workers.

Former employees who thought they'd be well off have abandoned retirement visions that included taking expensive pleasure trips and financing philanthropic projects. Some, at the end of their careers, have started over again in new jobs — but working harder to keep up with younger co-workers. They've turned to churches and food pantries to eat, sold homes they could no longer pay for, and endured financial stresses that frayed their marriages.

“A lot of them aren't doing well. The older workers had retired, and then they had to go to work. They're too old to make it up,” says Lynn Sarko, a Seattle-based lawyer representing many employees in lawsuits to recover some of the lost retirement funds. “They've had trouble getting jobs, and some have taken jobs that are a step down. There's a lot of anger.”

Enron workers' retirement savings were demolished because their 401(k) assets were mostly invested in company stock, which was considered a sound investment until late 2001. That October, Enron shocked Wall Street by announcing a quarterly loss and a big write-off of some investments. The Securities and Exchange Commission began an investigation. But for about three weeks in October and November, employees were blocked from selling the stock in their accounts. Enron shares, which had reached $90 in 2000, fell to less than a $1 after the company filed for bankruptcy-court protection on Dec. 2, 2001.

“Enron was held in such high esteem that employees had confidence in the company. We were misled all the way. This has compromised the quality of all of our lives after so many years of saving to that end,” says Boyce, of Edina, Minn., who was director of human resources for the northern region of Enron's pipeline group. “The trial is finally bringing this thing to an end; it's bringing some closure.”

Dale and Darlene Roberts are still waiting for closure. In 2001, Dale earned $3,000 a month as a field mechanic at Enron in Oklahoma. The Enron stock in his 401(k) account was worth roughly $50,000.

Within months, the couple lost it all: his job and the money in the stock. Dale was laid off, and the couple got by on $1,200 a month in unemployment until that ran out after six months. Darlene, a hairdresser, was disabled and couldn't work. Dale was out of work for more than two years.

The family house was briefly put into foreclosure, but they sold one of their cars to make the payments.

“I was devastated. We'd owned that home for almost 10 years. It was horrifying,” Darlene says.

They also sold belongings such as tools and went to their local church for basic food supplies. It was humiliating, she says, to get a chicken, canned goods, toilet paper and soap from strangers.

“We lost everything. We had to sell things just to be able to live. We had to go to the church to eat,” says Darlene, of Duncan, Okla.

Dale, 54, now has a job as a mechanic for a different company, but bitterness about the experience lingers. He earns less than he did at Enron.

“Things are much, much better, but it caused physical and mental anguish, and it caused stress on our marriage,” says Darlene, 54. “I am very bitter. I don't believe there's enough justification for what they did. Greed is a horrible, horrible thing.”

DOJ_NMG_0012140

Enron's collapse has delayed retirements and led to desperate efforts to rebuild savings.

Roy Rinard, 57, has worked since 1980 at Portland General Electric (PGE), which Enron purchased in 1997. PGE is a stable, well-known utility founded in 1889. Many of those at PGE have had parents and grandparents who worked there; employees such as Rinard felt comfortable with their future.

Rinard says he lost $470,000 after Enron went under. At first, he and his wife, Vicki, a nurse, felt panic. “It was just gone overnight. You can't imagine the feeling that everything you've worked your whole life for — your retirement — is dashed,” Roy says. “We would drive around and say, ‘What are we going to do now?' ”

Within six months, they made the painful decision to sell their home, a 2,800-square-foot house on two acres in Damascus, Ore., to buy a much smaller home in Welches. That meant they could put more money away for retirement. They began saving furiously, living on a tight budget, giving up plans to travel or buy expensive presents for their two granddaughters and two grandsons.

Roy realized he could not retire at 60. He wouldn't have enough money. Now, he's trying to work until 67, hoping that by then, he'll have saved at least $200,000, half what he'd expected to have four years ago.

It's tough work. In one two-week stretch, Roy put in more than 130 hours of overtime on top of 80 hours of regular work in his job as a lineman troubleshooter.

“You're out in the cold, up on poles at night in all kinds of weather. I'm hoping physically I can work to 67. But even then, I won't have near the retirement nest egg,” he says. “It's a sick feeling. To start over at 55 — it's hard.”

Some employees say that they strive not to become bitter or to think about what might have been. Steve Lacey, an emergency repair dispatcher with PGE in Portland, didn't see any reason to worry. The value of his Enron shares ranged from $160,000 to $260,000 before Enron fell apart.

“It was all fake,” he says.

Lacey, 49, of Salem, Ore., still works for PGE. The now independent company is expected to become a publicly traded company again in April. He says he still feels the reverberations of the Enron turmoil. But he's trying hard, he says, to put those days behind him.

“I'm not going to say that I feel good about losing that money. You scrounged and saved in those early working days to save that, and that makes me mad. It's made me a pretty bitter American citizen,” Lacey says. “But if you dwell on it, it will ruin the rest of your life.”

The experience also brought him to Washington. In 2002, Lacey spoke before a congressional hearing on Enron pension and retirement issues and tried to explain what losing savings is like.

“That was the hardest thing I've ever done, was to sit down and explain to my wife that I had lost everything,” he said. “And that's probably one of the few times I've ever really emotionally broke down and cried in my whole life. And that was a tough night, and I won't forget it.”

But in some cases, former employees — especially younger workers who were far from retirement — have rebounded.

Matt Hommel, 36, lost several thousand dollars and his job at Enron Online in Enron's unraveling, but was recalled after a few days. While still working for the beleaguered company, he took his time picking over job offers. For the past four years, he's worked as a technology consultant at Texas Instruments.

“There was such a media furor over Enron's crash that everyone knew the whole story. People ask, ‘What was it like to go through a piece of history like that?' ” says Hommel, a married father of two young daughters in League City, Texas. “It's something I actually went through.”

Despite a rebound more successful than that of some former employees, the experience changed him. “I'm a little more careful now. If I work at a company, I ask more questions. I want to be sure my trust is appropriately placed,” he says. “It shows you that no matter how up the Fortune 500 you are, anything can fall.”

Recovering from the Enron crash has been especially hard for those on the cusp of retirement, who had counted on 401(k)s and have little time left in their working years to save again.

In 2001, Tom Padgett, 63, was within six months of retiring and was feeling pretty good about his retirement. The former senior lab technician had 11,000 Enron shares — worth about $700,000 before Enron's bankruptcy — in his 401(k). He and his wife, Karen, had planned to spend their retirement opening and operating a ranch for disabled children.

Then the scandal erupted. Now, he's a lab technician at another company, and expects to work another seven or eight years. The stress of the financial loss has worsened Karen's rheumatoid arthritis, he says.

“I have to continue to work even though I don't want to. And it's harder at my age. I've had to work a lot harder than I used to,” says Tom, of Mont Belvieu, Texas. “It's had an emotional impact on me and my wife both. She had always wanted to start a ranch for handicapped kids, to allow parents to have a free week or weekend. … Some days are good, and some are bad. They're bad when we sit and think about what we could have done.”

DOJ_NMG_0012141

Former Broker Pleads Guilty In Market Timing Probe (AP)

By Michael Gormley, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

A former Las Vegas securities broker pleaded guilty to a felony charge Wednesday in a mutual fund investigation in which investors were defrauded through improper late trading and market timing, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

Daniel Calugar, 52, now of Ponte Vedra, Fla., pleaded guilty in state Supreme Court in New York City to violating a state business integrity law called the Martin Act. He was accused of entering into a secret agreement in August, 2001, that defrauded a mutual fund called the Franklin Small-Mid Cap Growth Fund.

He faces up to four years in prison when he is sentenced March 23.

His attorney didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

Earlier this month, Calugar agreed to pay $153 million to settle civil charges brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Calugar will relinquish $103 million in ill-gotten gains and pay a civil penalty of $50 million, the largest penalty regulators have imposed on an individual in a late trading and market timing case, SEC officials said.

Calugar is also banned from working for a brokerage firm.

Spitzer said Calugar secretly agreed to a deal with an employee of Franklin's investment adviser. Calugar would be allowed to rapidly trade in the mutual fund without paying a 2 percent penalty. Calugar then invested $10 million in another hedge fund run by Franklin and defrauded the fund and its shareholders of more than $1 million in fees that he avoided.

Calugar also paid $72 million to settle a class action civil suit that will compensate investors.

Market timing of mutual funds, which involves rapid in-and-out trades, is not illegal but is prohibited by many funds because it can disadvantage ordinary shareholders by diluting the value of their shares. Late trading involves trades placed after the market close at that day's closing price. Many of the cases brought by Spitzer and the SEC in recent years have targeted mutual fund companies that allowed favored clients such as hedge funds to engage in market timing.

In 2004, two Franklin Templeton Investments units agreed to pay $5 million to settle a Massachusetts complaint that accused the firm of allowing a big hedge fund investor to make inappropriate mutual fund trades. The San Mateo, Calif.-based Franklin Templeton said that while it did not admit or deny any wrongdoing, the company settled to move forward. No individuals were charged.

Livedoor Inquiry Prompts Focus On Japan's Accounting Rules (WSJ)

By Yuka Hayashi And Andrew Morse

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

TOKYO -- The investigation into Internet company Livedoor Co. has pointed a spotlight on another practice in Japan that needs upgrading: accounting standards.

On Monday, Tokyo district prosecutors arrested Livedoor Chief Executive Takafumi Horie on suspicion of violating securities law, raising questions about how the company used complex financial practices to grow through acquisitions and whether it manipulated its financial statements to prop up shares of an affiliate.

Prosecutors also raided the office of Koyo & Co., a small accounting firm in Yokohama that audited Livedoor's financial statements, according to Japanese media reports. A Koyo spokeswoman declined to comment on the investigations.

Separately, Livedoor said yesterday that Mr. Horie resigned as a director, a day after he stepped down as president and chief executive of the company he founded 10 years ago.

Yesterday on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, Livedoor shares fell 22%, or 39 yen (34 U.S. cents), to 137 yen a share, a fifth of what they were worth before Livedoor offices were raided Jan. 16. Trading was limited to 90 minutes on concerns that high volume could overwhelm the exchange's computers.

In the U.S., similar investigations into such companies as Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. resulted in sweeping changes in accounting rules. In Japan, experts now are calling for stepped-up efforts to improve accounting standards, as companies -- particularly smaller start-ups -- increasingly use sophisticated and aggressive financial techniques.

Japan has no standards on accounting for special-purpose companies -- a tool used by Enron and other U.S. firms in the past to keep certain financial deals off their books. Tokyo prosecutors alleged that Livedoor relied on a similar vehicle to make an acquisition and to print and sell more shares of an affiliate.

Also lacking are rules on how to interpret revenue at Internet and software companies, whose business structures tend to differ significantly from those of traditional companies.

Changes are beginning to take place. In October, the Financial Services Agency issued a guideline calling for closer examination of accounting firms and requiring companies to rotate their accountants more frequently. Meanwhile, the Accounting Standards Board of Japan adopted a handful of standards in the past two months, covering areas from mergers and acquisitions to executive compensation.

DOJ_NMG_0012142

Other newly established standards are forcing Japanese companies to be more transparent, investors say. Just a few years ago, publicly traded companies were required to release their earnings only twice a year. Now, they give investors updates on a quarterly basis.

Still, Livedoor raises questions about Japan's accounting practices, including the nature of the relationship between a company and its accounting firm. These include what resources an accounting firm should have to handle a publicly traded company and how dependent it should be on a single client.

Koyo, founded in 1998, has just 12 certified public accountants, according to its Web site. It had no publicly traded companies as clients until April 2000, when it did the books for the initial public offering of Livin' on the Edge, Livedoor's predecessor. A person at Koyo declined to discuss the company's involvement with Livedoor.

As Livedoor acquired more companies, it shifted their accounting services to Koyo, even though those acquisitions had been using bigger, more established accountancies. Now, Koyo works with many Livedoor-group companies, making the Internet conglomerate one of the accountancy's biggest clients.

ValueClick Japan Inc., an Internet-advertising distributor, was one of those companies. Before Livedoor bought a 29.3% stake in ValueClick in 2004, the company used Chuo Aoyama Audit Corp., a member of the PricewaterhouseCoopers group that has more than 1,200 certified public accountants. Now the company, currently called Livedoor Marketing Co., uses tiny Koyo.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Senator Seeks Information On Subpoena Of Google (REU-Y2)

By James Vicini

Reuters, January 26, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee's top Democrat asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales what steps are being taken to protect Americans' privacy rights as the Justice Department demands information about Internet searches.

In the letter released on Wednesday, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont asked Gonzales about the subpoena to Google Inc. and three other companies seeking data about what millions of Americans search for on the Internet's leading search engines.

Leahy asked about the types of information being sought, how the department intends to use the information while protecting individual privacy rights and civil liberties and whether it will issue any additional subpoenas.

Leahy's letter comes at a time of growing criticism in Congress over the government's monitoring of communications, after the disclosure that the Bush administration has been conducting domestic eavesdropping after the September 11 attacks.

In court papers filed in California last week, the department said Google had refused to comply with the subpoena issued last year for 1 million random Web addresses from its databases and for records of all searches entered on Google during any one-week period.

The government said it needed the information to prepare its case defending the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. The law prohibited Internet companies from knowingly making available obscene or pornographic material to minors.

The Justice Department has said that America Online, Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp. had all complied with similar requests for the information. America Online is owned by Time Warner Inc.

Mountain View, California-based Google, the world's No. 1 Internet search engine, advertises its informal code of conduct as "Don't be evil."

Leahy said the collection and use by government law enforcement agencies of such data posed unique concerns.

He said it raised "the specter of excessive government surveillance that may intrude upon important privacy interests and chill the exercise of" constitutionally protected free-speech rights under the First Amendment.

Leahy asked how the department is addressing the privacy and civil liberties concerns raised by the collection, storage and use of such data.

He also asked whether the department requested or obtained any personally identifiable information.

Gonzales has defended the subpoena and has rejected concerns that individual privacy rights might be violated. The department's request to force Google to comply with the subpoena is pending before a federal judge in California.

Google on Tuesday said it would voluntarily block politically sensitive terms on its new China site, bowing to conditions set by Beijing in return for access to the world's second largest Internet market.

DOJ_NMG_0012143

Senator Demands Info On Search Engine Subpoena (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 25, 2006

A top Senate Democrat is demanding details about the Bush administration's motives for sending subpoenas to Google, America Online, Microsoft's MSN and Yahoo.

In a two-page letter (click here for PDF) sent Tuesday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont asked the department to outline the type of information it has requested, its reasons for the requests, the steps it is taking to safeguard any data obtained, and any plans to issue additional subpoenas in the future.

Late last week, it was reported that federal prosecutors had subpoenaed the companies for millions of search records for use in preparing their upcoming defense of the constitutionality of a controversial Internet pornography law.

That 1998 pornography law, called the Child Online Protection Act, or COPA, restricts sexually explicit material deemed "harmful to minors" on commercial Web sites. The Supreme Court raised questions about its constitutionality in 2004 and sent the law back to a Philadelphia-based federal appeals court for further review.

"I am interested in learning more about the extent to which the Department of Justice is relying upon data mining of the Internet search queries made by law-abiding American citizens to support its efforts under COPA and how the department is addressing the privacy and civil liberties concerns raised by the collection, storage and use of that data," wrote Leahy, the Senate Judiciary Committee's top-ranking Democrat.

Google vowed last week to fight a renewed request from the agency, calling the subpoena overbroad. Yahoo, Microsoft and AOL all conceded that they have turned over some records, noting that they did so in a limited fashion involving only aggregated data and no personally identifiable information.

Leahy said in his letter that his concerns came "against the backdrop of strong public concern over the government's monitoring of Internet communications and warrantless eavesdropping on the telephone conversations of American citizens."

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the department planned to respond accordingly, though he was not sure what the response would entail.

As for the privacy concerns raised by Leahy, "We've addressed that in our subpoenas and to the search engines," Miller said. "We weren't seeking information about the individuals, we were only seeking the search terms....We don't even want to know the names of the people."

Davis Takes Issue With Google Over Records Request (GCN)

By Brad Grimes, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, January 25, 2006

REDMOND, Wash.— House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) said today that search giant Google Inc. has “bent over backward” to comply with the Chinese government’s demand that it block certain search results in order to operate in that country. So why, he wondered, won’t the company cooperate with the U.S. Justice Department in its efforts to fight online pornography?

Google has refused a Justice Department subpoena for search results, saying it violated users’ privacy. The government has said it needs the data to prepare a case regarding the 1998 Child Online Protection Act.

Other search companies have complied with the subpoena.

The company today also launched a Chinese version of its search site after agreeing to censor topics such as Falun Gong and Tibet.

“Google gave the Chinese everything they wanted. They’re not going to put data on there about human rights,” Davis said.

Davis spoke to public-sector CIOs today at a summit hosted by Micrsosoft Corp. Microsoft’s MSN service also censors search results in China, as do Yahoo and others. Microsoft, Yahoo and America Online have also reportedly given the Justice Department information it was seeking.

“What does it mean to be a corporate citizen, working to bring terrorists or child pornographers to bear? What are the boundaries?” Davis said. “These are new areas for a lot of us that we’ve got to work our way through.”

Davis did not expect there to be a standoff over the issue, but he clearly hoped an agreement could be reached between Google and the Justice Department.

“Google has shown an ability to be flexible when it’s in their business interests,” Davis said. “And I’m hoping the government will show the appropriate flexibility in trying to get what we need without everybody feeling that every time you Google something, the government’s going to be looking over your shoulder.”

DOJ_NMG_0012144

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) today released a letter he'd sent to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez asking for more information about the subpoenaed information and how the Justice Department was protecting personal privacy in its efforts.

UPDATE: Google Stands Up To US, Accedes To China (DOWJONES)

By Riva Richmond, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, January 25, 2006

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- In the last week, Google Inc. (GOOG) (GOOG) stood up to one government and acquiesced to another.

The moves show the kind of treacherous terrain the Internet giant, whose corporate philosophy is "Don't Be Evil," must traverse as it weighs its ideals and its business interests. It also spotlights how important Google (GOOG) has become as a key waypoint on the global Internet, where individual and government interests around access to information can and do collide.

Google (GOOG) said late Tuesday it plans to launch a Chinese search service this week, Google.cn, that will censor query results to comply with Chinese government restrictions on information about such sensitive political subjects as Taiwan and Tibet independence and the Tiananmen Square massacre. The company, which is determined to expand its presence in China's huge and fast-growing Internet market, said the move was necessary to provide Chinese users with better site performance.

Last week, the company said it would "vigorously" oppose a U.S. Department of Justice motion to compel Google (GOOG) to provide data about consumer Web searches. The request didn't seek personal information about consumers' online activities, but Google (GOOG) argued in an October letter to the DOJ that turning over the information would create an unacceptable perception it's amenable to turning over private information about it's customers. It also made a number of other arguments, including concerns key trade secrets could be revealed.

"Google (GOOG) is at the cutting edge in terms of trying to figure out what is acceptable and what is not acceptable in this century," when the Internet is making information more accessible than ever before, says Lauren Gelman, associate director of Stanford Law School's Center for Internet and Society. " What happens to information Google (GOOG) collects? I think this is a big question for society as new technologies evolve and we have to rethink privacy and censorship."

Criticism came swiftly from Reporters Without Borders, a press freedom group that has spoken out aggressively recently about Internet-company practices in repressive countries. "The launch of Google.cn is a black day for freedom of expression in China," the group said in a statement. "The firm defends the rights of US Internet users before the US government but fails to defend its Chinese users against theirs."

"These are two different issues," a Google (GOOG) spokesman said in an email. "We judge requests for information on a case by case basis - just as we do in America and all the countries in which we operate. Whenever we deal with these requests, we will respond - as we do in all markets - in the manner we feel best balances key Google (GOOG) values: our users' interests, expanding access to information and responding to local conditions."

In the two cases, Google's (GOOG) divergent approaches appear to be a matter of where it has legal recourse to fight perceived wrongs. Google (GOOG) can fight the U.S. government in court and get a fair hearing, but its options in China are far more limited.

In China, the question, says Gelman, is: "Do I say 'no thank you' and walk away, or do I engage and operate by the rules China sets out?"

That was apparently an agonizing question for Google (GOOG). But after months of internal debate, executives concluded they could not say 'no' to China, which has the world's second largest Internet population at more than 100 million and rising fast.

"As an emerging economic powerhouse, China is developing rapidly, thanks in no small measure to the Internet. We firmly believe, with our culture of innovation, Google (GOOG) can make meaningful and positive contributions to the already impressive pace of development in China," said Google Senior Policy Counsel Andrew McLaughlin in a statement.

Still, with Google.cn, the company tried to balance its mission to make information universally accessible with its competitive need to expand its foothold in China. The service will exclude links to sites offensive to the Chinese government in exchange for permission to use computer servers located in China. But Google (GOOG) plans to alert users when material has been censored by placing a short notice at the bottom of the Web page, as it has done in Germany and France when excluding sites with Nazi paraphernalia.

Google's (GOOG) current Chinese-language search service, which uses servers in the U.S., will remain in operation. That site has suffered service slowdowns because of Beijing's own efforts to filter content.

"While removing search results is inconsistent with Google's (GOOG) mission, providing no information (or a heavily degraded user experience that amounts to no information) is more inconsistent with our mission," McLaughlin said.

The company also said it will not host blogs or email on computer servers in China to avoid the possibility of requests for users' personal information, a minefield rival Yahoo Inc. (YHOO) (YHOO) stepped into last year in a case that sent a Chinese journalist to jail.

In the Justice Department situation, the government served Google (GOOG) with a subpoena in late August that requested Google (GOOG) provide all Web addresses that could be found through its search engine and a list of all search queries handled between June 1 and July 31. The request was part of the DOJ's efforts to defend the Child Online Protection Act, a 1998 law designed to shield minors from online pornography.

While Google (GOOG) objected, rivals Yahoo (YHOO), Microsoft Corp. (MSFT)'s (MSFT) MSN unit and Time Warner Inc. (TWX)'s (TWX) America Online (TWX) complied with the requests for search data.

In its October letter, Google (GOOG) called the agency's request "overbroad, unduly burdensome, vague and intended to harass." It also argued compliance could endanger its "crown-jewel trade secrets." Observers have also speculated that Google (GOOG) may be concerned about drawing attention to its role in steering Web surfers to pornographic sites and revenue it derives from porn-industry ads.

Google's (GOOG) resistance to the request, until the China news hit, made the company a hero with privacy advocates, who have worried about how much personal data Google (GOOG) collects about Web users and how it might use that information.

-By Riva Richmond, Dow Jones Newswires; 201-938-5670; riva.richmond@ dowjones.com

Google's Dilemma: Privacy Vs. Police (CSM)

By G. Jeffrey Macdonald

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

It's an age-old business dilemma caught up in the new age of globalization: When governments demand something that compromises the interests of customers, what's a company to do?

That's the question now before American telecommunications and Internet companies.

This week, for example, Internet giant Google is launching a new search service in China that, because of government sensitivities there, will limit what users there can access. They already couldn't see links to objectionable sites. Now, they won't be able to use Google for e-mail messaging or writing blogs.

But at the same time as Google is acceding to some Chinese government demands, it is vigorously fighting US government efforts to obtain data on its users' search habits.

Some observers see a double standard. Others call it a careful balancing act. What's clear is that controversies over the electronic intrusiveness of government don't disappear in a data-glutted age. In fact, they're heating up.

Last week in a spirited speech, former Vice President Al Gore called on telecommunications companies to stop helping US federal agents hunt for terrorists by listening in on international calls without a warrant.

Some observers say Google needs to stand up to the US. "I would make absolutely no distinction between what's happening in China and what's happening in this country," says Geoffrey Bowker, director of the Center for Science, Technology and Society at Santa Clara University in California. "The US government has [entered] the overreaching state that governments naturally fall into. They know the data's there. They want to use it.... I'm happy to see Google fighting it."

Others are appalled by the lack of cooperation, especially in time of war.

"I would like to think that there remains a reservoir - call it patriotism, if you will, or call it civic duty - within the private sector that does not require companies to be leaned on in order to cooperate," says Frank Gaffney, president of the Center for Security Policy in Washington. "I have to ask the question: Are these companies, and Google comes to mind, putting up more of a fight to provide assistance to our government in protecting Americans than they are to [resist] Communist China? ... My guess is the answer is yes."

The US government claims to need the data to help reinstate a law aimed at blocking access to child pornography.

So far, Google seems to be winning points for its tough stand against the US Department of Justice. According to one survey released this week, 56 percent of American users of the Internet believe Google should not release information about Web searches to the government.

"Google is not a party to this lawsuit, and [the government's] demand for information overreaches," says Nicole Wong, associate general counsel at Google. "We had lengthy discussions with them to try to resolve this, but were not able to and we intend to resist their motion vigorously."

But overseas, Google has endured criticism, as has Microsoft's MSN search service, for limiting what Chinese users can find. Yahoo! China faced especially sharp rebuke last year for supplying data about Shi Tao, a dissident Chinese journalist and Yahoo! user now serving a 10-year jail term. Yahoo! China said it was simply abiding by local laws.

Unlike Google, Yahoo! and Microsoft complied with the US government's request because they say they weren't supplying personally identifiable data.

Such acquiescence is normal, industry insiders say. "I don't know if a lot of companies are in the business of civil disobedience," says Bruce Bernstein, president of the New York Software Industry Association. "In most cases, they would ask counsel, and in most cases, the lawyers would tell them to follow the path of least resistance. And they'll comply."

Still, companies are wary of the risks of being seen as negligent on privacy. Such concerns got a high-profile showcase on Martin Luther King Jr. Day when Mr. Gore addressed the issue in a widely reported speech. "Any telecommunications company that has provided the government with access to private information concerning the communications of Americans without a proper warrant should immediately cease and desist their complicity in this apparently illegal invasion of the privacy of American citizens."

In the meantime, high-tech companies with membership in Business for Social Responsibility are scrambling to tighten and clarify their privacy policies for customers before the government comes knocking again, says a spokesperson for the San Francisco-based group. Its advice: be forthright with the public if you do supply the government with information, and don't forget you have rights.

In Case About Google's Secrets, Yours Are Safe (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google, by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web.

But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure.

The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants.

But "this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues," said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. "These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words."

In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. "Google objects," the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote, "because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets."

Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality.

"Google's acceding to the request would suggest that it is willing to reveal information about those who use its services," he wrote. "This is not a perception that Google can accept."

Even Google's allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google. But not on privacy grounds. "We will probably not be making that argument," said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union.

The issues raised by the new subpoena, while substantial, are fairly technical, according to Professor Wu. "The legal point here is what is the relevancy standard for subpoenas?" he said. "That is interesting to procedure scholars but to no one else."

Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved.

A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. "We specifically stated in our requests," he said, "that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google."

None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not.

The problem with the subpoena, Mr. Fine said, is more general. "This is another instance of government overreaching," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0012147

The government says it needs Google's information to defend a challenge from the civil liberties union to a 1998 law, the Child Online Protection Act, which makes it a crime to make "material that is harmful to minors" commercially available on the Web. The law was enjoined by a federal court in Philadelphia before it became effective, and it has never been enforced.

In 2004, the United States Supreme Court affirmed the injunction, ruling that filtering devices may work as well or better than criminal prosecutions in achieving the law's aims of keeping some offensive materials away from children, and it sent the case back for a trial to explore that question.

At a trial scheduled to start in October, the government will try to prove that filters are ineffective. Philip B. Stark, an expert retained by the government and a statistics professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said in a court filing that the Web addresses and search terms sought from Google and other Internet companies would help him "to measure the effectiveness of content filters."

The government apparently wants to show that real-world searches will pull up offensive materials that filters will not catch. Why it needs Google to do that is unclear, and Professor Stark declined a request for an interview, citing the pending litigation.

Google has not yet filed a response in court, and it has not discussed the case publicly beyond a brief statement citing government overreaching. Its fullest explanation of its position was in Mr. Ramani's letter in October.

Google objected, Mr. Ramani said, because the fit between what the government seeks and what it seeks to prove is poor. He also said that collecting and providing the information was burdensome and that the government could find it elsewhere.

Mr. Ramani did say that "one could envision scenarios" where Internet searches alone could reveal private information, but he provided no examples. But Google's main argument was that its "highly proprietary" trade secrets could be jeopardized.

Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a civil liberties group that has frequently been critical of Google, said the trade-secrets argument was a serious one.

In other contexts, Google and other Internet companies say they are serious about protecting privacy. But their privacy policies acknowledge that they will comply with valid requests from the government and private litigants. Google's policy, for instance, says it may share users' personal information if it has "a good faith belief" that disclosure "is reasonably necessary to satisfy any applicable law, regulation, legal process or enforceable government request." Nicole Wong, Google's associate general counsel, said in an interview that the company "complies with valid legal process."

According to a 2004 decision of a federal court in Virginia, America Online alone responds to about 1,000 criminal warrants each month. AOL, Google and other Internet companies also receive subpoenas in divorce, libel, fraud and other types of civil cases. With limited exceptions, they are required by law to comply.

Ms. Wong said Google tried to notify users so they could object in court before the company turned over information about them. But the law forbids such notification in some criminal cases.

Even notification can be small comfort. It means a user must quickly and often at considerable expense find a lawyer and try to persuade a court to quash the subpoena. But the law often offers very limited protection for personal information held by third parties.

That approach no longer makes sense, said Daniel J. Solove, a law professor at George Washington University. "In the information age," he said, "so much of our information is in the hands of third parties."

Mr. Rotenberg said Internet search records, if collected and linked to individuals, could give rise to a particularly profound invasion of privacy. "It's kind of the shadow of the thoughts within your head — your interests, your desires, your hobbies, your fears," he said.

The situation is more complicated outside the United States. Internet companies have complied with local laws, as they must to do business abroad. Yahoo, for instance, provided information that helped China send a journalist there to prison for 10 years on charges of leaking state secrets to a foreign Web site.

Still, the current subpoena to Google, legal experts said, has given rise to an important debate, whether the facts of the case are apt or not.

"It allows us to have a national dialogue about whether current privacy protections are adequate," said Susan P. Crawford, a specialist in Internet law at the Cardozo Law School. Even if the Justice Department is not seeking private information now, she said, "the next subpoena could ask for that kind of data."

`Key Player' Pleads Guilty To Morial-era City Hall Corruption (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A businessman described by federal prosecutors as a key player pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiring in a kickback scheme for the biggest contract signed while Marc Morial was New Orleans mayor.

Advertisement

Terry Songy oversaw a $65 million, 20-year contract to upgrade chillers, boilers, lights and other energy-related fixtures in city buildings for Johnson Controls Inc.

He admitted taking kickbacks from subcontractors, participating in a larger kickback conspiracy with the city's director of property management, and failing to file federal income tax returns for 2001, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

According to an indictment handed up in June, the kickbacks allegedly enriched some of the closest associates of Morial, who served two terms as mayor and now is president of the National Urban League. He has not been charged, and has refused to comment about the investigation.

Federal officials have said the contract cost New Orleans tens of thousands of unnecessary dollars, while benefiting the Morial associates handsomely.

Songy's sentencing was set April 19. He could get up to five years for conspiracy and three on the income tax charge, with a $250,000 fine for each — though first offenders rarely get the maximum sentence.

Five subcontractors pleaded guilty earlier to paying kickbacks.

When the six entered not guilty pleas in mid-August, prosecutors said they all were cooperating with the government and were likely to make plea agreements.

An affidavit filed with the guilty plea states that, after FBI agents approached him, Songy "admitted his involvement in a much larger scheme than the government was aware" of.

The indictment described Songy as sharing hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks with the three major defendants: Morial associates Stan "Pampy" Barre, a restaurant owner and Morial confidant, city property manager Kerry De Cay, and construction company owner Reginald Walker.

Barre, who also owned a Johnson Controls subcontractor called Commmon Street Ventures, allegedly shared $546,000 with co-conspirators. Walker's company received a large subcontract from Johnson Controls, prosecutors said.

All three have denied wrongdoing.

Their trial is scheduled Sept. 5 before U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier.

Six Indicted In Driver's License Fraud (TENN)

By CLAY CAREY, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, January 26, 2006

A widespread bribery scheme funneled hundreds of illegal aliens into a Winchester, Tenn.-based driving school, netting them fraudulent licenses. And six people, including one current and one former state employee, got more than $146,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday.

The U.S. attorney's office yesterday unsealed a six-count indictment of the six people who are accused of helping hundreds of people since May 2004 obtain driver's licenses they didn't earn. They have been charged with bribing state employees, accepting bribes and conspiracy.

About 100 people who got the fake licenses have been deported or are in the deportation process as a result of the investigation, federal authorities said.

"Just as in previous investigations, you had those who thought that what they did in secret would never come to light," said My Harrison, FBI special agent in charge for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee. The FBI was one of several agencies involved in the probe.

U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said the people who fraudulently received licenses weren't eligible for "a variety of reasons."

Officials also said most of those getting the licenses were in the country illegally.

The investigation, dubbed Operation Crooked Highway, has been under way by federal and state agencies for 18 months, Vines said yesterday.

Federal officials say two immigrants directed people, many immigrants themselves, to Winchester Driving School in Franklin County and paid for fraudulent third-party certification. In turn, the driving school allegedly paid two Department of Motor Vehicle clerks to provide licenses to those certificate holders.

Those named in the indictment are:

· Bryan Guess, 61, the owner and operator of Winchester Driving School, accused of accepting more than $46,000 to issue fraudulent third-party certificates on behalf of the driving school.

· Shelia Robertson, a former employee of the driving school, accused of paying bribes to state DMV worker Teresa Jones to help students get licenses and driving certificates.

· Teresa Jones, 48, a former DMV worker in the Mufreesboro office, accused of accepting $20 per person for about 1,000 Winchester Driving School students who obtained driver's licenses or driving certificates between March 2004 and May 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0012149

She worked for the state for a little more than a year and then was hired at Winchester Driving School in May 2005, federal officials said.

· Shun Gao, 24, an employee at a Murfreesboro Chinese restaurant, accused of funneling people to Winchester and paying the school, through an unidentified employee, $32,510 in exchange third-party certificates.

· Syed Abbas Parvez, 33, an alleged illegal immigrant accused of paying the driving school $1,100 in exchange for a third-party certificate, fake proof-of-residency documents and a regular driver's license for a Pakistani citizen whom Parvez had allegedly transported to Tennessee from Georgia.

· Bruce Conklin, 38, a DMV employee, accused of accepting $9,200 in cash from an employee at Winchester during the investigation and issuing about 50 driver's licenses to Shun Gao's clients between August and December 2005. State Department of Safety officials said Conklin is on paid administrative leave while the case is pending.

Several driving schools in the state can issue third-party certificates. They administer the state's written and road driving tests and, if students pass, they get a certificate. From there, the DMV will issue a license or driving certificate if they pass a vision test, residency check and other routine measures.

All six face conspiracy charges that carry up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Charges of accepting bribes or bribing state employees carry maximum sentences of 10 years and fines up to $250,000.

News of the indictments prompted state Sen. Bill Ketron of Murfreesboro to again call for tighter regulations on the license requirements. Last year, Ketron pushed a bill that requires applicants to provide a valid Social Security number or documentation from the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, but it didn't get out of the transportation committee.

"At the risk of sounding really bad, it's a good start," said Theresa Harmon, co-founder of Tennesseans for Responsible Immigration Polices, a group that has called for stricter standards.

The indictments "may help deter some state workers who may take money under the table," Harmon said. "But the ones who come here to get those driver's certificates, they're crossing the desert to get here. There just isn't that much of a deterrent for those people."

Revoking immigrants' abilities to get driving certificates won't make roads any safer, according to Stephen Fotopulos, policy coordinator for the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Council. Most immigrants and refugees who attain those documents do so through legal means, he said.

The council has pushed for measures making it easier for immigrants to get driver's licenses in Tennessee and has spoken out against racial profiling and other practices that it believes violate the civil rights of immigrants.

"The immigration system is broken, and there are many symptoms of it being broken in Tennessee," he said. "But the more we, as a society, try to alienate immigrants and refugees, the more they are open to exploitation." ·

The FBI's My Harrison, right, discusses a conspiracy to obtain driver's licenses for people who were not eligible. U.S. Attorney Jim Vines, left, said most of those getting fake licenses were in the country illegally. (AP)

FBI Arrests License Examiner (MDN)

Murfreesboro Daily News, January 26, 2006

Federal agents indicted three people Wednesday in a conspiracy to take payments for providing driver's licenses to illegal immigrants at the Murfreesboro driver testing center.

The FBI charged driver's license examiner Bruce Conklin with taking about $9,200 in cash from July 2005 to January. Agents also charged Bryan Guess, owner of the Winchester Driving School next to the testing center on Samsonite Boulevard, with paying bribes to Conklin and a former examiner, Teresa Jones.

Operation Crooked Highway: Federal Prosecutors Charge Six With Driver's License Fraud (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) - Federal prosecutors charged six people, including two state driver's license examiners, Wednesday with a conspiracy to issue possibly thousands of fraudulent driving licenses and certificates to illegal immigrants.

A federal indictment lists charges ranging from paying bribes, taking bribes and transporting illegal workers into the state to get the fraudulent driving documents. Authorities said they won't know how many illegal documents were issued until all evidence is studied and declined to speculate on the total.

They did say that one state worker accepted $20 per student in bribes for about 1,000 licenses or certificates. "We come to you with another sad chapter in the book of public corruption in Tennessee," FBI agent in charge My Harrison said at an afternoon news conference. Two of those charged worked at the driver's license examining station in Murfreesboro, a Nashville suburb.

Tennessee began licensing illegal immigrants in early 2001 but in response to terrorism concerns switched in 2004 to issuing driving certificates that are labeled not to be used for identification. The indictment unsealed Wednesday says that Safety Department employee Bruce Conklin and former employee Teresa Jones took bribes from a driving school. Conklin is accused of taking $9,200 in cash payments from July through January while Jones allegedly got $20,000 from May 2004 through March. Bryan Guess, who owns the Winchester Driving School, was charged along with former school worker Sheila Robertson with paying bribes between May 2004 and March 2005.

Jones went to work for the driving school after she left state government. Prosecutors said Winchester Driving School had a contract with the state to issue "third-party certificates" after providing six hours of driving instruction and administering written and road driving tests to students.

According to the indictment, the school was accepting money to issue the third-party certificate without any training or tests. Shun Gao was charged with paying cash to the school in exchange for the certificates.

Syed Abbas Parvez, an illegal immigrant living in Georgia, was charged with transporting another illegal immigrant from Pakistan to Tennessee to get a fraudulent license through the driving school.

The joint federal-state investigation was dubbed Operation Crooked Highway. About 100 illegal immigrants are being deported as a result of the investigation, federal immigration agent Rick Crocker said.

U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said three people, including a former state worker at a driver's license station in the Nashville suburb of Gallatin, had already pleaded guilty in the case. Vines credited the Safety Department with starting the investigation. "They did a fantastic job of cleaning their own house," he said. Interim Safety Commissioner Gerald Nicely said the department is studying an overhaul of licensing procedures, including how to prevent fraud. "Obviously what we're doing here today will be a big deterrent," he said.

The Safety Department has been at the center of a series of scandals, including Highway Patrol officers with criminal backgrounds, ticket-fixing and an atmosphere of political favoritism. Nicely has been assigned there temporarily to help develop a reform plan.

Wednesday's indictment follows arrests last July in East Tennessee of an illegal immigrant from Argentina and her boyfriend on charges they shuttled other illegal immigrants from New Jersey to Tennessee to get fraudulent licenses and certificates.

Citing a number of recent public corruption investigations in Tennessee, Harrison said agents were getting better with practice. "If you can hear me and are involved in public corruption, the eyes of law enforcement are upon you," she said.

Six Indicted In Alleged License Scheme (NASHCP)

By CHRIS LEWIS

Nashville City Paper, January 26, 2006

Two workers at a state driver's license station in Murfreesboro allegedly received thousands of dollars in bribes from a driving school to issue at least 1,000 fraudulent driver's licenses and certificates, authorities said Wednesday.

Flanked by a host of state and federal officials, U.S. Attorney for Middle Tennessee Jim Vines announced that a total of six people, including two from the Winchester Driving School, were indicted by a grand jury Jan. 18 on federal charges involving conspiracy to commit bribery.

It's the latest "sad chapter" in a string of Tennessee public corruption cases, said My Harrison, special agent in charge of the FBI for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee.

"You've heard of Operation Tennessee Waltz, Operation Tarnish Blue and Operation Tarnish Shield," she said. "What can I say? Same game, only the names have changed. The title of this new chapter is, Operation Crooked Highway."

The 18-month investigation was a cooperative effort by the Tennessee Highway Patrol, state Department of Safety, FBI, Immigrations and Customs Enforcement and IRS.

As a result, customs officials took into custody 50 undocumented immigrants and began deportation proceedings against 50 other immigrants who were uncovered in the investigation, said Rick Crocker, assistant special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"It runs the gamut of countries," he said. "It's not just Mexico."

The Winchester Driving School – which lists offices in Columbia, Murfreesboro, Nashville and Winchester – is one of several institutions that contract with the state to train and test drivers. It issues third-party certificates as documented proof that a student has passed all necessary requirements.

Those certificates can be exchanged for a driver's license or driver's certificate (for non-U.S. citizens) at a state driver's license station, provided the applicants pass other state checks.

DOJ_NMG_0012151

The attorney's office alleges that the school, for a fee, would provide students with certificates without the required 36 hours of instruction and arranged to have them meet with "friendly" state license examiners.

Bryan Guess, owner and operator of Winchester Driving School, and his former employee, Sheila Robertson, are accused of paying off two examiners at the Murfreesboro station.

Calls placed to an answering service for the school were not returned by deadline Wednesday.

Bruce Conklin, an examiner who was arrested at the Murfreesboro station Wednesday, is accused of accepting $9,200 in bribes. Teresa Jones, a former temporary worker at the station who now works for Winchester, is accused of accepting $20,000 in cash for issuing licenses to 1,000 driving school students in exchange for $20 each.

Also indicted is Shun Gao, a Chinese restaurant worker in Murfreesboro who officials say brought numerous clients to the school to help them obtain the fraudulent licenses. Authorities say Gao paid the unidentified Winchester employee about $32,500 to get the third-party certificates.

Syed Abbas Parvez, an undocumented resident of Georgia, is charged with transporting an undocumented Pakistan citizen to Tennessee and arranging for him to get a fraudulent license.

If convicted, the defendants face up to 10 years in jail and fines of up to $250,000, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In addition to the latest indictments, three other people pleaded guilty last year in connection with the alleged driver's license scheme, officials said.

The multi-agency investigation is part of a nation-wide effort called "Operation Broken Wheel" that has been in effect since 2003 to uncover incidents of fraudulent driver's license issuance, said George Bolds, supervisory special agent for the FBI.

IRS Agent Grilled About Ryan Campaign Fund Expenses (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2006

A government agent on Wednesday downplayed that former Gov. George Ryan filed corrected tax returns for 1995, 1996 and 1997 several years later because Ryan knew by then of the federal investigation into his finances.

Shari Schindler, an Internal Revenue Service agent, said that by the time Ryan filed the amended returns in late 2002, each of his six children had testified before the grand jury and there had been press coverage of the nature of the probe.

During three days on the witness stand, Schindler said her review of Ryan's records indicated he intentionally omitted from tax returns for 1995 through 1998 a combined $80,000 in campaign funds that had been spent on personal expenses and should have been declared as income.

At issue were payments of $55,000 to a son-in-law in financial trouble because of a gambling addiction and $9,675 in payments that Ryan allegedly concealed from former U.S. Sen. Phil Gramm's failed 1996 presidential campaign.

On cross-examination Wednesday, Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, focused on campaign expenditures Ryan made on nearly a dozen personal vacations between 1995 and 1997.

Webb contended that records showed Ryan had paid taxes on most of the travel expenses, but that certain charges hadn't been itemized in campaign disclosure reports, fell through the cracks and mistakenly weren't reported on Ryan's returns.

On Tuesday, Webb hauled eight volumes of tax laws and regulations to the witness stand to question Schindler about how Ryan was supposed to know about complicated, arcane IRS rules.

Through her questioning of Schindler on Wednesday, Assistant U.S. Atty. Laurie Barsella pointed out that Roger Bickel, Ryan's former chief lawyer, had spelled out for Ryan "in plain English" that personal use of campaign funds had to be reported on his tax returns.

Yet Ryan failed to tell his accountants about the $55,000 in campaign funds spent on Michael Fairman, the son-in-law whose gambling led to his bankruptcy, Schindler said.

On cross-examination, Webb also pressed the point that Ryan's campaign records were so incomplete that many expense reimbursement checks cashed by Ryan were missing. The defense has suggested that could have been Ryan's source of cash, not bribes from co-defendant Lawrence Warner and other friends to whom he steered lucrative state business.

Meanwhile, Assistant U.S. Atty. Patrick Collins said he still hopes to rest the prosecution case on Thursday after four months of testimony. The FBI's case agent is scheduled to be the government's last witness.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer, who is presiding over the trial, ruled Wednesday that prosecutors can play a portion of a videotape of Ryan from November when he made a statement to reporters outside the court defending his receipt of $9,675 from the Gramm campaign.

In his only public statement during the trial, Ryan lashed out after Gramm testified he never knew or approved of the payments to Ryan and wouldn't pay an officeholder for an endorsement. "It is basically that it's a difference between love and prostitution," Gramm said.

Since that comment came outside the jury's presence, Pallmeyer barred a defense request to play the portion of the videotape in which Ryan angrily reacted to Gramm's testimony and blasted his former political ally's character.

Pallmeyer ruled, though, that prosecutors could air Ryan's remarks at the time about how he worked hard for Gramm's campaign, saying, "I earned every penny" of the consulting fee.

Ryan passed the money on to four daughters, who did little or no work for the campaign, according to testimony. He is charged with failing to pay taxes on the income.

Also Wednesday, an agreed-upon statement from the lawyers was read to jurors that a reporter for a Springfield newspaper wrote a story in 2001 quoting Ryan as saying a family caretaker had been paid with campaign funds for political work she did.

Nancy Smith of Kankakee, who cared for the elderly mother of Ryan's wife, Lura Lynn, before her death, testified earlier in the trial that she hadn't done any campaign work for Ryan. She was paid $6,000 from Ryan campaign funds in 1998, a personal expense that Ryan failed to report on his tax return, prosecutors charge.

mo'connor@tribune.com

Federal Prosecutors Hoping To Wrap Up Case Against Ryan By The Weekend (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 26, 2006

CHICAGO - Prosecutors are hoping to rest the government's case against George Ryan before the weekend but admit it might be a tight squeeze to cram all the remaining evidence in without spilling into Monday - the 18th week of the marathon racketeering and fraud trial.

Prosecutors indicated Wednesday night that just one more prosecution witness remains - Raymond Ruebenson, the veteran FBI man who has long been the case agent for the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road investigation that led to the former governor's indictment.

But Ruebenson was absent with a case of the flu Wednesday. Even if he is well enough to take the witness stand Thursday, prosecutors are hoping to shoehorn videos of Ryan talking with reporters into the trial record before they sit down and let defense attorneys take over.

And U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer plans to recess early for the weekend Thursday, giving them less time to wrap things up. So there is no guarantee the prosecution will rest.

On Wednesday, a verbal fencing match between Ryan's lawyer, Dan K. Webb, and Internal Revenue Service agent Shari Schindler came to an end with no one sure who emerged the victor.

Webb repeatedly tried to get her to agree that Ryan couldn't be blamed if he failed to report thousands of dollars in income because he was grappling with vague, complex tax laws.

Schindler coolly disagreed, saying Ryan easily could have asked his tax advisers.

"Did Ryan's lawyer spell out in plain English for him and more than once that personal use of campaign funds must be reported as income to him?" federal prosecutor Laurie Barcella asked.

"Yes," Schindler said.

Ryan, 71, and longtime friend Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count indictment with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. Prosecutors say Ryan failed to report $80,000 in income over four years, much of it money he withdrew from the Citizens for Ryan campaign fund.

Ryan filed two batches of amended tax returns, one in 1998 and another in 2002, and paid most of the money prosecutors say was owing.

He isn't charged with offenses stemming from the additional money that he paid along with his amended returns in 1998. But prosecutors refused to credit him with the money he paid along with his 2002 amended returns, saying the investigation had already begun.

Webb suggested Ryan hadn't been officially notified of the investigation when he filed his amended returns in December 2002. But Schindler testified that earlier in 2002 five Ryan children and his son-in-law had testified before a federal grand jury looking into the former governor's taxes and that newspapers were full of reports about the investigation.

Before their duel was over, Webb took Schindler item by item through every bit of allegedly unreported income, from a dinner at Zorba's restaurant in Palm Springs that was charged to the campaign fund to $55,000 in money from the fund that he gave to a debt-ridden son-in-law.

Pointing to plane tickets to Las Vegas for Ryan and Cook County Republican Chairman Manny Hoffman after the 1996 Republican National Convention, Webb suggested they might be considered a bona fide entertainment expense for the campaign fund in view of Hoffman's status.

"If they wanted to entertain him at the Republican convention, then I would consider that, but this was a private trip after the convention was over," Schindler said.

One observer who considered the duel evenly matched was Ryan co-defendant Warner, who approached reporters after court and volunteered that he was impressed with both participants.

"If you ask me, Dan Webb earned his reputation today," Warner said. But he added: "She held her own with him."

Accused City Clerk: 'Somebody Is Lying And It Isn't Me' (CHIT)

By Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 26, 2006

Facing federal corruption charges, a defiant James Laski vowed Wednesday to "keep fighting," insisted his office is running smoothly and took sharp issue with claims he was away from his job as Chicago city clerk for a prolonged period before charges were filed.

"Somebody is lying, and it isn't me," Laski declared.

The clerk's comments came after a surprise appearance at a City Council committee meeting, his first visit to the council chamber in nearly two months—a period during which a federal investigation culminated in bribery and obstruction-of-justice charges against him.

Laski attended a meeting of the council's Budget Committee in which aldermen advanced a measure designed to eliminate a loophole used by some city sticker scofflaws. The clerk's office issues stickers and cites motorists who fail to buy them.

Laski was not called upon to speak on the matter, but he made a show of walking onto the floor where he shook hands and chatted briefly with several aldermen.

"I wanted them to tell you I am here today, just in case you didn't see me," Laski said sarcastically to reporters as he walked from the council chamber, on the second floor of City Hall, to the clerk's first-floor office.

Laski is charged with taking bribes in return for obtaining city business for a trucking company and then trying to cover up the arrangement as federal agents investigated.

The company, Get Plowed Inc., was operated by Michael "Mick" Jones, a longtime Laski friend and top official in the clerk's office, and Jones' wife Traci, who also works in the office.

The Joneses secretly recorded Laski, who federal prosecutors contend referred to the bribes on tape and sought to prevent the couple from providing information to the government.

Laski implied Wednesday that exonerating portions of the recordings were not released when the U.S. attorney's office announced the charges against him on Jan. 13.

"Have you heard all of them?" he asked reporters. "Listen to all of them.... There are many more stories to be told."

The four Chicago police bodyguards assigned to Laski were withdrawn earlier this month because of his alleged absence from his office.

On Tuesday, First Deputy Police Supt. Dana Starks said he pulled the officers after they reported that Laski was not going to work.

"Mr. Starks and everybody is telling you things, and you believe that kind of stuff," Laski responded on Wednesday. "Why don't you check my office? Why don't you check [with] people in my office?"

Laski insisted he has been at work.

The exceptions have been a two-week vacation in December and days he was off for medical reasons, he said.

"I was taking tests at the hospital for my stomach," he said.

Laski said he has a history of stomach problems, and he added, "I guess stress would make anything worse."

Laski intentionally stayed away from the last three City Council meetings because of what he contends would have been the resulting "media circus."

But he said he will be in his usual spot on the dais just below Mayor Richard Daley at the next meeting on Feb. 8, an announcement sure to attract a media throng.

Laski would not say whether he would ask for a reinstatement of his police detail. But "I am taking care of business, with or without bodyguards," he asserted.

The security contingent "was in place before I even came on board," and the officers assigned to him spent part of their time issuing citations to motorists whose vehicles did not have city stickers, he said.

"Check their logs. They wrote tickets constantly, generating revenue for the City of Chicago, OK?"

Laski was asked if he is going to beat the criminal charges.

"I am going to keep fighting," he replied. "I am going to keep fighting."

Aldermen greeted by him on Wednesday said Laski stressed his on-duty status.

"He basically said: 'I'm here—here I am in living flesh and blood. This is me,'" said Ald. Freddrenna Lyle (6th).

While there has been much speculation at City Hall about who might replace the clerk, there were no calls Wednesday for Laski to resign or take a leave of absence pending the outcome of his case.

"There is a presumption of innocence," said Ald. Thomas Allen (38th), an attorney. "That is what our system is built on. Politically and personally, there may be other factors that weigh in his decision, but from a lawyer's perspective, they have charged him with something. They have to prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt. Everybody is entitled to that."

"Hell no, I wouldn't quit," declared Ald. Bernard Stone (50th). "Why should he quit? As I understand it, he hasn't admitted doing anything wrong up to this point."

gwashburn@tribune.com

Ex-Campbell Hire Testifies Loyalty Vital (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs , Jeffry Scott, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2006

Only months after being hired by Bill Campbell, Michael Sullivan testified Wednesday that he tasted what he described as the good life with the former Atlanta mayor.

Campbell's former contracts compliance director said he also learned hard lessons about discretion, but especially loyalty.

Sullivan, called by the prosecution, testified in Campbell's federal corruption trial that in 1994 he and the former mayor, along with city contractor Ricky Rowe, traveled together to Florida to attend a golf and tennis tournament sponsored by Black Enterprise magazine.

Sullivan said the city paid for his trip. He said he was unsure of who paid for Campbell's but noticed that when he and Rowe were checking out of the hotel, Rowe used his credit card for Campbell's incidentals. Sullivan told Campbell about it.

"He was upset that I allowed Mr. Rowe to pay for his incidentals," Sullivan told the jury. "He told me that you can't use a credit card to pay for things like that. It leaves a trail. He was upset about the manner it was paid for and a credit card receipt being generated."

The theme of loyalty to the mayor was played over and over Wednesday, witness after witness, as prosecutors tried to establish that City Hall under Campbell, who was mayor from 1994 until 2002, was a den of cronyism and deal-making between Campbell, his friends and political allies.

None of the prosecution's witnesses testified that Campbell made them do anything illegal, nor did they say they saw Campbell doing anything criminal.

The prosecution, however, has argued that it is first trying to establish a pattern of behavior and later witnesses will produce evidence of criminality. U.S. District Judge Richard Story had ruled prosecutors could use additional evidence to establish a pattern of Campbell's activities.

Among the witnesses for the prosecution Wednesday were former Campbell Chief Operating Officer Byron Marshall and Doug Hooker, a former commissioner of Public Works, both of whom, like Sullivan, testified about how vital loyalty was to Campbell.

Marshall said the debate over loyalty vs. competence became a running joke between him and Campbell. During his two days of testimony, Marshall said he and Campbell often battled over hires and what qualifications they needed.

During cross-examination, Campbell lead attorney Billy Martin asked Marshall if Campbell ever hired someone who wasn't competent.

"No one who is outright, totally incompetent," Marshall said. "But, there were people hired who were incompetent in their jobs."

When it came to city contracts, Marshall said he advocated a "transparent" bidding process once at a meeting. He said Campbell called him aside to complain he had not discussed the idea with the mayor first. Campbell never adopted the plan, Marshall said. He also said Campbell often interceded on contractors' behalf.

Another witness for the prosecution, Steven Baker, a former deputy general manager at Hartsfield International Airport, testified that in fall 1995 he was summoned to Campbell's office about an airport concessions contract that Rowe's company wanted to bid.

"He said, 'Ricky and [his wife] Dott are friends of mine. I expect you to take care of them.'" Baker testified he later wrote a memo complaining about the incident but has since lost it. Rowe died in 2004.

On cross-examination, Martin pressed Baker: "When you went in to see the mayor he didn't ask you to bribe anybody, did he?"

"No," Baker said.

DOJ_NMG_0012155

Sullivan, the former contracts compliance director, said to make it easier for the mayor to identify contractors who were loyal to him he drew up a grid of potential contractors, putting an asterisk beside names that contributed to his political campaigns.

"He was pleased to have that information," Sullivan said.

Wis. Official Indicted Over Contract (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Filed at 12:44 a.m. ET

MADISON, Wis. (AP) -- An official in Gov. Jim Doyle's administration was indicted on two felony counts Tuesday for her role in awarding a state travel contract to a company whose executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign.

The federal indictment alleges that Georgia Thompson, chief of the Department of Administration's procurement bureau, tried to give her bosses political advantage and help her own job security.

Doyle's fundraising has become an issue in the Democrat's re-election bid this fall, with Republicans charging ethical lapses.

The indictment alleges wrongdoing by no one but Thompson.

Doyle was in Iraq visiting troops Tuesday. Thompson and her attorney did not return phone calls.

Thompson, 55, who was hired before Doyle took office in 2003, served on a committee that awarded a contract to Adelman Travel as part of an effort to cut travel costs. The indictment said she inflated the company's scores used to award the contract.

Questions were raised this summer after media reports that Adelman's CEO donated $10,000 to Doyle before the contract went into effect. An Adelman board member gave another $10,000 afterward, finance reports show.

Thompson faces as many as 20 years in prison if convicted of fraud and misapplication of funds.

Broderick Faces Jail Time After Guilty Plea In U.S. Court (FARMNT)

By TALI ISRAELI, Staff Writer

Farmingdale (NJ) News Transcript, January 26, 2006

MARLBORO — Thomas Broderick, a former public official, pleaded guilty in federal court last week to one count of money laundering.

Broderick, 56, served on the Township Council in the 1990s. He is a former assistant supervisor at the Monmouth County Division of Highways and a former Monmouth County undersheriff. He is a retired New York Police Department officer.

Broderick was one of the 11 Monmouth County officials who were arrested on Feb. 22, 2005 in an FBI investigation known as “Operation Bid Rig.”

According to the U.S. Attorney’s Office in Newark, Broderick pleaded guilty on Jan. 18 before U.S. District Judge William J. Martini. Broderick admitted that he accepted $15,000 for assisting in the laundering of large sums of cash from a cooperating government witness whom he believed was a corrupt demolition contractor.

Broderick faces a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. He is scheduled to be sentenced on April 27. Broderick remains free on $50,000 bail.

According to the charges, in May 2004 Broderick was introduced to the cooperating witness by a member of the Keyport Borough Council (subsequently identified as Robert Hyer, who has since died) and by an unnamed Monmouth County official.

Broderick believed the cooperating witness to be involved in construction work, extortionate illegal loan sharking and money laundering. Two law enforcement officers went undercover as employees of the cooperating witness.

Following the introduction, several money laundering transactions were made between Broderick and the cooperating witness.

“Broderick entered into these transactions with a stunning eagerness and returned to feed at the trough repeatedly,” U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a press release. “Unfortunately, there were plenty of others in Monmouth County who knew each other, spread the word between them, and followed their corrupt instincts as well.”

In his guilty plea, Broderick specifically admitted conducting the following money laundering transactions:

· On May 4, 2004, Broderick met the cooperating witness and exchanged a $45,000 check for a brown paper bag containing $50,000 in cash.

· On May 17, 2004, Broderick exchanged a check for $22,500 for $25,000 in cash from the cooperating witness.

· On Sept. 14, 2004, Broderick provided another check for $22,500 in exchange for $25,000 in cash from the undercover agent acting as an employee of the cooperating witness.

· In October 2004, Broderick provided two checks totaling $45,000 to the undercover agent in exchange for $50,000 in cash.

Broderick also admitted to giving a portion of the money laundering proceeds to the unnamed Monmouth County official for his role in setting up the transactions.

In a press release dated Jan. 19, state Sen. Ellen Karcher (D-Monmouth and Mercer), of Marlboro, said Broderick's guilty plea is another embarrassment for the people of Monmouth County.

"Though it may be dismaying to read that yet another Monmouth official will be going to jail, we should be encouraged that corrupt practices, that for years went unnoticed, are now being dragged into the light of day," Karcher said.

"As a former undersheriff for Monmouth County, Broderick should have known that crime doesn't pay, but reports that he eagerly and frequently accepted bribes from a cooperating federal witness seem to suggest otherwise. Thankfully, he'll have a lot of time to catch up on the lessons he missed the first time around, considering he faces a maximum of 20 years in prison for his crimes," Karcher said.

In one of the documents released by Christie last week, Broderick is quoted as having said to the cooperating witness following their first transaction on May 4, 2004, "I wish I would have known you sooner."

Attorney Robert S. Bonney, who represented Broderick, could not be reached for comment.

Contractor Serving Socom Gets Probation, Fine (TAMPTRIB)

Tampa Tribune, January 26, 2006

TAMPA - A contractor formerly employed by U.S. Special Operations Command was sentenced Wednesday to three years probation and a $4,500 fine for his role in a bribery scheme that has tarnished the war fighting organization's reputation for acquiring equipment used by the nation's elite fighting forces.

U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called William E. Burke's crime ``scary`` and a ``bad thing,`` could have saddled him with a prison term of up to 16 months and a heftier fine.

But Bucklew opted for the lighter penalties mainly because Burke has been cooperating with federal law enforcement agents examining contracting practices at Socom, which is headquartered at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa.

Burke pleaded guilty to bribery Oct. 14.

Burke and his attorney, Daniel Hernandez , refused to answer questions before or after the nearly one-hour session in Bucklew's chambers.

Robert O'Neill, the assistant U.S. attorney prosecuting the case, said it would not be appropriate for him to comment on the sentence.

During the hearing, however, O'Neill told the judge that sentencing Burke to jail could cause logistical challenges in the upcoming trial of Thomas F. Spellissy, the former Army colonel who formed a defense consulting company months before he retired from Socom in January 2005.

In late 2004 and early 2005, Spellissy paid $4,500 to Burke, who used his position at the command to favor Spellissy's clients seeking to do business with Socom, according to court documents. More ``illegal payments`` were expected to change hands ``down the road,`` prosecutors charged.

Burke worked for Sentel Corp. and had been assigned to Socom's acquisition directorate since 1999. In June 2005, several months after federal agents began their investigation, he was barred from entering Socom headquarters. Burke is no longer employed by Sentel.

Spellissy, of Clearwater, has been indicted on charges of bribery, conspiracy and wire fraud. He has pleaded not guilty and his trial is scheduled to begin in April.

Paper: Texas Favored Firm Tied To Abramoff (AP-Y2)

AP2, January 26, 2006

The state of Texas hired a firm with close ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff after rejecting competing bids that met more of its selection criteria and cost less, a newspaper reported Wednesday.

What the winning firm, Cassidy & Associates, had was access all the way to presidential aide Karl Rove, the Austin American-Statesman reported, citing memos and e-mails it obtained through a Texas open records request.

The firm was awarded a $15,000-a-month contract in 2004 to lobby Congress for the state.

"Cassidy is the best fit for Texas," David Pagan, associate director of the Office of State-Federal Relations, said in a May 25, 2004, e-mail to staff members. He wrote that the firm was the leader in Washington in acquiring federal funding.

Cassidy & Associates is under fire from Texas House Democrats because of the close ties between Cassidy senior vice president Todd Boulanger and Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud.

Seven Texas House Democrats sent a letter to Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, on Friday demanding that Cassidy's contract be canceled.

Perry's spokeswoman, Kathy Walt, said that although Cassidy was not initially the top scorer in the bidding process, it rose to the top after interviews with the state's selection committee and after its references were checked.

Cassidy was one of 17 firms that competed for the contract to represent the state.

An initial state assessment ranked Cassidy fourth, the newspaper said. Two of the firms ranked ahead of it would have charged Texas $300 to $833 less per month than Cassidy's initial offer of $15,833 a month.

Once the contract was signed, Cassidy's fee was down to $15,000, plus expenses.

Cyberattacker Pleads Guilty (FCW)

By Bob Brewin

Federal Computer Week, January 26, 2006

A hacker indicted for creating botnet armies that infected Defense Information Systems Agency networks and computers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake, Calif., pleaded guilty to the charges at a hearing earlier this week in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, the Justice Department said.

Justice said James Ancheta 20, of Downey, Calif, entered guilty pleas of conspiring to violate the Computer Fraud Abuse Act and causing damage to computers used in national defense.

Justice said the prosecution of Ancheta was the first of its kind in the United States against a hacker who used botnets, armies of computers infected with Trojan horse programs that allowed Ancheta to remotely control the computers. Justice said Ancheta controlled more than 400,000 computers as part of his botnet armies, which in turn infected other computers with unwanted adware.

Ancheta agreed to pay $15,000 in restitution to DISA and the Naval Air Warfare Center for damage he caused to their networks and computers. He also forfeited $60,000 in cash and a BMW, which he gained in payment for using his botnets to distribute adware.

Former Execs For Mail-order Company Outline Fraudulent Practices (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 26, 2006

CINCINNATI - Former executives of a mail-order firm admitted that the company bilked buyers out of more than $100 million by charging credit cards without permission and offering refund guarantees it had no intention of honoring.

Four former executives of Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals Inc. detailed their involvement Wednesday with the Cincinnati-based company that sold vitamins and supplements for a variety of ills from fatigue to sexual disfunction.

The four executives filed written statements as part of an agreement to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati to charges of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud.

Federal agencies - including the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service and the Food and Drug Administration - have been investigating Berkeley, which is behind the popular "Smiling Bob" ads. The spots chronicle a down-on-his-luck man who improves his life after using Enzyte for natural male enhancement.

The former executives said Berkeley's vitamins and supplements - marketed as stress reducers, sex enhancers and diet boosters - weren't supported by strong medical proof, according to court documents.

Company ads contained fake surveys and doctor endorsements, and the company touted double or triple money-back guarantees without following through, the former executives said.

Sales representatives were told to overstate the effectiveness of the pills, and the company's director of customer care didn't exist, they wrote.

The company also altered credit card numbers and expiration dates to bring in more money, they said.

Berkeley did not return an e-mail message seeking comment from The (Cleveland) Plain Dealer.

The suspects have agreed to cooperate in the investigation as part of the plea agreement. No sentencing date has been set.

The four include the former president, vice president, controller and a division head.

Berkeley was founded in 2001. It generated approximately $250 million in sales in 2004, mostly from telephone orders spurred by television ads.

Jury Convicts Accused Iraqi Agent On Six Of Seven Counts (AP)

By Rick Callahan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012158

(AP) - INDIANAPOLIS-Jurors on Wednesday convicted a Palestinian migrant accused of being an Iraqi agent on six federal charges but could not reach a decision on a charge that he tried to sell to Saddam Hussein's regime the names of U.S. operatives and agents.

Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 53, showed little reaction as the federal jury returned its verdicts finding him guilty of six of seven counts, including acting as an unregistered foreign agent, violating sanctions against Iraq, conspiracy and witness tampering.

They could not decide his guilt on a charge of violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act by allegedly trying in late 2002 to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Iraq for $3 million (â‚¬2.44 million). No evidence was presented during his trial, however, that he had access to that classified information.

U.S. District Judge John Tinder set sentencing for April 13 on the six convictions.

He said he would seek a hearing for sometime next week to discuss a retrial on charges of offering to sell U.S. secrets to Saddam Hussein's government.

Shaaban represented himself during an 11-day trial that included testimony by a former Iraqi intelligence officer. He repeatedly contended that the government had confused him with a dead identical twin brother who worked for the CIA.

Mike Donahoe, an attorney who advised Shaaban during the trial, said an appeal is likely.

"I'm disappointed in the verdict," he said. "I don't think he represents a threat to our national security."

Donahoe said Shaaban plans to continue to represent himself through his sentencing.

In tape recordings played in his trial, Shaaban told an FBI undercover agent he never had a list of agents but that he had hoped to receive the information from a Russian contact.

Shaaban was working as an Indiana truck driver when he was arrested last March after a yearlong FBI-led investigation.

Prosecutors said Shaaban was trained as a spy in the former Soviet Union and, after emigrating to the U.S., legally changed his name in 1997 to Joe Brown. He also went by the name Shaaban S. Hafed and several other names, according to his indictment.

Last March, FBI agents who raided his house in Greenfield, about 20 miles (32 kilometers) east of Indianapolis, allegedly found computer files praising Hussein and an unsigned contract proposing to recruit "human shields" to protect Iraq from the U.S. invasion.

Kidnap Suspects Face U.S. Charges (COX)

By Joe Giordano and Ken-Yon Hardy, Cox News Service

Cox News Service, January 26, 2006

OXFORD | The FBI on Wednesday brought criminal charges against three people accused in the abduction, assault and robbery of a Miami University freshman.

Sidney R. Jones, 23, of Richmond, Ind.; Katrina L. Jones, 18, of Oxford; and Seth R. Jett, 21, of Richmond were turned over to federal custody Monday by local authorities, Special Agent Michael E. Brooks said.

The three had been detained at the Butler County Jail following their arrests Jan. 14 and 15 stemming from a case involving MU freshman Ryan Coli.

The charges were the result of a joint effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and the FBI in three states.

The three appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court where Magistrate Judge Timothy S. Hogan ordered them held pending a detention hearing Jan. 30, when the court will determine bond.

Brooks lauded the actions of two MU students who contacted police following Coli's disappearance.

"If (the students) had not immediately notified authorities with the significant information about the vehicle, (the authorities) probably would have not solved the case so quickly," Brooks said.

According to police, the two MU students were helping Coli back to his dormitory shortly before 3 a.m. Jan. 13 when some people pulled up in a van and offered Coli a ride.

The 19-year-old had trusted the three strangers to give him a ride to his Stanton Hall dorm.

Coli never made it to his dorm. He told police he was beaten and robbed of his cell phone and wallet and left stranded on Nine Mile Road in Union County, Ind.

The freshman found his way to a farmhouse where a resident called for help.

The kidnapping was one of four crimes against MU students reported since Jan. 9. The only arrests have come in the Coli case. Suspects in the other cases have not been identified, police said.

High Court To Hear Lethal-Injection Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide when death row inmates may challenge lethal injection as a method of capital punishment, in a surprise decision issued after the justices dramatically stopped the execution of a Florida prisoner who was already strapped to a gurney preparing to die.

Clarence E. Hill, 48, convicted of murdering a Pensacola police officer in 1982, had refused a final meal and needles had punctured his arm when the Supreme Court stayed his execution. The court said it would hear his claim that he should have an opportunity to argue that his civil rights would be violated because the chemicals used to execute him would cause excessive pain.

It is a claim that has been pressed with growing frequency by capital defense lawyers around the country in recent years -- but that has generally not yet succeeded, either in lower courts or at the Supreme Court.

Thirty-seven of the 38 death penalty states use lethal injection, as do the U.S. military and the federal government. Since the chemical mixtures in all jurisdictions are similar to those used in Florida, a victory for Hill at the Supreme Court could tie up the death penalty across the county in litigation, at least temporarily, legal analysts said.

"It certainly could be a mess," said Douglas A. Berman, a professor at Ohio State University who specializes in criminal law. According to the Death Penalty Information Center, an anti-death-penalty organization, at least 25 inmates are scheduled for execution between now and the end of June, when the court would probably issue a decision.

The Hill case does not ask the court to rule directly on the constitutionality of lethal injection -- which states adopted as an alternative to hanging, gas, electrocution and shooting -- even though Hill maintains that the particular mix of chemicals used in Florida would cause him an unconstitutional degree of suffering.

Rather, the case raises a procedural problem: what recourse there should be for a prisoner who finds out at or near the last minute that the method by which the state proposes to execute him might be "cruel and unusual" punishment.

Normally, death row inmates try to fight their sentences through claims that their constitutional rights were violated at trial. Congress and the Supreme Court have limited those appeals, known as petitions for habeas corpus, and once they run out, further efforts are generally not allowed.

But for years capital defense lawyers have argued that a separate federal civil rights statute creates a way to press constitutional claims between the time an inmate exhausts habeas corpus and the actual moment of execution.

Hill tried to persuade the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, based in Atlanta, to give him a day in court to argue against Florida's lethal-injection protocol, based in part on an article about lethal injection in the Lancet, a medical journal.

The article, published in 2005, said that 21 of 49 inmates executed by lethal injection in Arizona, Georgia, North Carolina and South Carolina may have been conscious and feeling pain.

The 11th Circuit dismissed Hill's appeal, and he remained scheduled to die at 6 p.m. Tuesday. But the Supreme Court intervened, setting oral argument in the case for April 26.

The court's decision was a surprise to legal analysts because the court issued a stern rebuke of a similar last-minute challenge by a California death row inmate in 1992, and avoided the issue of permitting last-minute civil rights appeal in 2004. At that time it noted that "imposition of the death penalty presupposes a means of carrying it out."

But the court's most liberal members, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, have indicated an interest in the question of challenges to lethal injection.

In May 2005, they dissented from a 5 to 4 ruling that denied a stay of execution for a Missouri death row inmate on a similar issue.

Whether there would be five votes on the court to support Hill's claim is another question. The case is likely to be heard by a court that includes two new conservative justices appointed by President Bush: Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., whose Senate confirmation is expected this week.

The case is Hill v. Crosby , No. 05-8794.

Strapped To Gurney, Inmate Wins Stay; High Court To Hear Appeal (AP)

By Gina Holland, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

Hours after staying the execution of an inmate who was already strapped to a gurney, the Supreme Court said Wednesday it would hear arguments from the man who claims the drug cocktail used in lethal injections can cause excruciating pain.

Lethal injections are used in most states that have capital punishment, and there's been a growing dispute over the way they are carried out.

DOJ_NMG_0012160

The Supreme Court has never found a specific form of execution to be cruel and unusual punishment, and the latest case from Florida does not give Court members that opportunity. The justices will, however, spell out what options are available to inmates with last-minute challenges to the way they will be put to death.

Florida inmate Clarence Hill, who filed the appeal, had been strapped to a gurney with intravenous lines running into his arms Tuesday night when he won a temporary Supreme Court stay, Hill's lawyer said. The stay was signed by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

The full Court announced Wednesday that the stay would be permanent until justices decide whether an appeals court was wrong to prevent Hill from challenging the lethal injection method.

The argument is expected April 26, with a ruling before July.

"What a fantastic day. What a fantastic day," said Hill's attorney D. Todd Doss, who relayed the news to his client. "He was happy we get to go and present this to the U.S. Supreme Court."

Hill is on death row for killing a Pensacola, Fla., police officer after a bank robbery in 1982. Hill has converted to Islam and taken the name Razzaq Muhammad, although he does not use that name in court filings.

A Florida Department of Corrections spokeswoman said Hill would be moved off death watch, a cell block adjacent to the execution chamber, and back to death row.

Hill argues that the doses of three chemicals used in Florida executions -- sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride -- can cause pain. The first drug is a pain killer. The second one paralyzes the inmate and the third causes a fatal heart attack.

The final drug, potassium chloride, "burns intensely as it courses through the veins toward the heart," Doss wrote in the appeal. He said there is "a foreseeable risk of the gratuitous and unnecessary infliction of pain."

Hill's case allows the Court to revisit a 2004 ruling in an Alabama death case, in which justices said David Larry Nelson could pursue a last-ditch claim that his death by lethal injection would be unconstitutionally cruel because of his damaged veins.

While Hill does not have damaged veins, his appeal cites medical studies about the cocktail of drugs used by Florida and other states.

"The Court may be willing to broaden what can be considered as a civil rights claim," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the anti-capital punishment Death Penalty Information Center.

Dieter predicted that inmates facing executions in coming months will requests delays, based on the Hill case.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring, wrote the 2004 decision, which said that although Nelson had exhausted his traditional appeals, he should not have been barred from pursuing the issue that came up in the final days before the scheduled execution.

O'Connor said in the unanimous 2004 ruling that the Court was not going to "open the floodgates to all manner of method-of-execution challenges."

If appeals court Judge Samuel Alito is confirmed, as expected, to replace O'Connor, he will hear arguments and help decide the case.

The case is Hill v. Florida, 05-8794.

First Texas Inmate Put To Death This Year (AP)

The Associated Press, January 25, 2006

HUNTSVILLE - An Alabama man who was part of a ring that shuttled drugs from Texas to his home state was executed today for the slayings of four people in Houston nearly 14 years ago.

When asked by a warden if he had any final statement, Marion Dudley did not respond, kept his eyes closed and never turned his head toward witnesses in the chamber, which included one of his survivors and relatives of one of the people killed.

Eight minutes later at 6:16 p.m. CST, he was pronounced dead.

Dudley, 33, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., had said he wasn't at the house the night of June 20, 1992, where six people were shot, four of them fatally, in what authorities said was a drug dealer ripoff.

Dudley, who had record in his home state for burglary, assault, receiving stolen property and violating probation, was the first Texas inmate put to death this year.

Nineteen convicted killers were executed in 2005 as Texas maintained its notoriety as the nation's most active capital punishment state. Another inmate is set for lethal injection next week and three more next month. They are among more than a dozen Texas prisoners with execution dates in the first five months of this year.

Dudley's lawyer had hoped the U.S. Supreme Court would stop his punishment, arguing prosecutors improperly withheld from defense attorneys at his capital murder trial a letter to Alabama parole officials regarding an inmate from that state who testified against Dudley.

DOJ_NMG_0012161

Attorney Ken McLean, however, said he wasn't optimistic.

"Absolutely, it's a reach," he said. "But if it's the only thing you've got ..."

A few hours before his scheduled execution time, the high court rejected the appeal.

The two survivors identified the then 20-year-old Dudley as one of the three gunmen who barged into the home of Jose Tovar, 32, and his wife, Rachel, then 33.

In a recent interview on death row, Dudley said they were wrong.

"I was not," he said.

Jose Tovar was fatally shot in the head, as were his wife's son, Frank Farias, 17; Farias' girlfriend, Jessica Quinones, 19, who was seven months pregnant; and a neighbor Audrey Brown, 21, who had just stopped by to visit. Rachel Tovar and another friend, Nicholas Cortez, 22 at the time, survived.

All the victims were bound with towels or strips of sheets, hands tied behind their backs and nooses around their necks. Rachel Tovar managed to crawl to a neighbor's house for help.

Besides Dudley, Arthur "Squirt" Brown, of Tuscaloosa, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. Now 35, he remains on death row. A third man, Tony Dunson, also from Alabama and 19 at the time of the shootings, received a life sentence.

Police said the three previously had been at the Tovar house to buy drugs and knew drugs and money were there. Brown ran the ring that for nine months had been moving marijuana and cocaine from Houston to Tuscaloosa, authorities said.

A mini-van used as the getaway vehicle was recovered in the Alabama city, where evidence showed they bought a new Jeep SUV with cash, eventually traveling to Louisville, Ky., and Columbus, Ohio. About 2 1/2 weeks after the shootings, Dudley and Dunson were arrested in Fayetteville, N.C.

"My number one problem was women," Dudley said from death row. "I was running around. Everything went downhill from there... I just wanted to get money, easy money. And once you start getting easy money, it's so hard to slow down."

ID Theft Complaints Still Rising, But Rate Of Increase Slows (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Businesses, law-enforcement agencies and consumers may be beginning to turn the tide in the war against identity theft, data from the Federal Trade Commission suggest.

Identity-theft complaints were up again last year to nearly 256,000, the FTC said, but that was only 3.5% higher than the year before. In 2004, complaints rose by 15% and in 2003 by 33%.

Complaints about credit-card fraud -- the largest subset of identity theft -- declined 1.3% last year to 67,228, from 68,113 in 2004, and were also lower than the 2003 level. Total consumer-fraud complaints -- including identity theft -- totaled 686,683 last year, up slightly from 2004.

Industry officials and analysts say the development and widespread adoption of antifraud technologies are responsible for lower levels of card fraud. Visa USA Inc. said investments in its risk-management systems have reduced fraud levels to six cents for every $100 processed, down from 12 cents a decade ago.

Separately, the FTC is expected to announce today tough action against a company at the center of the personal-data industry. ChoicePoint Inc. is expected to agree to pay a multimillion-dollar penalty to settle alleged data-security violations stemming from a yearlong investigation by federal regulators, according to a person briefed on the matter. ChoicePoint spokesman Chuck Jones declined to comment.

ChoicePoint, which sells consumer data to financial institutions and government agencies, last February disclosed that criminals posing as legitimate businessmen had fraudulently obtained personal information on 145,000 people. That figure was later revised to 162,000 people.

In order to prevent fraud, many companies have turned to real-time fraud-scoring systems, which -- much like credit-scoring models -- assign three-digit scores to credit applications based on a variety of data confirmations and behavioral examinations. Steven Gal, vice president for corporate development at ID Analytics, a San Diego company that provides fraud-detection services, says his company screened over 250 million applications last year for potential fraud, a fourfold increase from 2004.

The FTC figures offer a rare bit of hopeful news for consumers concerned that the recent string of security breaches at credit-card processors and banks will place them at risk, and for a financial industry continually under attack by computer fraud and other scams.

To be sure, identity theft remains a huge threat that costs businesses $50 billion a year and plunges victims into a draining, time-consuming battle to eradicate fraudulent activity. The FTC will release a survey this spring, but its most recent figures show that 10 million people, or roughly 4.6% of the adult population, are affected by identity theft each year, and that victims spend an average of $500 and 30 hours to clear their records.

The FTC report, based on data the agency receives from consumers, comes after a year of high-profile security lapses that exposed personal information belonging to more than 50 million consumers and familiarized many people with the crime of identity theft. Just yesterday, financial-services provider Ameriprise Financial Inc. announced that the theft of one of its employees' laptops had compromised the data of some 226,000 clients and current and former workers.

Such breaches have led to an outcry from consumer advocates, and lawmakers across the country moved to enact stiffer penalties and stronger protections. Legislation in Congress has stalled, but many states have enacted laws that force companies to disclose breaches or allow consumers to shield their credit reports from unauthorized access.

FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras stressed how important it is for consumers to file complaints when they are victimized, saying they "provide ammunition that helps law enforcers fight fraud and identity theft."

When the agency receives identity-theft complaints, they are analyzed, clustered with similar ones and made available to law-enforcement officials to assist with investigations and criminal trials. Betsy Broder, the attorney in charge of the FTC's identity-theft program, says the agency's database now contains more than one million complaints, which are used by law enforcement in investigations and criminal trials.

The FTC's complaint data showed that identity theft accounted for 37% of total fraud complaints. For the fourth year in a row, Washington, D.C., was the leader in total per-capita fraud complaints, and several Western cities led in the category of identity-theft complaints, including Phoenix, Las Vegas and Los Angeles.

Meanwhile, identity-theft complaints surged in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana, rising 26% last year, while Mississippi saw an 8% increase. Complaints related to "government documents or benefits" in Louisiana more than doubled, however, to 551 from 247, possibly an indicator of post-Katrina fraud.

Overall, the drop in credit-card fraud complaints was offset by an increase in complaints about the misuse of government records, and fraud involving things such as medical records, legal documents and fitness-club memberships. Bank-, phone- and utilities-related complaints stayed roughly the same, although complaints about electronic fund transfers rose.

Sophisticated identity thieves are always probing for vulnerabilities. One troubling trend emerged late last year, when the Securities and Exchange Commission warned that identity thieves were using keystroke-detecting programs to drain online brokerage accounts. Similarly, federal banking regulators have prodded financial institutions to move beyond "single-factor" authentication, which only requires a user name and password to gain access to accounts, by the end of this year.

For many consumer advocates, the focus is squarely on financial institutions to do more to catch identity thieves in the act. Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, says "there are some technology-based tools they can use, and there's some evidence showing that these tools are having marked effect. But sadly for victims, identity theft remains rampant."

Inmate Convicted Of Murdering Defrocked Priest (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

BOSTON, Jan. 25 — Rejecting an insanity defense, a state jury on Wednesday convicted an inmate of the prison murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest who was accused of molesting 150 boys. Mr. Geoghan played a central role in the sexual abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Archdiocese here.

Judge Francis R. Fecteau of Worcester District Court sentenced the inmate, Joseph L. Druce, to life in prison without parole, in addition to the life sentence he is serving for another murder.

After the verdict, Mr. Druce told the jury that he had "no hard feelings." Mr. Druce, 40, who had testified that he had been abused as a child, asked after the sentencing that pedophiles be held accountable for their behavior.

During the trial there was no disagreement about what happened at 11:53 a.m. on Aug. 23, 2003, in a protective custody wing at Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center in Shirley, Mass.

Mr. Druce admitted to sneaking into Mr. Geoghan's cell while prisoners were returning their lunch trays, and strangling him.

Mr. Geoghan, 68, was serving a 9-to-10-year sentence for groping a boy at a suburban Boston swimming pool. His case began the sexual abuse scandal four years ago when internal church documents showed that officials had shuttled Mr. Geoghan from parish to parish, despite repeated accusations of abuse.

Prosecutors argued that Mr. Druce was a calculated killer who planned the murder for weeks and saw Mr. Geoghan as a trophy.

But Mr. Druce's lawyer, John LaChance, painted his client as someone who "never had a chance," unwanted from birth and the victim of physical and sexual abuse for much of his childhood and teenage years. He said Mr. Druce had concocted a "fantasy world" while in prison where he pretended to be a millionaire who owned yachts and expensive homes.

DOJ_NMG_0012163

Mr. LaChance said that Mr. Druce believed that God ordered him to kill Mr. Geoghan and that he would be viewed as a savior of children.

Lawyers, and Mr. Druce, said he became delusional after overhearing Mr. Geoghan say over the phone that he planned to work with children in Costa Rica when his sentence was over. Mr. LaChance said the delusions got worse after Mr. Druce heard Mr. Geoghan and other pedophiles discuss child molesting.

The jury foreman, Thomas Wiegand, told The Associated Press that jurors felt sympathy for Mr. Druce and felt he was mentally ill, but that he willfully committed murder.

"Everyone agreed he has a mental illness," Mr. Wiegand said. "It's the degree that's always the question."

A Push To Focus On Worst Cases In Child Abuse (CSM)

By Maia Ridberg, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

NEW YORK - Calls to New York's child-abuse hot line have spiked dramatically ever since Nixzmary Brown was buried.

The 7-year-old girl, allegedly killed by her stepfather in her Brooklyn home this month, captured the hearts and minds of New Yorkers who never want to see such a tragedy happen again.

But now the city is left with the tall task of distinguishing the serious cases of abuse from reports of neglect. This is one of the most controversial challenges facing social welfare systems nationwide.

A growing number of states are passing laws that alter the way authorities investigate a child-abuse report, creating what is essentially a child-welfare triage system. Rather than treat all reports equally, the approach divides them into two groups.

This dual-track approach aims to ease systems overburdened with poverty-related neglect reports and focus aggressive tactics on the rarer cases of abuse.

"What it is attempting to do is to respond in a more helpful way ... by supporting parents in their responses rather than automatically approaching it from a criminal-investigation standpoint," says Lynn Usher, professor of social work at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill.

The approach has been adopted in various states, including Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and North Carolina. In Minnesota, one recent study shows the law improved the safety of children by providing better services for families such as food. "If we are able to address the needs of families who are reported ... in a positive and helpful way, we are able to reduce child maltreatment and improve family well-being," says Erin Sullivan Sutton of Minnesota's Child Safety and Permanency Office.

In North Carolina, 10 counties have implemented the program, and by 2006, all counties in the state will have the option of implementing the dual-track approach. David Atkinson, a local operations manager of the state's Division of Social Services, says 60 to 70 percent of its caseload involves neglect of children living in poor conditions. "We realized that as a system we could handle those cases ... in a family-centered way."

So far, employees of North Carolina's child-welfare services are applauding the program. "Social workers are now feeling like they can make a difference," says Adele Spitz Roth of the Durham Family Initiative.

Controversy over how child welfare services should investigate a family stems from the 1960s, according to Karen Schimke, the former head of Buffalo's child services, who has over 35 years' experience in child welfare. The debate then, she says, was whether child-abuse cases should be handled by police or child-welfare services. Child services gained the upper hand, but as the system became codified, it was increasingly akin to "law enforcement in a welfare agency," says Ms. Schimke.

Sharwline Nicholson knows firsthand the potentially negative impact of an aggressive child welfare system. In 1999, Ms. Nicholson lost her two children to foster care without a court order. "My children were snatched away from me because I was a victim of domestic violence. They were taken from my home without any investigation," Nicholson says. Nicholson won her son and daughter back, along with a civil judgment against New York City for the wrongful removal of her children.

"The problem is that [a law-enforcement approach] has significant chilling effects on families' willingness to engage.... It is organized around placing blame and identifying the perpetrator," says Schimke, who is now lobbying for a dual-track approach in New York.

That lobbying effort failed most recently in 2005, when a dual-track law was passed by the state Legislature but was vetoed by the governor. In his veto message to the Senate, Gov. George Pataki cited New York City's opposition to the bill.

The city's main fear with dual track is that an abused child would be mishandled as a neglect case. In testimony opposing the dual-track bill last year, the city's Administration for Children's Services delivered the following statement: "Our current system addresses the core issues that the dual-track bill seeks to address without running a risk" of wrongly addressing a case of abuse.

That risk exists with or without dual track, as apparent with the Brown case. Last week, the Kings County District Attorney in Brooklyn indicted Nixzmary 's mother and stepfather with second-degree murder. According to the district attorney, the child's body showed signs of long-term abuse - some of it investigated by the city.

In the aftermath of the girl's death, authorities disciplined six employees involved in the investigation into her abuse. On Tuesday, the Mayor announced a $16 million plan to hire new child-welfare staff and increase cooperation between police, schools, and child services.

Some advocates of the dual-track approach say serious cases like Nixzmary's would receive more attention. But others caution against universal support for dual track, particularly in a city known for vast improvements in child protective services over the past decade.

"You can do this right whether you have dual track or not," says Andrew White, director of the Center for New York City Affairs at the New School. "What they are trying to do in New York City ... [is] infuse the system with better training and better respect for the parents," he says.

Fairfax Police Say Shooting Was Accident (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Fairfax County's police chief said yesterday that one of his officers accidentally shot and killed an optometrist outside the unarmed man's townhouse Tuesday night as an undercover detective was about to arrest him on suspicion of gambling on sports.

Police had been secretly making bets with Salvatore J. Culosi Jr., 37, since October as part of a gambling investigation, according to court records. They planned to search his home in the Fair Oaks area, just off Lee Highway, shortly after 9:30 p.m.

Culosi came out of his townhouse on Cavalier Landing Court about 9:35 p.m. and was standing next to the detective's sport-utility vehicle, police said, when the detective gave a signal to tactical officers assembled nearby to move in and arrest Culosi.

"As they approached him . . . one officer's weapon, a handgun, was unintentionally discharged," said Fairfax Police Chief David M. Rohrer.

Culosi was not making any threatening moves when he was shot once in the upper part of his body, police said. He was taken to Inova Fairfax Hospital, where he was pronounced dead.

The last fatal police shooting in Fairfax was in September 2000, when an officer killed a man threatening him with a woodcutting tool.

"On behalf of the Fairfax County Police Department and myself, I wish to express our condolences and our sincere sympathy to Mr. Culosi's family and friends," Rohrer said. He declined to answer questions after making the statement.

Police departments generally do not accept responsibility for an officer-involved shooting before an investigation is completed.

Culosi's family in Annandale was grief-stricken and declined to be interviewed. Culosi's older sister, Constance Culosi Gulley, issued a statement saying that her brother was "a respected local businessman and doctor with his whole life ahead of him and didn't deserve to have his life end this way."

Culosi grew up just off Annandale Road, graduated from Bishop O'Connell High School and the University of Virginia, then attended the Southern College of Optometry in Memphis and became a doctor of optometry. He opened practices in Manassas and Warrenton that are attached to Wal-Mart stores.

The officer, a 17-year veteran assigned to the police tactical unit, was not identified. He was placed on leave with pay while police conduct both an internal administrative investigation and a criminal investigation. Rohrer also expressed support for the officer, calling him a valued veteran of the department.

Lt. Richard Perez, a police spokesman, said he could not say how or why the gun discharged.

"When you draw the weapon, you always try to assess what the potential threat is going to be," Perez said. He said the officers in the tactical squad are "highly trained officers. Do unintentional shootings occur? Absolutely. We're humans, and these kind of things do occur."

Perez said he did not know what type of handgun Culosi was shot with.

After several years without any shootings, officers shot and wounded several people last year, including one of their own officers in an accidental shooting. A robbery suspect was shot this month on Route 1. In the nearly 39 years that Robert F. Horan Jr. has been the chief prosecutor in Fairfax, no officer has been charged with improperly shooting someone.

Rohrer said in his statement that the tactical squad routinely performs arrests and provides support for detectives executing search warrants. The chief said in his statement that "we will fully review, as always, our policies, practices and this operation in detail."

Culosi's family said that "police action that results in the death of an unarmed, nonthreatening person calls for a full and open investigation. We hope proper steps are taken by county police to ensure other families won't have to endure similar pain."

DOJ_NMG_0012165

Culosi was a lifelong Pittsburgh Steelers fan, longtime friend Steve Lunceford said. Culosi excelled at soccer, playing on travel teams as a youth and for the O'Connell varsity. He was not married and had no children.

"He was gregarious, outgoing, loved to sing off-key at weddings," Lunceford said. "For this to happen, it's surreal. The police need to account for and be held accountable for their actions."

Deon Chapman said he became a casual friend of Culosi's after meeting him at a pool tournament at a Fairfax bar about 10 years ago. "He was a laid-back guy, funny guy. . . . I've never known him to even carry a pocketknife. This is a college boy, clean-cut." He also said he had no idea that Culosi might have been a bookie.

In an affidavit for the search warrant, Detective David J. Baucom, who often investigates sports gambling in Fairfax, said he met Culosi at a bar in October and started making NFL bets with him by cell phone. Baucom said he placed more than $28,000 in bets on games through last Sunday and met Culosi about every two weeks to pay his debts or collect his winnings, either at a restaurant or Culosi's home. Through Jan. 16, Baucom had lost more than $5,500 to Culosi, his affidavit stated.

Lt. Steve Thompson, Baucom's supervisor in the police organized crime division, said in a recent interview that there is no shortage of sports bookies in Fairfax and that police investigate only those who meet certain criteria. He said that Fairfax typically goes after only those bookies with many customers who take in $100,000 in bets per week and that larger bookies will take in $300,000 to $400,000 on a busy football weekend.

Last month, another investigation headed by Baucom resulted in the arrest of a man suspected of being a bookie who lives in Washington but operated in Fairfax. When police searched his safe deposit boxes, they seized nearly $350,000 in cash, court records show. Charges against that man are pending.

After shooting Culosi, police searched his townhouse. The results of that search were not available yesterday.

Perez said Culosi had not displayed a weapon or shown any violent tendencies while he was being investigated by Baucom. But Perez said police had to be prepared for any possibility, because "the unexpected can occur."

Crimes Prompt More Police Patrols In Adams Morgan (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

A spate of crimes outside Adams Morgan clubs and bars, including two assaults in which victims were left in critical condition, has prompted police to plan greater deployment in the area of 18th Street NW, they said yesterday.

Larry McCoy, commander of the 3rd Police District, said the number of officers will grow to as many as 23, up from five to 10 on a typical Thursday, Friday or Saturday night.

McCoy said that the officers will be moved from other shifts in the 3rd District and that they will be on foot, in cars and on scooters. The officers will patrol the main strip and side streets, he said.

"We're going to get this under control and make sure people can come into Adams Morgan and not have any fear," McCoy said at a news conference organized by D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1).

A business group plans to supplement the effort with a contingent of security guards and off-duty police to patrol the area on weekends, said Josh Gibson, executive director of Adams Morgan's newly formed business improvement district.

Thousands of people pour into Adams Morgan on weekend nights, drawn by its cafes and clubs.

Pat Patrick, vice president of the Adams Morgan Business and Professional Association, said fights have been started by youths who hang out on 18th Street NW until clubs close at 3 a.m.

"They have nothing better to do than insult or assault women as they come out; I've seen it with my own eyes," he said. "And then you have a full-fledged fight. These are not people who work in the area. These are purely people who look to pick a fight."

Overall, reported crime in the area that includes 18th Street increased by 5 percent from 2004 to 2005, including a 38 percent increase in burglaries, according to police statistics provided by the Kalorama Citizens Association.

While robberies declined by 13 percent last year, there was an increase from August to December, when there were 61, compared with 42 during the same period in 2004, according to the statistics.

In recent weeks, five assaults were reported, up from two for the same period last year, McCoy said. In one incident in December, a man was beaten outside a parking garage on 18th Street and was in a coma for more than a week. Police recently made an arrest after a suspect surrendered.

Last weekend, a man, 35, fell into a coma after he was punched and his head hit the pavement, apparently while defending a woman who had exchanged words with a group of men.

At the news conference, Graham said the neighborhood is generally safe but needs more policing.

"It's not a situation where we have gangs," he said. "It's a situation where people are losing their tempers."

DOJ_NMG_0012166

Man Taught Son To Work Gun, Prosecutor Says (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The father of an 8-year-old boy arrested in the shooting of a 7-year-old girl at their Germantown day-care center provided his son with violent video games and showed him how to cock and release a gun hammer the day before the boy pulled the trigger, a prosecutor said yesterday.

John L. Hall has "significant influence" over the juvenile suspect, Montgomery County Assistant State's Attorney Karyn McAuliffe said during a bond hearing for Hall, who has been charged with numerous weapons offenses and was arrested the same day as his son.

"He shares a bedroom with the 8-year-old child where he keeps the gun," McAuliffe said, referring to the .38-caliber Taurus revolver suspected of being used to shoot the girl in the upper right arm. "The child had previously been discovered playing with bullets."

Hall's sister, Darlene Hall, 53, disputed the prosecutor's characterization of her brother's influence over the child. "My brother is not a monster," she said.

The shooting victim, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary, was scheduled to be released last night from Children's Hospital in the District, her father said in a statement issued by the hospital. Neither he nor the girl was identified.

Law enforcement sources said the boy took the gun to the For Kids We Care Inc. center Tuesday after telling classmates last Friday after a fight that he had easy access to guns. The sources said the boy, who was not identified because he was charged as a juvenile, threatened to rob the girl before firing the single shot. Police have not disclosed the charges against the boy.

Montgomery District Court Judge Mary Beth McCormick reduced Hall's bond to $75,000 yesterday after authorities charged him Tuesday with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor and two other gun charges.

He is to appear before a judge again today because police have filed two additional weapons charges against him -- the unlawful transfer of a firearm and possession of a firearm by a felon convicted of a violent crime, which carries a mandatory minimum five-year sentence for a conviction.

Yesterday, police arrested a second man, Clyde Colmes Jr., 53, of Germantown, who they said was the registered owner of the weapon fired at the day-care center. Police said Colmes gave Hall the gun knowing that Hall couldn't possess one.

Assistant public defender Samantha Sandler said Hall has worked at the National Institutes of Health for more than a decade and has not been in trouble since 1989. Before then, he had been convicted of numerous crimes, including assault with the intent to maim.

Darlene Hall acknowledged her brother's criminal history, which stretched from 1968 to 1989, but said, "As an adult, he's been a productive citizen."

She said her nephew has had long-standing behavior problems.

"The child is on Ritalin," a drug often prescribed to children who are hyperactive or have attention deficit disorder, she said. "The mother can't control him."

The aunt said she doesn't think the boy took the gun to the day-care center, in the 12600 block of Grey Eagle Court, where he was dropped off by his stepsister early Tuesday. Darlene Hall also said her brother lives with her in Gaithersburg, disputing prosecutors' assertion that he shares a room with the boy at his mother's apartment.

John Hall listed the Grey Eagle address in his June 28 application for a restraining order against a woman he says assaulted him. The order was dismissed because Hall did not appear for a hearing.

The boy, a third-grader at Cedar Grove Elementary School, appeared before a judge yesterday shortly after his father's bond hearing. Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge Michael J. Algeo closed the child's hearing to the public. Maryland judges may in some instances close hearings of juveniles in criminal proceedings.

The boy's mother, Debbie Shipp, attended his hearing. She declined to comment.

The girl's father released a statement late Tuesday through the hospital urging more parental responsibility.

"This is a harsh reminder that we can never be too careful when it comes to the safety of our children," he said in the statement. "Parents need to realize how dangerous it is to keep guns in a place where their children can get to them. I don't want any parent to have to get a call like I got this morning."

He said his daughter will return to the day-care center once she recovers.

Mike Bass, the father of a 2-year-old girl who attends For Kids We Care, dropped off his daughter at sunrise yesterday. He said that although the shooting was chilling, he plans to continue using the center.

DOJ_NMG_0012167

"I wouldn't want to take my daughter to a day care where they searched the kids," said Bass, 30, of Germantown. "The responsibility lies within the parents. I don't think the day care could have done anything to prevent it."

The Innocent And The Shammed (NYT)

By Joshua Marquis

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Astoria, Ore.

AS the words scroll across a darkened TV screen, we hear an authoritative voice announce that every year an alarming number of people in this country "are wrongfully convicted." Millions of Americans who watched these promotions in recent weeks knew they were pitches for the new ABC television drama "In Justice." But if they'd been listening from the next room, they might easily have thought from the somber tone that it was a tease for the nightly news or "20/20."

"In Justice" has received dismal reviews. But that hasn't stopped its premise from permeating the conventional wisdom: that our prisons are chock-full of doe-eyed innocents who have been framed by venal prosecutors and corrupt police officers with the help of grossly incompetent public defenders. It is a misconception that has run through our popular culture from "Perry Mason" to the novels of Scott Turow to the recent hit play "The Exonerated."

It was also seen on the front pages in recent weeks, in reporting about Roger Coleman, who was executed in Virginia in 1992 for rape and murder. DNA testing at the time had placed him within one-fifth of a percent of possible suspects, leading to widespread claims that he was innocent. The governor, L. Douglas Wilder, said he would consider commuting Mr. Coleman's sentence if he passed a lie detector test. He failed and was executed.

For more than a decade opponents of the death penalty have held up the Coleman case as the example that would prove that America executed an innocent man. Yet on Jan. 12 the Canadian laboratory that had been sent the last remaining DNA sample in the case announced the results of more advanced testing: it put the odds of Mr. Coleman not being the killer at less than 1 in 19 million. Still, while Mr. Coleman's face graced the cover of Time magazine at the height of the controversy, it is unlikely you will see him on the cover again marking his rightful conviction.

Americans love the underdog. Thousands of law students aspire to be Atticus Finch, the famous fictional lawyer from "To Kill A Mockingbird." But this can go too far: one of the jurors who acquitted the actor Robert Blake of murder last year cited the TV program "CSI" as the basis of her knowledge of what good police work should be. And if we take a deep breath and examine the state of American justice, a very different picture will emerge.

To start, only 14 Americans who were once on death row have been exonerated by DNA evidence alone. The hordes of Americans wrongfully convicted exist primarily on Planet Hollywood. In the Winter 2005 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, a group led by Samuel Gross, a law professor at the University of Michigan, published an exhaustive study of exonerations around the country from 1989 to 2003 in cases ranging from robbery to capital murder. They were able to document only 340 inmates who were eventually freed. (They counted cases where defendants were retried after an initial conviction and subsequently found not guilty as "exonerations.") Yet, despite the relatively small number his research came up with, Mr. Gross says he is certain that far more innocents languish undiscovered in prison.

So, let's give the professor the benefit of the doubt: let's assume that he understated the number of innocents by roughly a factor of 10, that instead of 340 there were 4,000 people in prison who weren't involved in the crime in any way. During that same 15 years, there were more than 15 million felony convictions across the country. That would make the error rate .027 percent — or, to put it another way, a success rate of 99.973 percent.

Most industries would like to claim such a record of efficiency. And while, of course, people's lives are far more important than widgets, we have an entire appeals court system intended to intervene in those few cases where the innocent are in jeopardy.

It is understandable that journalists focus on the rare case in which an innocent man or woman is sent to prison — because, as all reporters know, how many planes landed safely today has never been news. The larger issue is whether those who influence the culture, like an enormous television network, have a moral responsibility to keep the facts straight regardless of their thirst for drama. "In Justice" may soon find itself on the canceled list, but several million people will still have watched it, and they are likely to have the impression that wrongfully convicted death row inmates are the virtual rule.

The words "innocent" and "exonerated" carry tremendous emotional and political weight. But these terms have been tortured beyond recognition — not just by defense lawyers, but by the disseminators of entertainment under the guise of social conscience.

"The Exonerated" played for several years Off Broadway with a Who's Who of stage and screen stars portraying six supposedly innocent people who were once on death row. The play, originally subsidized by George Soros, the liberal billionaire philanthropist, now tours college campuses and was made into a television movie by Court TV.

DOJ_NMG_0012168

The script never mentions that two of the play's six characters (Sonia Jacobs and Kerry Cook) were not exonerated, but were let out of prison after a combined 36 years behind bars when they agreed to plea bargains. A third (Robert Hayes) was unavailable to do publicity tours because he is in prison, having pleaded guilty to another homicide almost identical to the one of which he was acquitted.

American justice is a work in progress, and those of us charged with administering it are well aware that it needs constant improvement. But nothing is gained by deluding the public into believing that the police and prosecutors are trying to send innocent people to prison. Any experienced defense lawyer will concede that he would starve if he accepted only "innocent" clients. Americans should be far more worried about the wrongfully freed than the wrongfully convicted.

Once More With Amy, Joey And Mary Jo (NYT)

By Lawrence Downes

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Before Angie and Brad, before Monica and Bill, there was Amy and Joey. Amy Fisher and Joey Buttafuoco — the Long Island Lolita and her body-shop lover — with Joey's wife, Mary Jo, formed a triangle of passion, obsession and violence that became the industry standard for tabloid crime way, way back in 1992.

There is an entire generation, or at least a cohort, or maybe a handful, or at least one or two journalists who remember working on that day in May when the story broke, and who still marvel at how that strange crime — a housewife in a swanky suburb shot in the face — soon became much stranger. It swelled in significance until it made headlines coast to coast and around the globe.

The South Shore of Long Island was something then. Nobody could touch Long Island for tabloid crime in those days, and people were raised right — they paid attention. The Amy and Joey story spawned not just one made-for-TV movie but three, among them vehicles for Alyssa Milano and Drew Barrymore. It put Massapequa on the map.

Back then, a nobody starting out with nothing — just a mighty helmet of hair, a pair of snakeskin boots and a statutory rape conviction — could dream of one day making it big in Hollywood. And make it Joey sorta did, taking bit parts in movies like "Mafia Movie Madness" and, lately, selling protein shakes on the set of "Desperate Housewives." He seems incapable of parlaying his fame into lasting fortune, though, possibly because of problems involving insurance fraud, probation violations and ammunition possession, possibly because he is a skeevy knucklehead.

Amy Fisher always seemed to be the smart one in this dense equation. She left prison, wrote a book and found a respectable position as a columnist for The Long Island Press. She left that job recently, but not before impressing many people with her articulate voice and winning a journalism award.

Poor Mary Jo, who miraculously survived the shooting despite serious injuries, forgave both Amy and Joey, and moved out to California with him. They divorced in 2003.

I miss the Buttafuoco era. Joey and Amy were the Sid Caesar and Howdy Doody of reality TV, relics of a simpler time when crime sold newspapers — imagine that — and when the culture tended to look down on adultery and teenage prostitutes, and when attempted murder carried a hint of shame, which presumably was why Amy, in her perp walk, went to the trouble of hiding her face with her long brown hair.

We learned this week in The New York Post that Amy, Joey and Mary Jo had agreed to be reunited for a TV show. That promises to be a complete waste of time, although the guy trying to sell the idea says there will be shocking revelations.

It is hard to imagine what those may be, or that a revival of this Long Island melodrama — even with its original cast — can regain even a fraction of its former glory. But you never know. Billy Joel, who sank pretty low into his own tabloid hell, is playing Madison Square Garden again in a sold-out engagement of record length. Howard Stern has re-emerged on satellite radio. We could be on the brink of another Long Island moment, and those have been hard to come by lately.

CIVIL LAW:

Ex-supervisor At GE Parts Plant Sues (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

MADISONVILLE, Ky. -- A former supervisor at a General Electric Co. plant has filed $50.5 million federal lawsuit that claims that he was fired for testifying that GE shipped defective parts to military and commercial customers.

DOJ_NMG_0012169

James Richard Gardner, of Madisonville, filed the suit Friday in U.S. District Court in Louisville. Gardner said he repeatedly alerted managers at the Madisonville plant that engine turbine blades were not meeting company and government specifications and that defective parts were shipped with the knowledge of managers to meet production requirements.

Marta Rhyner, a GE spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on specific allegations made in the lawsuit. She said the company is "confident in the parts produced by our employees at Madisonville."

The Defense Department began a criminal investigation at the plant in November 2000. The Justice Department is conducting a civil investigation.

Gardner alleged that the plant had concealed flaws on some blades. He said he asked his supervisor, "Is this legal?" He said he was told, "It's our shop. As long as people stamp it, it's good," according to the lawsuit.

Gardner was subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Bowling Green in June 2003. Before his appearance, Gardner said he was told by a plant manager that he would meet with a corporate attorney to be coached on how to answer. Gardner said he was told to answer "No" or "I don't know."

Gardner said he was later transferred to a different part of the plant, subsequently demoted and then fired last April after refusing a company buyout offer.

The lawsuit said the Air Force notified GE in 1999 that defective blades had been found in engines on fighter jets. Approximately 5,000 blades were returned to Madisonville for inspection and cleaning.

Former supervisor and quality control expert Terri Brown filed a $53 million lawsuit against GE in 2004. The filing alleges Brown was harassed and shoved down a stairway after raising concerns about defective parts being shipped to customers. It was unsealed in 2004.

Trustee Called Threat To Plan For Adelphia (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, January 26, 2006

In a decision released Wednesday in the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of cable company Adelphia Communications, the presiding judge said the motions by which one group of creditors sought the appointment of a trustee to oversee disputes and the disqualification of chief Adelphia bankruptcy counsel Willkie Farr & Gallagher constituted a "nuclear war button" threatening obliteration of a crucial $17.6 billion deal.

Southern District of New York Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber's strongly worded 113-page decision, In re Adelphia, 02-41729, previously filed under seal, clarified his order issued earlier in the week denying the appointment of a trustee but granting the disqualification of Willkie lawyers from participating in the disputes at issue. Willkie remains bankruptcy counsel to Adelphia.

Those disputes, which the requested trustee would have overseen, are between different groups of debt holders, all seeking to maximize their own claims on the bankruptcy estate, most of the assets of which are slated to be sold to rival cable companies Time Warner and Comcast for $17.6 billion.

The potential appointment of a bankruptcy trustee is almost always controversial, as such trustees are usually granted broad-ranging powers to settle disputes or dispose of assets.

Gerber said the disqualification and trustee motions, brought in November by noteholders of Arahova, a subsidiary through which Adelphia issued some $540 million in debt, seemed designed to "purposefully" imperil that sale as part of a "scorched earth litigation strategy" aimed at extracting a larger distribution by threatening dire consequences for all.

"The relief sought by the Arahova Noteholders Committee could (and, in some circumstances, will) give Time Warner and Comcast the right to terminate the Purchase Agreements," he wrote. "If the sale transaction is not consummated, there will be severe, negative economic impact on all of the Debtors, including the subsidiaries of Arahova."

The judge pointed out Adelphia could owe Time Warner and Comcast a $443 million breakup fee if the transaction failed to close. He further noted the appointment of a trustee would constitute a default event under the agreement that provided Adelphia with $1.3 billion in debtor-in-possession financing.

"Where interdebtor issues exist and are material, they cannot, of course, be swept under the rug ... But the means established to resolve them should be the least destructive available," the judge wrote. "And neither the interests of a debtor's creditor body, nor the integrity of the bankruptcy system, can tolerate the use of motions like these as a tactic to assist creditor groups wishing to augment their personal recoveries."

Gerber noted that similar disputes among creditors had been a feature of other major bankruptcies, including those of WorldCom Inc., and Enron Corp.

Southern District Bankruptcy Judge Arthur Gonzalez, who oversaw both of those cases, appointed a trustee in neither, citing in the former the complexity of the case and the expense and delay that familiarizing a trustee would entail.

DOJ_NMG_0012170

Likewise, Gerber said the case's complexity as well as the cost and delay involved weighed heavily against the appointment of a trustee. Moreover, "[t]he Balkanization of the decision making in this case would be highly damaging to all of the debtors, and their creditors, and the Arahova Debtors and their creditors would be no exception," he said.

NEUTRAL POSITION

Though he denied the motion to appoint a trustee, Gerber granted the disqualification of Willkie and further directed the recusal of Arahova managers with regard to disputes between creditors. But he made clear he felt the lawyers and executives had already voluntarily acted to maintain their neutrality in those disputes and his ruling was merely "prophylactic."

"[Willkie] has done nothing wrong," the judge wrote. "But the prophylactic imposition of mandatory neutrality on [Willkie] on interdebtor issues would not cause [Willkie], or the debtors, any material prejudice either."

Willkie has represented Adelphia since its 2002 bankruptcy filing amid charges that the Rigases, the company's founding family, looted it of hundreds of millions of dollars. The judge said the firm has played little role in the creditors' disputes beyond a neutral role of providing parties with information.

But the Arahova noteholders had originally sought to disqualify the law firm generally, barring it even from continuing work on the Time Warner/Comcast sale. This, Gerber said, would have been a disaster for the company.

"[Willkie] has acquired an extraordinary expertise in Adelphia affairs," the judge wrote, "and has performed its responsibilities with distinction. The loss of either of those especially at this late date, would be terrible for creditors, and would materially delay, if not torpedo, the Debtor's timely reorganization."

The Arahova noteholders were represented by J. Christopher Shore and Thomas Lauria of White & Case. The lawyers from Willkie leading the case have been Marc Abrams and Roger Netzer. Both sides declined to comment.

Flood Of Bids Is Behind Delay At GSA (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The General Services Administration said yesterday that it got more bids than expected for a $20 billion telecommunications contract known as Networx, forcing the agency to delay the award so it can evaluate the complex proposals.

"The good news is that we have a tremendous amount of interest in the program. The bad news is that we have a lot of work to do," said John C. Johnson, who is overseeing the program for the GSA.

The 10-year telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA, has attracted bids from companies including AT&T Inc., Qwest Communications International Inc., Sprint Nextel Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.

The contract is split into two parts: Networx Universal, which requires bidders to show they can provide a vast array of services around the globe, and Networx Enterprise, which has narrower requirements to allow smaller firms to get a piece of the action.

Contract awards had been due this year, but the GSA said Monday that bids would be delayed until next year without giving a reason.

Johnson, who said he was barred by federal procurement regulations from disclosing the number or names of bidders, said more companies had showed interest in the overall project than he expected and the bids covered "the whole spectrum" in terms of their quality.

"The level of interest was higher than expected, and these are large -- very large -- contracts, very complex, and the quality of the offers varies," he said. "Taking those things into account, we believe that it's going to take us longer to evaluate and ultimately make the awards."

Johnson said the GSA does not need more resources to handle the bids.

Federal contracting experts said delays of large federal contracts were not unusual, particularly those with complex technical requirements such as Networx. They also said there is often a lengthy back-and-forth with bidders to clarify their proposals.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), chairman of the House Committee on Government Reform, which has federal procurement oversight, said he was not too troubled by the delay.

"While I am certainly a bit disappointed in this latest delay and feel it's taking longer than it should, it is more important for GSA to do this right than to do it on schedule," Davis said in a written statement.

"Most of us expected there might be some delay. I think we were all surprised at the length of the delay," said Tony D'Agata, a vice president for federal government business at Sprint Nextel.

The GSA's Johnson said his agency planned to extend the current federal telecom contract -- FTS 2001 -- with the two incumbent providers, Sprint Nextel and Verizon.

DOJ_NMG_0012171

D'Agata said the GSA had proposed prolonging Sprint Nextel's contract, which expires in December, for two years with the option for three further six-month extensions. He said the extra time might be needed to migrate federal agencies from the current contract to Networx.

Airborne Incident As It Adapts To Information Age, Lockheed Fumbles Key Project (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BETHESDA, Md. -- In 2004, Lockheed Martin Corp. won an Army spy-plane contract that broke with the past. Lockheed, the maker of such legendary surveillance planes as the U-2, wouldn't actually build the new model. Instead it would serve as the "lead integrator" -- stuffing somebody else's hardware with high-tech eavesdropping gear.

The spy plane was supposed to symbolize Lockheed's skill at harnessing information-age technology for the battlefield, a big goal at the Pentagon these days. But Lockheed engineers proved unable to load the airframe they were buying from Brazil with the equipment the Army wanted. Earlier this month, the Army scrapped Lockheed's contract.

The debacle is a setback for Chief Executive Robert Stevens and his young "integrated solutions" division, which he has put at the center of Lockheed's effort to recast itself for a new era. It's also a signal for the entire defense industry that de-emphasizing old-style hardware in favor of software and systems management isn't a sure path to success. The speed with which Lockheed's new spy plane crashed indicates how little margin there is for error as the Pentagon comes under pressure to pare weapons spending because of Iraq war costs and the rising federal deficit.

The Army, which sent mixed signals about what it wanted in the spy plane, shares some of the blame for the contract's demise, and Lockheed wasn't formally cited for performance shortfalls. In an interview while Lockheed was still scrambling to save the spy plane, Mr. Stevens said he was "personally disappointed" about the design problems but called them a reminder of the risks in projects that "push the state of the art."

Lockheed, the biggest U.S. defense contractor, isn't alone in trying to transform itself from manufacturer to integrator. Companies that used to boast about their planes, ships and tanks now talk about operating systems and communications networks. The shift reflects the fact that across all technology markets, the biggest profits often lie in designing software and making products work together. Meanwhile manufacturing hardware is becoming a lower-margin business.

Boeing Co. won a contract as lead integrator for the Army's program to modernize its ground forces, whose ultimate cost may top $150 billion. The Chicago plane maker will develop the software blueprint for the program, but it isn't making any of the 18 new vehicles. General Dynamics Corp., best known for its ships and tanks, is designing a battlefield communications network to keep moving troops linked to satellites.

Mr. Stevens has moved aggressively to seize opportunities in what he calls the "evolution from the Industrial Age to the Information Age." Besides the spy plane, Lockheed has other high-profile integration projects where the company acts as chief architect to make software, electronics and other systems work together with hardware. Though not a helicopter maker, Lockheed won an upset victory last year to develop the next Marine One presidential chopper fleet by teaming with a foreign helicopter maker, Italian-owned AgustaWestland. Lockheed also gained a share of a Navy program for small, stealthy warships, though it owns no shipyard. The company is even building a digital database for the National Archives.

Mr. Stevens hopes the growth will make up for a possible slowdown in Lockheed's traditional mainstay of plane manufacturing. Budget challenges could curtail two huge programs led by Lockheed: the Joint Strike Fighter, which carries an estimated lifetime price tag of $240 billion, and the F-22 supersonic stealth fighter, which was officially deployed this month. Space, another Lockheed mainstay, could also face pressure as military-space programs undergo restructuring.

Wave of Deals

For decades, Lockheed has been synonymous with innovative aircraft. Its hits include the original radar-evading stealth planes. But a wave of deals in the 1990s including a merger with Martin Marietta Corp. left the company sprawling and heavily indebted. Prior to his promotion to chief executive in 2004, Mr. Stevens helped lead Lockheed's successful comeback strategy of slashing costs and refocusing by selling nondefense assets such as commercial telecommunications ventures. The company had already stopped making commercial aircraft in the 1980s.

Helped by post-9/11 defense spending and the big Joint Strike Fighter contract, Lockheed has grown rapidly in recent years and restored profits. In 2005 analysts estimate its revenue exceeded $37 billion, up from $24 billion in 2001. The company reports full-year 2005 figures today. Its stock price, which fell below $17 in 2000, now stands at about $65, near a 52-week high.

A former Marine, the 54-year-old Mr. Stevens is the only current chief executive at a top-five U.S. defense contractor who served in the military. He has sought to instill a more collaborative culture across Lockheed's five business units and 135,000 employees. Managers now get incentives for joining internal teams even if they aren't running a project. "The concept is that it's as good to be the follower as it is to be the leader," says Robert Coutts, executive vice president of electronic systems, which leads four major multidivision programs and supports four others.

DOJ_NMG_0012172

The collaboration drive has even incorporated Lockheed's renowned Skunk Works, the secretive unit that fathered the stealth planes and long worked almost exclusively on aerospace projects. Now, it spends one-third of its time lending its expertise to other Lockheed businesses. Skunk Works head Frank Cappuccio credits the change to a "culture created by Stevens that says, 'Reach out.' "

No division was meant to embody Mr. Stevens's strategy more than the integrated systems and solutions unit -- the one in charge of the aborted spy plane. Formed in late 2003 by Mr. Stevens, then Lockheed president, the unit is designed to herd ideas and experts from around the company to capture Pentagon business in networked battlefield systems.

The Army spy plane, called the Aerial Common Sensor and potentially valued at $8 billion over its lifetime, looked like the perfect project for the new Lockheed unit. The Army wanted to replace two aging propeller-plane models that patrol battlefields and flashpoints such as the border between North and South Korea. The new spy plane would bulge with scores of antennas and sensors, collecting a wealth of information to be sped in real time to commanders and troops.

Heeding a Pentagon drive to save money by developing common weapons, the Army tried to enlist the Navy, which needed to replace its own creaky spy planes. The Army also decided to award the contract as a package deal instead of holding one competition for the airframe and another for the electronics and sensors. Both strategies would ultimately complicate the program.

To speed up development and keep costs down, Lockheed wanted to adapt an existing airplane model for the mission. After studying dozens of airplanes, it chose to go into the bid with a 50-seat passenger jet made by Brazil's Empresa Brasileira de Aeronáutica SA, or Embraer. The Embraer plane had been adapted for military use in Brazil and was among the cheapest of its size in the market.

Even before the final bid, some engineers at Lockheed questioned whether the Embraer plane could support the weight of the crew and equipment, according to people involved in the bid. The Army wanted six onboard workstations instead of Lockheed's suggested four. Lockheed re-evaluated its bid and considered ditching Embraer. Just weeks before the June 2004 deadline, Lockheed sent letters to at least three plane makers, Boeing, General Dynamics and Bombardier Inc., seeking information about larger airframes.

Instead of switching at the 11th hour, Lockheed made what it describes as low-risk modifications to the wings, engines and fuselage of the Embraer plane to accommodate the extra weight. It submitted its bid with full confidence that the proposal could fulfill the Army's mission, says Marshall Keith, who later became Lockheed's vice president for the spy-plane program.

On Aug. 3, 2004, Lockheed beat out Northrop Grumman Corp., which had bid using a Gulfstream business jet from General Dynamics, for an $879 million development contract to build the first five Aerial Common Sensor planes. The Northrop bid was nixed because its jet couldn't carry the weight, Army officials said.

Airplane programs almost always encounter weight issues in development, but Lockheed's problems became severe early on. Because the company approached the program as an electronic integration project, it had largely excluded senior aeronautical engineers from its development team. Once detailed design work began, Lockheed discovered that the sensors and workstations would require extra supports, insulation and other equipment, adding significant unexpected weight.

By November, just three months after winning the contract, the startup problems forced Lockheed to clean house. It replaced 11 of the 13 engineering team leaders and dumped the program's manager in favor of Mr. Keith, who had aircraft-integration experience. It enlisted engineers from the aeronautics division, including the Skunk Works.

Reinforcements Arrive

The reinforcements arrived in Denver, where spy-plane work was based. As they corrected basic assumptions, the plane grew even heavier. One key problem: Technology advances had made electronic components lighter, but Lockheed had used a modeling tool that presumed the same degree of slimming for cables and wires. That wasn't the case, says Edward Bair, the Army's top official for the spy-plane program.

"We sent experts to major subcontractors to weigh cables on scales," says Lockheed's Mr. Keith -- a step that normally comes much later in development.

While Lockheed had left itself little leeway, the weight issues weren't all its fault. Mr. Bair says the Army insisted that the plane be able to operate all spy sensors simultaneously for nearly eight hours in flight, whether or not all were needed. That meant greater cooling and power demands, and thus more weight. The Army also demanded a stronger frame for crash protection, and the Navy -- which still hadn't formally joined the program -- wanted additional reinforcement in order to fly at low altitudes, within range of surface fire.

DOJ_NMG_0012173

By May of last year, the plane had ballooned by 5,139 pounds beyond Lockheed's bid proposal to 42,886 pounds, according to Army figures. The weight had become nearly 3,000 pounds more than the Embraer model could bear. The weight of cables and installation equipment alone nearly doubled.

Lockheed proposed substituting a 100-passenger jet made by Embraer for the original 50-seat plane. Eager to retain its inaugural Pentagon project, the Brazilian company offered the plane at the same price as the previous jet, according to a Lockheed official. Embraer declined to comment.

The Army was open at first to letting Lockheed swap the plane without reopening its contract for bidding. It asked Lockheed to look at other companies' planes in addition to Embraer's 100-seater. However, the Army quickly grew more concerned as the spy plane's estimated development cost grew to $1.8 billion, double the size of the original Lockheed contract, because of new engineering and other costs. In September, the Army suspended development funding, meaning Lockheed wouldn't be paid as it researched ways to salvage the program.

That same day, Mr. Stevens accepted responsibility for the spy plane, telling an investor conference that almost all of Lockheed's 3,000 programs are "performing superbly well. But we're not flawless, and it takes just a single program to create real stress in the enterprise." He denied in an October interview that the plane's woes stemmed from an initial shortage of aeronautical engineers, but said he was "applying all of the resources of this company" to produce a workable plane.

Soon after funding was halted, Mr. Stevens visited Army Secretary Francis Harvey to try saving the contract. At the Denver facility, the Brazilian flag representing Lockheed's partnership with Embraer still flew, but the team turned its energies to another airframe for the project: the Global Express business jet made by Bombardier Inc. of Montreal. In November, after thousands of engineering man-hours for which Lockheed and its subcontractors weren't paid, the company pitched the Global Express to the Army.

Army acquisition officials were wary of the repeated changes and inclined to pull the plug. They extended a review to avoid jeopardizing funds while Congress was still debating the Pentagon budget. On Jan. 12, the Army made its decision: The Lockheed contract was dead.

Army acquisition chief Claude Bolton says a new spy plane is still needed, but to make it succeed, the government and industry will have to go "back to the drawing board."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gay Marriage Ban Advances Toward Va. Referendum (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Jan. 25 -- The state Senate all but guaranteed on Wednesday that Virginia will hold a November referendum on whether to amend its 230-year-old Bill of Rights to bar same-sex marriages.

The Senate voted 28 to 11 to follow the House of Delegates in approving the amendment. Though each chamber still must pass the measure adopted by the other, their wording is identical and support among the senators and delegates is strong.

"The family is the foundation of our society, and it's been based on a union of a man and a woman since the inception of marriage," said Del. John A. Cosgrove (R-Chesapeake). "A constitutional amendment . . . will protect that."

In Maryland, Republicans introduced a similar measure in the Senate on Wednesday and said they believe they have the votes they need to bring the matter to an up-or-down vote, despite resistance from leaders of the Democrat-controlled legislature.

In the wake of a circuit court ruling last week that declared Maryland's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriage discriminatory, GOP leaders said it was important to at least put the matter to a vote.

"Some senators are clearly going to be put on the spot," said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris (R-Baltimore County). "But I think they know we can't take the risk of sitting it out and doing nothing."

Eighteen state constitutions define marriage as a union between a man and a woman, many through amendments approved since 2003, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Massachusetts is the only state that grants marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Connecticut and Vermont recognize civil unions, while four states, the District and several dozen localities allow couples to formalize relationships through domestic-partnership registries.

District leaders are considering a bill that would strengthen the city's domestic-partnership law.

In Virginia, the General Assembly's action is likely to spark an intense campaign by the amendment's supporters and by gay rights groups before the Nov. 7 vote.

DOJ_NMG_0012174

The state Bill of Rights was last amended in 1996, when voters supported adding a section protecting the rights of crime victims. Although changes to the state constitution are common, the 1996 action was the only time the Bill of Rights has been amended since 1970, when voters ratified a new version of the constitution.

The Bill of Rights was written by George Mason, a founding father of Virginia and the United States. "It's essentially the same document it was in 1776 in body and spirit," said A.E. Dick Howard, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Virginia, who led a commission responsible for writing the state's current constitution.

The amendment barring same-sex marriage would be added to Section 15, which begins by saying, "That no free government, nor the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue . . . "

The Virginia Bill of Rights served as a model for other states and for the first 10 amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

The marriage amendment would say in part, "That only a union between one man and one woman may be a marriage valid in or recognized by this Commonwealth and its political subdivisions."

Supporters said that a traditional definition of marriage is so important that it belongs in the most hallowed of Virginia documents.

"The only place in the constitution to put this is in the Bill of Rights," said Sen. Stephen D. Newman (R-Lynchburg). "There is currently no right in the United States, or certainly not in Virginia, for anything other than a marriage between one man and one woman."

Virginia law already defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman and does not allow for civil unions, but proponents said the amendment is needed in case courts try to force the state to recognize same-sex marriages or civil unions performed in other states.

Opponents said the amendment would corrupt the original intent of Mason's document by preventing a class of Virginians from enjoying the same rights as other Virginians.

"I find it ironic, Mr. President, that this resolution will amend the Bill of Rights, that section of the constitution that holds sacrosanct the unalienable rights of all human beings," said Sen. Mamie Locke (D-Newport News) during a floor speech.

Del. Adam P. Ebbin (D-Alexandria), the only openly gay legislator, said during the House debate this month, "This resolution seeks to write citizens out of our most sacred document."

At the Capitol on Wednesday, hundreds of supporters of Equality Virginia, the state's leading gay rights organization, vowed they would defeat the amendment.

"There are tens of thousands of people . . . prepared to fight this so-called marriage amendment," said Dyana Mason, executive director of Equality Virginia.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) does not have to review the amendment resolution. He could veto a separate bill that specifically calls for the November referendum, but press secretary Delacey Skinner said he will not do so.

"The governor's position is that a marriage is between one man and one woman," Skinner said.

The issue had been largely dormant in Maryland until last week, when a Baltimore Circuit Court judge ruled that the state's ban on same-sex marriage was unconstitutional.

The ruling, which came at the start of an election year for the Maryland General Assembly and governor, triggered an immediate response from Republican lawmakers, who said they needed to quickly amend the constitution before the state's highest court had the chance to uphold the lower court.

The Republicans introduced a proposed constitutional amendment in the Senate on Wednesday.

Even though they are outnumbered in the Senate, Republicans said they may have enough support from Democrats to compel a floor vote.

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who is seeking reelection, received a memo this week from his counsel advising him of three options: Wait for the Court of Appeals to rule, lead an effort to amend the constitution or support one led by GOP legislators, aides said.

"My politics on this are very clear," Ehrlich said. "We're going to protect marriage. Traditional marriage."

Democratic leaders have been discussing a strategy that would enable them to voice a clear position without hurting candidates. They're concerned the ruling could galvanize Ehrlich's conservative base, increasing Election Day turnout for him and other Republicans.

There is also a sizable contingent of Democrats who plan to fight GOP efforts because they believe banning gay and lesbian couples from marrying is wrong.

"I think it's a waste of time for a legislative body to argue for something that is so utterly and completely discriminatory," said Del. Sharon Grosfeld (D-Montgomery).

DOJ_NMG_0012175

Marriage Amendment Set For Virginia Ballot (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

The Virginia Senate yesterday gave overwhelming final approval to a constitutional amendment that would define marriage as the union of one man and one woman, clearing the way for the issue to be put to voters in November.

The measure, which also would ban same-sex civil unions, passed 28-11 after a short debate.

Meanwhile, a similar proposal is gaining momentum in Maryland since a Baltimore Circuit Court judge last week ruled that the state's 33-year-old ban on same-sex "marriage" is unconstitutional.

Traditional marriage has widespread support in the Democrat-controlled Maryland legislature.

But state Democratic leaders appear reluctant to put a constitutional amendment on the ballot because it could energize conservative voters in an election year in which Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, is seeking re-election, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, also a Republican, is running for the U.S. Senate.

Maryland House Speaker Michael E. Busch and Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., both Democrats, said that they support traditional marriage, but that the General Assembly should not consider a constitutional amendment on the issue until the state's appellate court can rule on the circuit court judge's decision.

The court isn't expected to issue a ruling before the legislature adjourns in April.

"They don't want it on the ballot," said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican. "The votes are there. This is going to boil down to politics."

In Virginia, state Sen. Stephen D. Newman said the constitutional amendment is necessary to guard against "aggressive" judges in other states, including Maryland, who are trying to redefine marriage.

"A few judges or a few localities are now presuming to change that fundamental meaning for our civilization and their actions have created confusion on the issue," the Lynchburg Republican said. "The federal courts are going to leave us with no other recourse."

Democrats, bolstered by the hundreds of Virginians who lobbied at the state Capitol yesterday for special homosexual rights, argued that the measure would write discrimination into the constitution.

"I feel this overwhelming sense of sadness today, to think that we are deliberately doing something so intolerant, so discriminatory and so overreaching," said Sen. Mary Margaret Whipple, Arlington Democrat.

Sen. Richard L. Saslaw said the amendment will not protect marriage.

"If this is a threat to your marriage, you've got a problem," the Fairfax County Democrat said.

A poll conducted earlier this month by Rasmussen Reports showed that 63 percent of Virginians and 54 percent of Marylanders would support constitutional amendments that define marriage as the union between one man and one woman.

A proposed amendment would need a three-fifths majority in the Maryland House and Senate to go before voters in November.

Virginia's House of Delegates approved the amendment 73-22 earlier this month, and yesterday's final Senate passage placed it on the Nov. 7 ballot. It does not need the signature of Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat.

On Friday, Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdock ruled that it was unconstitutional for Maryland county clerks to deny marriage licenses to nine same-sex couples who applied for them. Judge Murdock said the 1973 law defining marriage violates the state's Equal Rights Amendment to the constitution.

The Maryland Attorney General's Office is appealing the decision.

FBI Report Could Rewrite Account Of Till's Murder (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

JACKSON - An FBI report on the decades-old murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till could rewrite the story of the slaying that put a young man's face on racial injustice in the South during that period.

The Chicago teenager was visiting relatives in the tiny Delta town of Money when he was tortured and killed in the summer of 1955.

His brutalized body was pulled from the Tallahatchie River a few days later. A gin fan was tied to his neck.

But some details of the crime could have been distorted or embellished over the past five decades, the FBI special agent in charge of Mississippi, John G. Raucci, told The Associated Press this week.

"The facts were told one way because that's the information that was available at the time," Raucci said. "And often times it's through urban legends and folklore - and people who lived in the community pass along information from generation to generation - and the next thing you know, they become fact."

DOJ_NMG_0012176

Raucci did not rule out the possibility of indictments in the case or provide a timetable for releasing the report.

The reason Till was pulled from his uncle's home late one night before being beaten and shot, differ from person to person. Some say the youngster bragged about dating white women, and Carolyn Bryant, the 21-year-old wife of grocery story owner Roy Bryant, has claimed Till asked her for date.

Others have said a wolf whistle Till let out outside the grocery store was enough to motivate Roy Bryant and his half brother to kill Till.

Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam were acquitted by an all-white jury after a five-day trial in 1955. And while Milam and Bryant later confessed to the murder in a paid interview with Look Magazine, both men are now dead and no one has been punished.

Some witnesses have said a woman's voice, likely that of Carolyn Bryant could be heard at the scene of the abduction.

A telephone listing for her in Greenville was disconnected when called by the AP on Tuesday. Carolyn Bryant has declined interviews in the past.

Investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice have reportedly said that Henry Lee Loggins, a black man who worked for Milam, has also been investigated. Loggins, 82, has denied any involvement.

Some circumstances of the murder may not yet be clear, but there is little doubt Till's death helped invigorate the civil rights movement.

Mamie Till-Mobley had her son's body returned to Chicago for an open-casket funeral.

Thousands turned out for the service and a photograph of Till's disfigured face in Jet Magazine let the world see what was happening in the South.

Now, more than 50 years later, an official FBI investigative report is under review and should soon be turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles in Greenville.

"That does not necessarily mean that everybody involved in the Emmett Till case or the overt act is still alive or will one day be prosecuted," Raucci said. "Time hurts for a variety of reasons. Evidence may no longer be available. Individuals who may have witnessed an event, time has now gotten the better of their minds."

FBI Project Targets Human Smuggling (CO)

By Franco Ordoñez

The Charlotte Observer, January 26, 2006

The FBI is launching a new effort to raise awareness of human trafficking.

Calling it an offense against humanity akin to modern-day slavery, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Charlotte estimates thousands of victims are trafficked into the state each year for forced labor and prostitution.

"This is something that is flying under the radar," said Special Agent Kevin Kendrick, who is heading the local campaign. "This is a big problem."

In conjunction with increased investigative efforts to shut down human trafficking rings, the FBI is teaming up with local advocacy groups and social organizations to get a message out that federal agents should be trusted and not feared.

The FBI, Kendrick said, is looking to assist all victims of human trafficking, even if they're living in the country illegally. Not only will the FBI protect victims and their rights, Kendrick said, the agency also will help them remain permanently.

Human trafficking often begins with someone paying to be smuggled across the border. The situation changes when smugglers change their prices or add fees the person is unable to pay. Smugglers then force them into work to pay off the debt. The low pay often doesn't cover the debt -- turning them into indentured servants.

Victims don't report the crime because they're afraid of being arrested or deported.

Nationally, between 20,000 and 50,000 victims are trafficked into the United States each year to be exploited for use in factories, migrant farm work, construction, domestic work and prostitution, according to the FBI.

"This is a reprehensible problem," said Assistant Special Agent Robert Clifford. "We'd look at every weapon in FBI's arsenal to countering human trafficking."

In the Southeast, where nearly a quarter of the trafficking occurs, about 61 percent of victims are from Latin America. About 35 percent of the victims are forced to work on farms and 29 percent in prostitution.

The push is funded by $15 million in the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, signed by President Bush on Jan. 10. The law also provides assistance and immigration benefits to trafficking victims, including issuing special visas, so victims can remain in the country legally without the fear of being sent back home.

"We need to let people know it's OK to contact us," Kendrick said. "This is an affront against humanity. This goes far past someone's immigration status."

For More Information

DOJ_NMG_0012177

The FBI is asking those who may know anything about human trafficking operations to call their Charlotte office at (704) 377-9200.

El FBI Pide Su Ayuda

Si sabe algo sobre incidentes de tráfico humano, llame el FBI en Charlotte al (704) 377-9200.

Ga. Lawmakers Approve Requiring Voter ID (AP)

AP, January 25, 2006

ATLANTA - A birth certificate might not be enough to vote in Georgia this year - legislation sent to the governor Wednesday would require photo identification before voters could cast their ballots.

Gov. Sonny Perdue said he would sign it quickly to give counties time to prepare for the primary in July and the general election in November.

The U.S. Justice Department also must approve the requirement before it takes effect.

The legislation would require voters to have a driver's license, military ID or state-issued identification card with a photo. Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills would no longer be accepted.

Supporters said it would help fight voter fraud. Critics argued it would disenfranchise the poor, minorities or elderly - people who are less likely to have driver's licenses.

Similar legislation last year was blocked by a federal judge because a state ID fee would have amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax. This year's bill waives that fee.

Appellate Court Rules Against Shreveport In Race Discrimination Lawsuit (SHREVET)

By Francis McCabe

Shreveport (LA) Times, January 26, 2006

A federal appellate court changed its stance and ruled today in favor of plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the city of Shreveport and its Fire Department, overturning a lower court's decision to dismiss the five-year-old case.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the heart of the discrimination case back to U.S. District Court in Shreveport.

The petition originally was brought against the city in 2000 by Todd Dean, who was not hired by the Fire Department and felt the city's hiring practices discriminated against him because he is white. Dean earned a higher test score than some blacks hired then, his lawsuit alleges. Other men joined the lawsuit soon after.

The 5th Circuit's ruling should compel the city not only to cease race-based hiring procedures in all departments, but also to re-evaluate the continued validity of all city programs that incorporate race as a criteria for participation," said local attorney Pamela R. Jones, who represented Dean, Shawn Sanders and Jason Matthews in the lawsuit.

Fire Chief Kelvin Cochran said he was unaware of the decision and withheld comment until he reviews it and discusses it with the city attorney's office.

The department ended race-based hiring practices 11 months before a federal magistrate dismissed Dean's case in December 2004 hoping to avoid further lawsuits, according to officials. Now the department relies on a pass/fail civil service exam, the educational background and technical training of each candidate and psychological and physical ability exams.

The city has maintained that the Fire Department's hiring practices are based on a complaint brought by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 that said the department had discriminated against blacks and women. Up to that point, the department had hired only three black men in its history, according to court records.

Then the 5th Circuit ruled that the department had to fill "at least 50 percent of all vacancies with qualified black applicants." And the department must hire qualified women for at least 15 percent of all vacancies. The department was ordered to divide job candidates into two categories, white and black. The most qualified candidates from each category received job offers — even if the most qualified candidates were all in one category — so that jobs were equally distributed to both whites and blacks.

A consent decree was agreed to with a long-term goal of the department staff reflecting the available work force of the city.

In its ruling Wednesday, the appellate court noted its change in view of the decree: "We reviewed the decree at that time under a rational basis standard of review. This standard of review no longer applies, and we now strictly scrutinize all race-conscious remedies to ensure they are narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. Thus, as we re-evaluate the decree under strict scrutiny, we are not bound by our prior approval of it under the rational basis standard."

SIU Tweaks Web Descriptions Of Fellowships Government Questioned (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012178

CARBONDALE, Ill. - While threatened with a federal lawsuit over three graduate fellowships the government considers discriminatory, Southern Illinois University has tweaked the descriptions of at least two of those scholarship programs on its Web site.

The fellowships at issue were said to specifically target minorities or "underrepresented groups," before the Justice Department objected last year, but the site now says those programs seek to help "underserved" populations.

The revisions come as SIU administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off a lawsuit threatened by the government, which in demanding that SIU discontinue the fellowship programs has accused the university of engaging in "intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males."

The university has refused to publicly discuss the proposal it got from the Justice Department last week, saying only that administrators and key constituency groups were being tapped this week for feedback before the university responds.

David Gross, a spokesman for the SIU system, said Wednesday the Web site changes were done without the consent of the university's president, the Carbondale school's chancellor or the system's legal counsel and "do not reflect the proposed offer from Department of Justice."

"We believe it was an assumption made from certain administrators," he said.

Gross said it remains unclear why the changes were made. But when asked if the unauthorized revisions would be pulled from the Web site, Gross said that "at this point, we are not sure about that."

Marvin Zeman, a math professor serving as the SIU Faculty Association's president, attended a private briefing Wednesday afternoon about the Justice Department proposal but declined to discuss it afterward, saying he'd been advised not to by administrators who led the meeting. Zeman said he was told that speaking publicly about the matter would violate "attorney-client privilege."

The university Web site's page titled "Underserved Fellowships" reads that applications for two of the fellowships - the Graduate Dean's and the Proactive Recruitment of Multicultural Professionals for Tomorrow, or PROMPT - "have been extensively revised and are now open to individuals whose personal or family background, life, cultural, and/or ethnic experiences could contribute to a more reflective responsive environment in the program, the institution, and the larger academic community."

That portion, on the page last updated Jan. 20, is highlighted by asterisks and notes that the application deadline has been extended to Feb. 17 "to allow interested students to apply under the new guidelines."

PROMPT, which provided tuition waivers and monthly stipends to 78 students since 2000, previously had stated its goal was to "increase the number of minorities receiving advanced degrees in disciplines in which they are underrepresented."

But the Web site now doesn't mention race and says the program seeks "to increase the number of individuals receiving advanced degrees ... from families which have traditionally not had access to the opportunities of higher education."

The Graduate Dean's Fellowship, used by 27 students since 2000, was formerly "for women and traditionally underrepresented students who have overcome social, cultural or economic conditions." The Web site now says that program is for "traditionally underserved individuals" who have overcome barriers to their education.

Pat McNeil, the head of the office that oversees the third program at issue, the National Science Foundation's Bridge to the Doctorate program, said that program was not accepting applications.

That program, which has helped 24 students since its start in 2004, offered a $30,000 stipend plus $10,500 for educational expenses "for underrepresented minority students" to study in fields including math and engineering.

ON THE NET

Southern Illinois University: http://www.siu.edu

Justice Department: http://usdoj.gov

EEOC Ordered To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For 'Frivolous' Legal Action (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

The U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission must pay more than $1 million to a law firm that it sued unsuccessfully for allegations of sexual harassment and pregnancy discrimination, a federal judge has ruled.

The EEOC action was a "frivolous" lawsuit against Robert L. Reeves & Associates, which practices immigration law, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian said in a ruling issued Monday.

Reeves maintained that the EEOC should have known the harassment and discrimination allegations the agency was pursuing were part of a scheme by two of his former law associates to destroy his firm, said a statement from lawyers representing Reeves.

DOJ_NMG_0012179

The EEOC has already appealed the judge's findings, said Anna Park, the EEOC regional attorney in charge of the Los Angeles district office's legal division.

"I think the judge's ruling is absolutely wrong," Park said.

The EEOC originally filed suit against Reeves & Associates in 2001.

Tevrizian dismissed the case the following year and ordered EEOC to pay Reeves $363,000 in legal fees. Before the EEOC sued Reeves, Tevrizian said, commission staffers only interviewed the two former Reeves associates and a third person who was romantically involved with one of them. One of the former associates, Tevrizian added, was also a decision maker in the firm's dismissal of an employee who complained she was fired after she became pregnant.

He accused the commission of "unreasonable and just plain mean-spirited" conduct.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed Tevrizian's first decision and returned the case to his court, resulting in Monday's ruling.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Offers Rivals Source Code (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 26, 2006

Microsoft made a concession in its six-year dispute with European competition regulators on Wednesday by offering to give rivals access to parts of its Windows source code.

With only three weeks until a compliance deadline set by Brussels, which had threatened fines of €2m ($2.5m) a day, Brad Smith, the group's general counsel, said: "We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table."

However, while the software giant said the move went beyond the Commission's requirements, rivals were quick to say it fell far short of the demands on Microsoft. The Commission refused to say whether the offer was good enough.

Microsoft's offer, which it hopes will remove the threat of fresh financial penalties, came in response to a European Commission warning last month that it would impose fines unless the software group complied quickly with Brussels' 2004 antitrust ruling against the US group. The daily fines would come on top of the record €497m payment the Commission ordered in 2004.

The regulator said Microsoft had failed to comply with a part of the ruling requiring the software group to share information about its Windows operating system. That information, the Commission argues, is essential for rivals wanting to develop software that works with Windows-driven computers and servers.

Microsoft argues that in giving away a part of its source code – the basic programming instructions that form the core of the operating system – it has gone beyond the Commission's demand. But rivals say that instead it has dumped a vast amount of data on companies without the "road map" that tells them how to use it. The regulator did not, however, order Microsoft to release parts of the Windows source code.

In an attempt to end months of wrangling over the extent of the information required by the decision, Microsoft said it would license the relevant parts of the Windows source code.

Mr Smith said: "We have come to the conclusion that the only way to be certain of satisfying the Commission's demands is to go beyond the 2004 decision and offer a licence to the source code of the Windows server operating system."

Microsoft's rivals dismissed the group's offer. Thomas Vinje, a partner at Clifford Chance, who represents several Microsoft rivals, said the move was a "PR ploy". He added: "Microsoft is offering to dump a huge load of source code on companies that have not asked for source code and cannot use it. Without a roadmap that says how to use the code, a software engineer will not be able to design interoperable products."

Mr Smith had pointed out that the group had drawn up 12,000 pages of interoperability information for potential licensees, and had offered free advice on how to use the technical specifications contained on those pages.

Microsoft To Make More Code Available Move Made To Comply With EU Antitrust Sanctions (USAT)

By Byron Acohido

USA Today, January 26, 2006

SEATTLE —- Microsoft said Wednesday that it will make more of its proprietary computer code available to rivals in an effort to comply with European antitrust sanctions.

The computer code, which normally can be viewed only by Microsoft employees and partners, is central to its Windows computer operating system.

DOJ_NMG_0012180

The European Commission issued a terse statement saying it would “study carefully” Microsoft's announcement “once it has received the full details.” The software giant is locked in a dispute about penalties that the Commission, the European Union's administrative arm, levied in March 2004.

Microsoft already has paid a record $613 million fine. And it has supplied Europe with a version of Windows for desktop PCs with Windows Media Player removed. But it has failed to make it easier for other software suppliers to write business applications that run smoothly on Windows server software.

Last October, Microsoft offered to share 12,000 pages of technical documents with other software companies, as long as they paid a licensing fee. The documents would make it easier for them to write programs that work well with Windows.

But an independent monitor found the package to be “totally unfit.” The Commission in late December said it would fine the company $2.4 million a day if it failed to comply by Jan. 25, later extending the deadline to Feb. 15.

Meanwhile, Microsoft has said it expects to reverse the Commission's overall ruling in an appeal before Europe's Court of First Instance; hearings are to begin in Luxembourg in April.

“It looks a bit like Microsoft stalling for time, as it readies for the bigger battle,” said James Governor, London-based tech analyst for consulting firm RedMonk.

Microsoft on Wednesday sweetened the licensing plan by adding computer code to the package. “Today, we are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table so we can put technical compliance issues to rest,” Microsoft's general counsel Brad Smith said at a press conference in Brussels.

This is not the first time Microsoft has let outsiders view such code. It has granted governments, academics and business partners varying levels of access under tight restrictions.

“That statement suggests that the whole enchilada is on the table,” said tech industry analyst Paul DeGroot, who tracks the company's licensing programs for research firm Directions on Microsoft. “But that's simply impossible. It would mark a huge and strange departure for Microsoft, far beyond anything required.”

Microsoft Offers Blueprint License To Avert Fines (REU)

By David Lawsky and Sabina Zawadzki

Reuters, January 25, 2006

BRUSSELS (Reuters) - Microsoft Corp. will license some of its secret software blueprints in an effort to avert fines of up to 2 million euros ($2.5 million) a day for failing to comply with European antitrust penalties, the U.S. company said on Wednesday.

"We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table, so we can put technical compliance issues to rest and move forward with a serious discussion about the substance of this case," Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith said.

The European Commission said in a response three hours later that it would "study carefully the announcement" by Microsoft.

Microsoft's offer to license a small amount of its source code, relating to server software that helps manage tasks like printing within a group of desktop machines, would help proprietary software makers but not the so-called open source community.

Smith said he was telling a news conference, rather than the Commission, about the plan because "it now is a public issue" as the EU executive had revealed publicly its intention to impose the fines.

But a lawyer who represents opponents of Microsoft dismissed Smith's comments as "purely a PR ploy" and said large amounts of source code would be entirely useless, even with 500 free hours of support promised by Microsoft.

"They would dump millions of lines of code and finding what competitors need to interoperate would be like looking for a needle in a haystack. Even the most sophisticated software engineers would be lost," said Thomas Vinje.

The Commission decided in March 2004 that Microsoft had violated European Union antitrust laws by exploiting its dominant position to compete unfairly against other companies, and fined it 497 million euros.

Microsoft appealed against that decision to the Court of First Instance (CFI) in Luxembourg. Earlier in the day, the court announced a hearing on the full case would be heard before a 13-judge panel on April 24-28.

As part of the Commission's decision, Microsoft was also supposed to offer rivals so-called protocols, or rules of the road, that would enable rival makers of server software to work as well with Microsoft's Windows operating system as Microsoft server software does.

But a Microsoft-nominated trustee said that documentation to help rivals use its protocols was "fundamentally flawed". Earlier this week, the U.S. Justice Department made similar complaints about Microsoft software being licensed there.

SOURCE CODE

Smith was critical of the European trustee's comments, but said that in any event the company's offer would resolve all questions.

DOJ_NMG_0012181

"The Windows source code is the ultimate documentation of Windows server technologies," Smith said. "With this step our goal is to resolve all questions about the sufficiency of our technical documentation."

Microsoft shares were up 0.2 percent at $26.45 by 1732 GMT.

Smith said all source code related to protocols in the Commission remedy would be made available, but only for inspection. It may not be used by licensees.

He said Microsoft would charge no extra money for the code beyond what it was already planning to charge for the protocol licenses.

At this point, however, the price Microsoft wants others to pay for licensing is itself an issue before the EU executive.

Critics of Microsoft contend that protocols are standard software and that Microsoft has used what is essentially a digital combination lock to make them inaccessible.

A Commission spokesman said if that turns out to be true then Microsoft has no right to charge for them.

However, Microsoft says that the protocols include valuable patents and that it should be able to charge for their use, an argument under review at the Commission.

The price that Microsoft charges for licensing and the clarity of its protocols documentation are the two issues which could lead to the daily fine of up to 2 million euros.

A lawyer for some "open source" software developers, who reveal their source code openly, said the offer was of no interest to his clients.

Carlo Piana, who is the lawyer for the Free Software Foundation Europe and Microsoft competitor Samba, said the licensing would be useful for non-open source developers.

"This demonstrates that Microsoft doesn't fear very much competition from proprietary developers but rather from free software developers," he said.

Microsoft To License Windows Source Code In EU (AP)

AP, January 25, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium – Microsoft Corp. said today it will license part of its Windows source code, in what it called a voluntary step going beyond a European Union antitrust ruling.

The source code provides the building blocks of the operating system that competitors need to make products compatible with Windows.

The company's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said sharing the part of the Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code that helps rival PCs communicate with Windows servers was "a bold stroke" that should answer both EU and U.S. regulators' concerns.

"The source code is the ultimate documentation," he said. "It should have the answer to any questions that remain."

He insisted that Microsoft had already complied in December with an EU order to supply technical information by handing over up to 12,000 pages of documentation and offering 500 hours of free technical support to rivals worth some $100,000.

An independent monitor nominated by Microsoft found last month that the documents were "totally unfit for its intended purpose."

Microsoft has refused to license the source code in the past. Software developers licensed under a European Commission program will still have to pay for the code, which open source advocates will not be allowed to "publish for free," Smith cautioned. The company had "just started to provide this information on both sides on the Atlantic" and regulators "want to see all the details," Smith added.

The company only plans to make available the source code that implements the communications server protocols. Smith said there were no plans to publish the entire Windows source code.

Governments and some customers are already allowed to look at the code, but this is the first time it has been available to rivals.

In March 2004, the EU executive levied a record $613 million fine against Microsoft, ordered it to share code with rivals and offer an unbundled version of Windows without the Media Player software for what the court saw as an abuse of the company's dominant position in the industry.

Last month, the European Commission threatened to fine Microsoft up to $2.36 million a day backdated to Dec. 15 for failing to obey, saying the software giant was being intransigent about sharing data with competitors.

today's move is designed "to put that issue to rest," Smith said.

Microsoft has launched a legal challenge scheduled to be heard by the European Court of First Instance on April 24-28.

Smith told a news conference he was confident of winning the case, saying the world had moved on since the EU opened its antitrust investigation eight years ago.

"If anything, it is clear that there are more opportunities for competitors today than there were a few years ago," he said.

"This case is going to establish the law that will determine how companies that have popular technology products can integrate new features into them."

Earlier, the EU had repeated its complaints that Microsoft was not complying with its demands.

"Microsoft is not disclosing complete and accurate interface information to allow non-Microsoft workgroup servers to receive full interoperability with Windows PCs and servers," said EU spokesman Jonathan Todd.

He said EU regulators took note that the U.S. Department of Justice was also claiming that Microsoft was failing to provide the technical information asked for in a Justice Department settlement.

In December, Microsoft said the EU Commission was trying to undermine its Windows operating system with more demands for technological transparency, and that it would contest the measure under EU law.

Todd said this was untrue. "We are not moving the goal posts as has been suggested," he said. "We are not changing our demands."

Todd stressed that the final word on whether Microsoft is meeting the terms of the EU antitrust order "rests in the first place with the Commission and not Microsoft."

Microsoft Bares Code To Avoid Fines (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Microsoft Corp. offered to allow rivals some access to the proprietary source code of its Windows operating system, a move designed to head off large daily fines in Europe and mollify increasingly impatient antitrust authorities in the U.S.

The offer to partly unveil the map of Windows was a shrewd step for Microsoft, analysts said. It may deflect criticism that Microsoft is defying legal orders to share programming information with rivals and government investigators. It also could thwart the ambitions of software developers who advocate free or "open source" access -- a threat to Microsoft's fee-based software business.

Microsoft was castigated yesterday by rival camps as trying to fake out regulators, with one calling the offer "a poisoned honey pot" that couldn't be used without risking legal jeopardy.

To answer European demands, Microsoft would allow competitors to review computer code that handles how two large "server" computers trade data. Microsoft is under orders in Europe to license so-called communications protocols that allow other software to mesh better with Microsoft's systems, and faces the threat of a €2 million ($2.5 million) daily fine if regulators aren't satisfied with its efforts. Microsoft currently provides some documentation about the protocols; handing over the source code -- the programming instructions used to make the software -- reveals more information about how the operating system works.

Microsoft general counsel Brad Smith yesterday called the code the "DNA" of Windows. In a Brussels news conference, Mr. Smith called the offer a "bold stroke" that would leave little doubt that Microsoft was cooperating with orders to open up software markets. The license would be restrictive, however, only allowing competitors to view and search through the code, not copy it, and only over a protected Web site.

The move came after the Justice Department complained in a court filing this week about Microsoft's compliance with U.S. legal requirements -- and six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Antitrust Act against monopoly abuse. The Justice Department said the Redmond, Wash., software giant had provided inaccurate information to a technical committee, and described one incident as "particularly troubling" because it delayed an investigative team that had traveled to India. The filing also said the company had "fallen significantly behind" in complying with monitors' technical requests.

In Europe, the eight-year-old Microsoft case heated up in December when European Union regulators announced they were formally charging the company with evading a March 2004 order to share certain programming information with competitors. Regulators cited a report from a consultant, British computer scientist Neil Barrett, who said trying to make use of the Microsoft's programming information was "an absolutely frustrating, time-consuming and ultimately fruitless task."

The European Commission, the EU's regulatory arm, said in a statement that it would "study carefully" Mr. Smith's announcement. The statement reiterated that Microsoft has until Feb. 15 to answer the commission's formal complaint of intransigence. The Justice Department said only that it was discussing the source-code proposal with Microsoft.

A major objective in the European antitrust case is to open up Microsoft-dominated software markets to competition from so-called open-source developers. Because open-source software can be copied and modified and can run on the free Linux operating system, it is attractive to large companies and poses an increasing threat to Microsoft.

Open-source developers condemned Microsoft's offer to share source code as a feint. They fear that having any kind of access to the source code will make them vulnerable to later allegations from Microsoft of theft of patented intellectual property, if they write software that happens to mimic Microsoft's code.

DOJ_NMG_0012183

"We will never look at Microsoft source code, never," said Volker Lendecke, a programmer for the free Samba network software. "They will sue us in an instant." Added Georg Greve, president of the Free Software Foundation Europe, a party to the European antitrust suit: "We never wanted their source code in the first place. It's putting out a poisoned honey pot."

In the U.S. case, the source code at issue is for Microsoft's Windows operating system for desktop computers. In Europe, the source code Microsoft is offering to license is for operating systems on the large computers that served as hubs for offices.

In 2001, the Bush administration dropped the U.S. government's case against Microsoft, but ordered it to change certain anticompetitive practices. In Europe, Microsoft paid a €497 million fine in 2004 but has appealed the EU's antitrust allegations to the Luxembourg-based Court of First Instance. The court announced yesterday that it will hold hearings in the case from April 24 to 28. A verdict will come about six months later, a court official said.

Guidant Can't Refuse Boston Scientific's Offer (USAT)

By Edward Iwata, Usa Today

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Medical device maker Guidant (GDT) on Wednesday accepted Boston Scientific's $27 billion bid, rebuffing a lower offer from Johnson & Johnson (JNJ) and ending a long-running takeover war.

The companies have been vying for an edge in the growing multibillion-dollar market for medical and heart devices, and Guidant's pacemakers, defibrillators and stents made it an attractive acquisition target.

The merger, to be completed early this year, will make Boston Scientific (BSX) the world's No. 2 maker of implantable pacemakers and defibrillators. Boston Scientific also will gain share in the market for heart stent devices, which hold open blood vessels.

Guidant CEO Jim Cornelius said: "We believe the transaction and the strategic rationale for this combination are in the best interests of our patients, employees, customers and shareholders — reflecting the full value of our firm."

Most Wall Street analysts and some Guidant investors had urged Guidant to take the pricier Boston Scientific offer, calling it a better long-term investment than J&J's deal. The combined company will have $9 billion in revenue in 2006, Boston Scientific says.

"I think Boston will do a good job," analyst Bruce Nudell of Sanford Bernstein told Bloomberg News. "They have the cash flow to pay off the debt. The revenue base is diversified and strengthened. It's a better investment vehicle with Guidant than without it."

Boston Scientific will buy all Guidant shares at $80 each — $42 in cash and $38 in stock. Guidant shareholders will own 36% of the company. Boston Scientific also will cover a $705 million merger breakup fee that Guidant owes J&J.

To help close the deal and appease antitrust regulators, Boston Scientific teamed with Abbott Laboratories. Abbott will pay Boston Scientific $6.4 billion in cash to buy Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses.

Approvals are needed from U.S. and European regulators, plus shareholders for both companies.

Johnson & Johnson had offered $25 billion for Guidant in December 2004, but lowered its offer to $21 billion because of Guidant's legal and regulatory problems with recalled products and lawsuits.

In December, Boston Scientific set off a takeover battle when it offered $25 billion. After another round of bidding, Boston Scientific triumphed Wednesday.

Johnson & Johnson, which had $50 billion in revenue in 2005, could look for other acquisitions.

John Putnam, an analyst at Stanford Group, told the Associated Press on Wednesday that a higher bid by J&J would have hurt the conglomerate in future acquisitions, signaling that J&J "didn't have the financial discipline they've always been known for."

"We are excited about combining the talent and experience of Boston Scientific and Guidant employees," said Jim Tobin, Boston Scientific's president and CEO. "We look forward to working with Guidant to complete the transaction quickly and to creating a global leader in cardiovascular devices."

In filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission this month, Boston Scientific said Guidant's pacemakers and defibrillators could account for nearly one-quarter of pro forma sales. The heart device market is expected to grow by nearly 25% by 2008.

That growth will likely offset any of Guidant's legal liability — estimated to be as high as $2 billion — that Boston Scientific may have to absorb. Guidant has been plagued by lawsuits and regulatory investigations following multiple recalls and safety advisories. At least seven deaths have been linked to faulty devices.

Contributing: Reuters

Copyright 2006 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

Quiet End To Battle Of The Bids (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

For Johnson & Johnson, Tuesday started with a morning conference call with analysts to discuss earnings and ended with William C. Weldon, the company's chief executive, and Robert J. Darretta Jr., the chief financial officer, attending a dinner for several dozen institutional investors at the "21" Club in New York. Throughout the day and evening, the company maintained a rigid silence about the one subject on everyone's mind — whether it would respond to a midnight deadline to counter Boston Scientific's bold $27 billion offer for Guidant.

"They wanted to talk about anything but Guidant," said one investor who attended the dinner. "It was the elephant in the room."

Only yesterday morning did Johnson & Johnson address the elephant, in a terse news release saying the company had "determined not to increase its last offer for Guidant Corporation, because to do so would not have been in the best interest of its shareholders." About the only comment was its reminder that Guidant was obliged to pay it a $705 million breakup fee by today.

It was a remarkably quiet conclusion to the biggest and most contentious takeover battle yet in the medical device industry. The outcome leaves Boston Scientific as the apparent winner of Guidant, the No. 2 company in the $10 billion market for defibrillators and other implantable devices that regulate human heartbeats.

Those two companies announced their deal yesterday, pending the approval of shareholders and regulators. People close to the takeover negotiations say it had become evident at least 24 hours before the midnight deadline that a counteroffer was unlikely because Johnson & Johnson's advisers had stopped communicating with the Guidant team.

But in many ways, Johnson & Johnson had been forced into silence much earlier — by choices it made last fall, when it assumed it had the upper hand in its merger dealings with Guidant and reduced its offer by nearly $4 billion.

It was a short time later that Boston Scientific mounted its surprise takeover effort and emerged as the company willing to risk the most to acquire Guidant. By last week, having decided not to raise its own bid of $71 a share, Johnson & Johnson was reduced to behind-the-scenes attacks on the rationality of Boston Scientific's $80-a-share offer. It apparently hoped that Boston Scientific's stock would decline so far that Guidant shareholders would begin to doubt the deal's value.

Johnson & Johnson was not talking yesterday, but some analysts say the company's tough bargaining last fall resulted not only in the company's losing Guidant, but a certain amount of corporate luster as well.

"Their reputation had been as a savvy acquirer and a fair acquirer, and I think those two elements have been diminished in this," said Jan David Wald, a health care analyst at A. G. Edwards & Sons. Johnson & Johnson's declining drug sales in the United States make further expansion into medical devices a necessity, Mr. Wald said, but the Guidant stumble could hinder its ability to pursue future deals.

There are risks for Boston Scientific in coming out on top of this fight, not the least of which is the possibility that it is paying too much for Guidant to ever recoup its investment. And Johnson & Johnson could try to slow down Boston Scientific's efforts to close the Guidant deal by pressing antitrust objections at the Federal Trade Commission.

Such delays might send Boston Scientific's stock below $22.62, the price at which the value of the stock portion of the deal would begin shrinking, and induce Guidant investors to vote against the merger. Boston Scientific's shares are down nearly 14 percent since it announced its first bid in December, including a decline of 2 percent yesterday, to $23.54.

But Johnson & Johnson has lost its biggest advantage — the fact that its merger deal had been fully reviewed by regulators and could have been completed immediately after a Guidant shareholders' vote that had been scheduled for Jan. 31. "The odds of them stopping this are not high," said Matthew Dodds, who follows the industry for Citigroup. "They are fully committed to walking."

Analysts say that may be best for all concerned. Johnson & Johnson could easily afford Guidant. And it desperately needs Guidant or some other large, fast-growing acquisition to mollify shareholders restive about the stagnation in its drug business. But Johnson & Johnson's shareholders have apparently shared management's concern about overpaying for Guidant. Johnson & Johnson's shares fell every time it raised its bid for Guidant.

Analysts have published a blizzard of speculation about whether Johnson & Johnson will now turn its attention to smaller device companies — like St. Jude Medical, the third-ranked producer of heart-regulating implants, or Conor Medsystems, the developer of a promising new stent design for propping open heart arteries.

But some also note that the company could just as easily look for growth outside devices by purchasing drug or biotech companies.

DOJ_NMG_0012185

"J.& J. has the financial strength to move on and the cash to acquire elsewhere to further its growth prospects," said Kenneth R. Weakley, who follows the industry for UBS, the brokerage house that sponsored Tuesday evening's dinner at the "21" Club. Mr. Weakley called the failure to close the deal with Guidant a "heartache, not a heart attack" for the company.

Johnson & Johnson's stock has fallen 4.4 percent since Boston Scientific first entered the bidding war, including a decline yesterday of 86 cents, to $58.50.

Boston Scientific clearly faces stiffer challenges. While Guidant will immediately transform it into a company with more than $9 billion in annual revenues and a shot at double-digit revenue growth for years to come, the cost of the transaction will eat into earnings for at least five years, according to most analysts' estimates.

In the near term, analysts will be closely watching whether Boston Scientific can keep to its ambitious timetable for completing regulatory reviews and close the deal by the end of this quarter. Under the terms of the agreement, it must pay interest to Guidant shareholders at a 6 percent annual rate for every day after March 31 that the closing is delayed.

The terms of the deal put extreme pressure on Boston Scientific to maintain the market share and profit margins of its blockbuster drug-coated stent, Taxus, which doctors use to keep patients' coronary arteries propped open after blockages are cleared. Boston Scientific will also need to meet targets for introducing important new products, like a disposable line of endoscopes, used to diagnose gastrointestinal problems, that is scheduled to be released later this year.

Taxus is the market leader in the $6 billion market in countries where it competes with Cypher, Johnson & Johnson's drug-coated stent, but that lead has eroded. In addition, Medtronic recently entered the drug-coated stent market in Europe, and Guidant received word Tuesday that Europe is about to approve its Xience stent.

The one clear winner in the deal, analysts said, is Abbott Laboratories, which injected up to $6.2 billion into Boston Scientific's offer through a variety of side deals, stock sales and below-market-rate loans to that company. The payoff is that Abbott would receive virtually all of Guidant's business except for its heart-regulating implants. On news of the deal and a forecast of strong drug sales during Abbott's fourth-quarter earnings announcement, the company's stock was up more than 5 percent yesterday.

The Guidant portfolio of products to treat damage to the circulatory system from diseases like diabetes generates more than $1 billion annually in sales. It would transform Abbott into a major player in outpatient clinics and hospital laboratories that deliver therapy through catheters as an alternative to more invasive surgical treatments. Analysts say its share of the Guidant deal could begin contributing to Abbott's earnings next year.

That outcome represents a huge improvement from the gains Abbott could have expected if Johnson & Johnson had acquired Guidant. Under that deal, Abbott was to receive access to a valuable stent implant system and rights to certain stent-coating drugs. Johnson & Johnson had worked out that arrangement to satisfy antitrust objections. But those were mere hors d'oeuvres for Abbott, while Boston Scientific offered a seven-course meal.

Judge Sets Court Hearing On BlackBerry Injunction (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. and NTP Inc. will appear in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia Feb. 24 for the court to consider a shutdown of U.S. sales and service of the popular wireless email device.

In recent court filings, RIM, based in Waterloo, Ontario, argued a BlackBerry shutdown isn't warranted for various reasons, including recent preliminary moves by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to reject NTP's wireless email patents.

NTP, a Virginia patent holding concern, argues a BlackBerry shutdown is appropriate, since the court has already found RIM infringed on NTP's patents and case law calls for such a shutdown. The court could rule on the injunction as early as Feb. 24 or in the days following, an NTP lawyer said.

RIM could appeal a shutdown, lawyers following the case have said, though it isn't clear that would delay a court-ordered shutdown.

The U.S. Supreme Court this week declined a RIM appeal of the case.

Change From Within At Disney (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

A couple of years ago, nothing seemed less likely than the sale of Pixar to the Walt Disney Company. At the time, it looked as if the two companies wouldn't even be able to agree on the terms of their distribution deal, which gave Disney, then run by Michael Eisner, an unfair stake in Pixar's films, according to Pixar's chief executive, Steven Jobs. Now Mr. Eisner is gone, and on Tuesday Disney's board approved an offer of $7.4 billion, about $59 a share, to acquire Pixar, whose major shareholder is Mr. Jobs. The deal now goes to the Pixar board.

DOJ_NMG_0012186

A company like that — and a figure like Mr. Jobs, notable for his dynamic role at both Apple and Pixar — doesn't let itself be bought for money alone, though the money is certainly enticing enough. This is really an opportunity to infect, and change, the creative culture of Disney, which, back in its founder's day, used to be one of the most creative places around.

Steven Jobs will take a seat on Disney's board, and John Lasseter, who is the chief creative officer at Pixar and a former Disney animator, will probably take over as head of animation at Disney. Disney's animated films have been nothing to shout about in the past decade or so, while Pixar, driven by extraordinary shifts in computer technology, has produced one imaginative and highly profitable hit after another.

On the surface, this looks like the joining of two companies whose shared mission is to produce cultural content. But Mr. Jobs's other company — Apple — has helped create, with its video iPods, a revolution in the way cultural content is distributed. For Pixar and Apple, there is only an upside in this deal. The same is true for Disney, especially if it keeps shedding the ways of Mr. Eisner's old company and allows itself to become what may turn out to be, in the end, Mr. Jobs's company after all.

ENVIRONMENT:

US Grand Jury Indicts Three For 'eco-terrorism' (REU)

By Michael Fitzgerald

Reuters, January 25, 2006

SACRAMENTO, California (Reuters) - A federal grand jury indicted three alleged "eco-terrorists" on Wednesday on charges of plotting to blow up facilities like dams and cell phone towers.

"These three individuals planned to commit a number of dangerous and destructive acts in our region, all in the name of the Environmental Liberation Front," U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott told a news conference in the California state capital.

The grand jury indicted Eric McDavid, 28, of Foresthill, California, Zachary Jenson, 20, of Washington state, and Lauren Weiner, 20, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The trio was arrested January 13 outside a retail store in Auburn, California, following six months of surveillance of McDavid by federal authorities.

According to Scott, McDavid attended two meetings of anarchist groups, one in July in Indiana and a second in August in Philadelphia, at which he announced intentions to construct explosive devices from common household items.

He also said he planned to blow up several northern California facilities and expressed a desire to kill a police officer, Scott said.

Officials said one of the bombing targets was the U.S. Forest Service Institute of Forest Genetics in Placerville, California. Other potential targets include the Nimbus Dam and Fish Hatchery, east of Sacramento, cell phone towers and electric power stations.

The charges were not related to a separate 65-count indictment handed down on Monday in Washington involving 11 environmental and animal rights activists in the Western United States.

Scott that McDavid recruited the other two defendants and conspired with them to construct homemade bombs and scout potential target locations. He said the trio rented a house east of Sacramento in the foothills where they engaged in bomb-making.

At some point, the three were joined by an unnamed woman who was a government informant.

"Because of the exceptional work of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and the brave efforts of a confidential source they were prevented from carrying out their planned attacks," the U.S. Attorney said.

"They were acquiring very significant materials. ... We thought it better to shut it down. We were satisfied we had enough evidence to bring a criminal prosecution," Scott said.

The three defendants, now in Sacramento County jail, face maximum sentences of 20 years in federal prison.

EPA Moves To Ban Cookware Chemicals (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, January 26, 2006

In a surprise turn Wednesday, the Environmental Protection Agency moved to eliminate the production of a suspected carcinogen used in the making of Teflon and other non-stick and non-stain coatings.

The EPA has asked eight manufacturers that use a family of chemicals known as perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, to reduce production 95% by 2010 and to stop using it altogether by 2015.

DOJ_NMG_0012187

PFOA, which is found in the blood of more than 95% of Americans, has been tied to cancer and developmental damage in animal studies. It is used in the process that makes water-, stain- and grease-resistant products, everything from microwave popcorn bags to pizza box liners, non-stick cookware to pillows, upholstery to carpets.

Environmentalists and consumer groups have long dogged the agency to act.

“The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do for our environment and our health,” says Susan Hazen of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances.

“This program will call on industry to essentially eliminate PFOA release and its presence in products over the next decade.”

EPA officials are calling for voluntary PFOA cutbacks because “under the Toxic Substances Control Act, they don't have authority to ban it,” says Richard Wiles of the Environmental Working Group, a public interest group that has long fought to bring public attention to PFOA in the environment.

If the EPA is able to get the chemicals phased out, Wiles says, it will be “the single biggest action the agency has ever taken.”

The DuPont Company announced Wednesday that it would comply with the EPA's voluntary guidelines. “DuPont has been aggressively reducing PFOA emissions to the environment,” DuPont vice president Susan Stalnecker says.

DuPont has been at the center of the controversy. The company agreed in December to pay $10.25 million in fines and $6.25 million for research and education to resolve federal charges that it hid information about the dangers posed by PFOA.

Less toxic alternatives are readily available, says Scott Mabury, a professor of environmental chemistry at the University of Toronto in Canada.

PFOA is characterized by a chain of eight carbon atoms. But a version of four carbon atoms works well and doesn't accumulate in bodies, Mabury says. “You won't find them in huge quantities in polar bears or human blood, like we do the eight-carbon version. There will be chemical pollution from it but you can't have toxicology if you don't have exposure. It is an appropriate chemical solution to a chemical problem.”

Harmful Teflon Chemical To Be Eliminated By 2015 (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Eight U.S. companies, including giant DuPont Co., agreed yesterday to virtually eliminate a harmful chemical used to make Teflon from all consumer products coated with the ubiquitous nonstick material.

Although the chemical would still be used to manufacture Teflon and similar products, processes will be developed to ensure that perfluorooctanoic acid (PFOA) would not be released into the environment from finished products or manufacturing plants.

PFOA -- a key processing agent in making nonstick and stain-resistant materials -- has been linked to cancer and birth defects in animals and is in the blood of 95 percent of Americans, including pregnant women. It has also been found in the blood of marine organisms and Arctic polar bears.

The voluntary pact, which was crafted by the Environmental Protection Agency, will force companies to reduce manufacturing emissions of PFOA by 95 percent by no later than 2010. They will also have to reduce trace amounts of the compound in consumer products by 95 percent during the same period and virtually eliminate them by 2015.

The agreement will dramatically reduce the extent to which PFOA shows up in a wide variety of everyday products, including pizza boxes, nonstick pans and microwave-popcorn bags.

While not as sweeping as the federal ban on DDT in 1972, yesterday's agreement is expected to have profound implications for public health and the environment. An independent federal scientific advisory board is expected to recommend soon whether the government should classify the chemical as a "likely" or "probable" carcinogen in humans, which could trigger a new set of federal regulations.

"The science is still coming in on PFOA, but the concern is there," said Susan B. Hazen, acting assistant administrator of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances. "This is the right thing to do for our health and our environment."

The move, which came just a month after DuPont reached a $16.5 million settlement with EPA over the company's failure to report possible health risks associated with PFOA, drew applause from environmental groups that have frequently criticized both the administration and DuPont.

"This is one of those days when the Environmental Protection Agency is at its best. With its announcement today, the EPA is challenging an entire industry to err on the side of precaution and public safety, and invent new ways of doing business," said Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, an advocacy organization. "As harshly as we have singled out

DOJ_NMG_0012188

DuPont for criticism for its past handling of PFOA pollution, today we want to single out and commend the company and acknowledge its leadership going forward."

DuPont officials said they were confident they could alter manufacturing methods over the coming decade to contain PFOA exposure from products that generated $1 billion in sales for the company in 2004.

"It's important to do this because this is a persistent material in the environment, and it's at low levels in people's blood," said David Boothe, DuPont's global business director. To remove PFOA, he said, the company will subject some of its products to extra heat and will sometimes add a step in the manufacturing process. "We're going to push it really hard and take it as far as we can."

Scientific studies have not established a link between using products containing trace amounts of PFOA, such as microwave-popcorn bags or nonstick pans, and elevated cancer levels. Hazen said yesterday's announcement should "not indicate any concern . . . for consumers using household products" with such coatings.

Several other companies agreed yesterday to reduce public exposure to the chemical, including 3M Co., Ciba and Clariant Corp. But DuPont, which settled a class-action suit last year accusing it of contaminating drinking water in Ohio and West Virginia communities near its plant in Parkersburg, W.Va., has attracted the most public scrutiny over its PFOA use.

William Bailey III, who was born in 1981 with multiple birth defects while his mother, Sue, was working with the chemical at the Parkersburg plant, said he will "be watching" to see if the chemical giant complies with the new agreement.

"They're trying to save face," said Bailey, who is suing DuPont over his birth defects.

E.P.A. Seeks To Phase Out A Toxic Chemical (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The Environmental Protection Agency has asked DuPont and seven other chemical companies to stop using a toxic substance in the making of everyday products, including Teflon-coated pans, that has been linked in some studies to cancer, strokes and other health problems.

Announcing the voluntary program, officials of the agency said Wednesday that full compliance by the companies and their overseas affiliates would lead to a 95 percent reduction by 2010 in use of the substance, perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, and to their total elimination by 2015.

DuPont immediately pledged to join the program, saying it had already reduced its PFOA manufacturing emissions by 94 percent and had developed new technologies that could reduce PFOA content in products by more than 97 percent. The other companies are expected to commit to the program as well. They are 3M/Dyneon, Arkema, Asahi, Ciba, Clariant, Daikin and Solvay Solexis.

PFOA makes high-performance plastics resistant to fire, grease and stains. Its presence may be best known in Teflon, made by DuPont, but it is also found in fabrics, leather, automobile parts, wire insulation and microwave popcorn bags.

Uncertainties still surround the way PFOA exposure affects humans, and as part of the new program, the companies will provide test data so that those questions can be explored.

"The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do," said Susan B. Hazen, acting assistant administrator of the agency's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances.

Bush Seeks To Jump-Start Nuclear Power (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration plans to announce a $250 million initiative to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, a first step toward reversing a 1970s policy that rejected reprocessing as too dangerous to pursue.

The administration's decision to put the money into its fiscal 2007 budget to test new technologies is part of an effort to jump-start the nuclear-power industry at a time when energy prices are high and concerns about global warming make nuclear power plants more acceptable.

According to nuclear industry officials and others briefed on the proposal in recent weeks, the program could be announced as early as next week in President Bush's State of the Union address. If the technology works, it could vastly reduce the amount of spent nuclear waste that would have to be buried in underground storage, such as at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, set to open after 2012.

The initiative will also explore using one or more temporary, above-ground nuclear-waste storage sites to relieve the logjam that has left thousands of tons of nuclear waste stored around reactors, many located near big cities. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Department of Energy experts have worried about the damage that could be caused by a terrorist attack on the spent fuel.

DOJ_NMG_0012189

The heart of the initiative is reprocessing technology called UREX+ being developed by Argonne National Laboratory in Illinois. It is a method of removing plutonium and other long-lived radioactive elements in spent nuclear fuel that makes the elements reusable in nuclear power plants, but difficult to use for making nuclear weapons.

The process, according to its scientific backers, would also save the bulk of other elements in spent nuclear fuel, primarily uranium, to be reused or disposed of in facilities that don't require thousands of years of storage, such as the plant being prepared at Yucca Mountain. Phillip J. Finck, an Argonne official, told the House Science Committee last summer that UREX+ would reduce the nation's eventual need for more nuclear-waste storage by "a factor of more than 100."

The technology involves burning plutonium and other long-lived byproducts in special "fast" reactors. However, Dr. Finck added: "The practicality of these schemes is not yet established and requires additional scientific and engineering research."

The Bush proposal, tentatively called the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, would also give U.S. vendors, such as General Electric Co., opportunities to sell nuclear-power reactors and nuclear fuel to developing nations. It would promote the export of simpler, smaller and less-costly reactors and nuclear fuel on the condition that the U.S. would take back the spent fuel for reprocessing. While a safe way to reprocess nuclear waste also would remove a licensing hurdle to new nuclear plants in the U.S., building nuclear plants here will remain a costly and lengthy process.

The proposal is likely to renew a decades-old fight in Congress on U.S. nuclear-waste policy. "We're supportive of the concepts as a company and as an industry," said Christopher Crane, chief nuclear officer for Exelon Corp., which operates 17 nuclear reactors among the 103 running in the U.S. "We do agree that there is a good deal of unused energy in the fuel we have discharged from our reactors. We think it's positive that the U.S. Department of Energy and the administration want to look at ways to handle that."

Nuclear-industry officials said that without reprocessing, new nuclear plants called for by President Bush in his 2001 energy policy may not be licensed. Yucca Mountain will reach its storage limit -- 70,000 tons -- with waste produced by 2010 from existing plants.

The Department of Energy predicts that as many as eight more underground-storage sites may be needed by the end of the century if the current cycle for power plant fuel continues.

Thomas B. Cochran, a nuclear physicist at the Natural Resources Defense Council, which promoted the earlier policy to ban nuclear reprocessing along with other environmental and arms control groups, called the new reprocessing technology "uneconomical, unreliable, unsafe and unworkable." He predicted the utility industry wouldn't support its long-term costs, particularly the "fast" reactors that transform spent fuel by bombarding it with neutrons -- powerful, subatomic particles -- that can further reduce the radioactive waste content.

Ernest Muniz, a physicist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a former Clinton administration official at the Department of Energy, said he supports the renewed research and development of reprocessing, but predicts that it will require decades of research. Dr. Muniz said he also supports the idea of temporary above-ground waste-storage sites because it helps cool the heat-generating elements in the waste -- reducing a major complication for underground storage facilities.

Some of the changes the administration is proposing, particularly those that affect Yucca Mountain, will require action by Congress. A wild card in that debate is Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who has led his state's battle to stop the project, which is 90 miles from Las Vegas. He has regarded reprocessing as an alternative to long-term storage, but may have some interest in supporting a process that reduces the amount of spent fuel stored at Yucca Mountain.

The original reprocessing technique chopped up spent nuclear-fuel rods and dissolved them in acid, extracting plutonium in an almost pure form. It was derived in the 1950s from the U.S. nuclear-weapons program, which uses plutonium as the primary metal to make atomic warheads explode. Japan, Russia and France use variants of this process, called PUREX, for power-plant fuel recycling, but the U.S. stopped research on its use during the Carter administration.

President Carter, a former nuclear engineer, and other officials were persuaded that separating pure plutonium and encouraging recycling around the world might encourage developing nations to use the plutonium to make bombs. The UREX+ process is designed to reduce this problem by extracting plutonium along with other heavy and highly radioactive elements that make it too hot to handle without advanced robotics to remove and deal with the material.

Write to John J. Fialka at john.fialka@wsj.com1

Nuclear Energy Plan Would Use Spent Fuel (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012190

The Bush administration is preparing a plan to expand civilian nuclear energy at home and abroad while taking spent fuel from foreign countries and reprocessing it, in a break with decades of U.S. policy, according to U.S. and foreign officials briefed on the initiative.

The United States has adamantly opposed reprocessing spent fuel from civilian reactors since the 1970s because it would produce material that could be used in nuclear weapons. But the Bush program, envisioned as a multi-decade effort dubbed the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, would invest research money to develop technologies intended to avoid any such risk, the officials said.

The program has been the subject of intense debate within the administration, and although a consensus has been reached about the direction, a senior official said it will not be ready for Bush to announce in his State of the Union address Tuesday. Even the discussion has stirred concerns among nuclear specialists and some members of Congress who consider it an expensive venture that relies on unproven concepts and could increase the danger of proliferation.

The notion of accepting other countries' spent fuel at a time when the United States has had trouble disposing of its own nuclear waste could also prove highly controversial.

But a small initial investment of money has been programmed into the administration's federal budget plan to be sent to Capitol Hill in two weeks. Senate Energy Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said yesterday that he expects the White House to send accompanying legislation in February.

"I expect a draft bill from the administration next month on spent nuclear fuel," he said. "I will introduce that bill on behalf of the president, hold a hearing on it and mark it up in committee this spring. I hope it will include a nuclear fuel recycling component. If it doesn't, well, I have been a career-long proponent of nuclear fuel recycling and I intend to pursue it aggressively."

Advocates use the word "recycling" to describe an advanced form of reprocessing that, instead of separating plutonium that can be used in bombs from spent fuel, would produce a mixed-oxide fuel too radioactive for terrorists to handle. Such fuel, called MOX, could be used in special reactors that exist in France but not in the United States.

Edwin Lyman, a senior scientist with the Union of Concerned Scientists, a nonprofit think tank that studies environmental and security issues, said U.N. nuclear inspectors would not make a distinction between that material or the kind of separated plutonium the world is worried Iran might get.

"We think they are putting a fig leaf on it by calling it proliferation-resistant and saying that it's not really reprocessing, so concerns about proliferation risks won't be valid," he said. "But if we develop something that we call proliferation-resistant and it really isn't, then other countries are going to claim rights to this technology. If it's really proliferation-resistant, would we let Iran have it?"

The fuel proposal is part of a broader push by the president for domestic and global nuclear energy. With worldwide energy demands on the rise and U.S. reliance on foreign oil increasing, Bush has held out nuclear power as a solution that will not affect global warming. "We ought to have more nuclear power in the United States of America," Bush said in a speech last week in Loudoun County. "It's clean, it's renewable, it's safer than it ever was in the past."

In a modern version of the Atoms for Peace program during President Dwight D. Eisenhower's administration, officials said the administration envisions helping developing countries build small nuclear reactors that would produce about 5 to 10 percent of the energy generated by a typical reactor now on line in the United States. Some in Congress believe a global nuclear energy program is aimed at aiding the U.S. effort to build an alliance with India, which is eager for U.S. civilian nuclear technology.

Two senior U.S. officials traveled last week to several countries, including Japan and Russia, to brief them about the initiative. At one session, according to a source who was present, the administration officials said the United States has finally moved on from the Three Mile Island nuclear incident in 1979 that paralyzed the industry for years.

Bush has been briefed on the plan but has not given his final approval while diplomats consult with other nations, a senior administration official said. Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman hinted at the initiative in a November speech at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"The world will need much more energy in coming decades," he said, citing projections showing global demand increasing as much as 50 percent by 2025. "How do we meet this demand? How do we do it in a way that leaves all the nations of the earth safer and more secure? The search for answers to these questions increasingly points in one direction: nuclear energy."

Rather than just provide nuclear fuel to other countries that want to have their own reactors, Bodman suggested, the United States would also take back the fuel once it has been spent. "In the longer term, we see fuel-cycle states offering cradle-to-grave fuel-cycle services, leasing fuel for power reactors and then taking it back for reprocessing and ultimate disposition."

The main purpose for reprocessing spent fuel is to extract the radioactive plutonium within it and use that to fuel a reactor. But the process is considered dangerous, and many countries gave up civilian reprocessing years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0012191

Officials briefed on the Bush plan said $250 million -- less than requested by the Energy Department -- will be included in the fiscal 2007 budget in a down payment on what they expect to be billions of dollars of spending. Among other things, it would pay for a pilot plant, possibly at the department's Savannah River facility in South Carolina, to test chemical reprocessing. If the program goes forward as planned, the domestic nuclear industry stands to reap hundreds of millions of dollars.

U.S. officials said they are interested in developing reactors that would not produce spent fuel that could be accessed by recipient countries. One model is a self-contained reactor that cannot be opened, is never refueled and is removed when it runs out of energy. Another, known as a pebble-bed reactor, has been under development in Germany and South Africa and likewise would not have fuel that could be used for weapons.

Al Gore, Sundance's Leading Man (WP)

By William Booth

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

PARK CITY, Utah -- Has ever a little indie film faced a greater hurdle? Imagine this sales pitch: Babe, it's a movie about global warming. Starring Al Gore. Doing a slide show.

With charts.

About "soil evaporation."

Improbable? Perhaps. So it's all the more amazing that "An Inconvenient Truth" had its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival on Tuesday night before an enthusiastic audience that gave the former vice president and his movie a big standing O.

Among the film's lessons: Earth's glaciers are melting, the polar bears are screwed, each year sets new heat records. Al Gore sometimes flies coach. He also schleps his own bags.

The morning after his debut as leading man, Gore pronounces this whole Sundance thing "a most excellent time." He is wearing earth tones again. He seems jolly . He brought Tipper and the kids. He is attending parties and posing for pictures with his fans and enjoying macaroni and cheese at the Discovery Channel soiree. He's palling around with Larry David of "Curb Your Enthusiasm," who says, "Al is a funny guy." But he is also a very serious guy who believes humans may have only 10 years left to save the planet from turning into a total frying pan.

The core of the film is a one-man, ever-evolving multimedia slide show that Gore assembled himself. A little-known fact: Since his defeat by George W. Bush in 2000, Gore has traveled the globe with his bar graphs, staging event after event for small, invited audiences. Free of charge. And he's presented one version or another of this slide show, by his own estimation, a thousand times.

The official Sundance Film Festival guide calls the documentary a "gripping story" with "a visually mesmerizing presentation" that is "activist cinema at its very best."

In the film, Gore presents the latest evidence to demonstrate how the accumulation of carbon dioxide and other pollutants of the industrial age are increasing temperatures. In addition to timelines and bell curves and stuff about oxygen isotopes in Greenland ice cores, Gore includes several cartoons, one featuring a Mister Sunbeam trapped by the bullies known as Greenhouse Gases.

Gore argues -- with scientific evidence projected on big screens at his back -- that global warming may soon lead to catastrophic sea level rises, which could inundate cities such as New York (flooding the former site of the World Trade Center), producing scary nonlinear runaway spasms of extreme weather (bigger, badder hurricanes and typhoons), global pandemics and, depending on where you live, torrential rains or decade-long drought. It is not a pretty picture.

But the film's director, Davis Guggenheim (husband of actress Elisabeth Shue), captures another side of Gore, showing the former veep hitting the road, part Cassandra, part Willy Loman, working out of dreary hotel rooms, pecking away on his Apple laptop, crisscrossing the continents to tell his story over and over.

"I'm interested in choices characters make, especially when they hit against an obstacle," says Guggenheim as Gore sits beside him during an interview yesterday morning. "As I got into Al's story, I see a human being who's made some tough, tough choices in his life. After the 2000 election? To go back deeper and deeper into this issue? To decide that it is the most important thing he can do. . . . I see how tireless he is. That, to me, is so dramatic, so inspiring."

The film touches briefly but with emotion on three events in Gore's life and how they inspired his environmental activism: the car accident that almost took the life of his son; his defeat in Florida to Bush; and perhaps most foreboding, the death of his sister, a lifelong smoker, from lung cancer ("That's not one of the ways you want to die," Gore says in the film in a voice-over) and the fact that his family farmed tobacco and didn't stop until after her death. Gore underscores that this is the way people are, that it is hard to change old habits, be it smoking or growing tobacco or emitting carbon dioxide, but that without change, the bell tolls.

DOJ_NMG_0012192

The film came about after Laurie David, wife of Larry David, saw Gore's slide show in New York after the 2004 premiere of the mega-budget global-warming feature film "The Day After Tomorrow" (starring Dennis Quaid and Jake Gyllenhaal). Laurie David gathered a team, including Lawrence Bender (producer of Quentin Tarantino films, including "Pulp Fiction") and Jeffrey Skoll, the billionaire eBay founder and movie mogul. They met with Gore. "We said you have to let us make this into a movie," David says in an interview over breakfast.

It took some convincing. The slide show, she says, "was his baby, and he felt proprietary about it and it was hard for him to let go." Now, David says, the filmmakers are in discussion with three or four distributors, hoping for a sale.

"This isn't about box office," David says. "None of us are going to make a dime." What is at stake, she says, "is, you know, the planet."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Metro Briefing (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

NEW YORK

F.B.I. DIRECTOR RECUSED FROM INVESTIGATION OF WELD'S FORMER SCHOOL The F.B.I. director will not play a role in the inquiry into Decker College, the Kentucky school once run by William F. Weld, because the director and Mr. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, are friends and former colleagues, an F.B.I. spokesman said yesterday. The New York Post reported the decision by Robert Mueller, the director, yesterday. The New York Democratic Party had asked that Mr. Mueller recuse himself, according to a party spokesman. Mr. Weld has not been accused of any wrongdoing involving Decker, which declared bankruptcy last fall amid allegations of fraud. PATRICK D. HEALY (NYT)

BROOKLYN: DOMESTIC VIOLENCE COURT PRAISED A special Brooklyn court that handles aspects of domestic violence cases including criminal, family and matrimonial matters has heard about 500 cases involving 115 families since it opened on Oct. 31, court officials announced at a news conference yesterday. The court, the integrated domestic violence court, is the fourth of its kind in the city. Charles J. Hynes, the Brooklyn district attorney, said the new court would treat victims of domestic violence with greater sensitivity. MICHAEL BRICK (NYT)

MANHATTAN: ACCOUNTANT SOUGHT IN INQUIRY IS IN ISRAEL David E. Cohen, an accountant who boasted that he could make tax problems disappear "like magic," is in Israel, the Manhattan district attorney's office said yesterday. Prosecutors said they were exploring the possibility of extraditing him to New York, where he and a partner, Jeffrey C. Rosner, face charges of grand larceny and tax fraud. Mr. Rosner surrendered on Tuesday. ANEMONA HARTOCOLLIS (NYT)

BINGHAMTON: ANTIWAR PROTESTERS SENTENCED An antiwar campaigner who poured blood around a military recruitment center three years ago was sentenced to prison yesterday for trespassing and destroying government property. Clare Grady, 47, of Ithaca, received a sentence of six months in federal prison. Ms. Grady is the third defendant to be sentenced for the protest, which took place before the invasion of Iraq in 2003. Two others were sentenced earlier this week. MICHELLE YORK (NYT)

GARDEN CITY: COUNTY LEGISLATORS BATTLE OVER LEADERSHIP The Nassau County Legislature met in a belated and tumultuous session yesterday to pick a presiding officer. The Republican minority leader, Peter J. Schmitt, claimed victory with nine votes, while the Democrats split with eight for Kevan M. Abrahams and two for Roger H. Corbin. Claiming that the law requires 10 votes to win, the main Democrats obtained a temporary court order barring Mr. Schmitt from doing any hiring or firing. BRUCE LAMBERT (NYT)

MANHATTAN: VETERAN CHIEF TO HEAD COMMUNITY UNIT Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly has asked a veteran chief to head a Community Affairs Bureau focusing on counterterrorism as well as crime fighting. On Feb. 1, the chief, Douglas Zeigler, will take command of the bureau as it absorbs the School Safety Division to oversee more than 4,500 police officers and safety agents who work in schools. It is the first time that a uniformed member of the department, rather than a civilian, will head the bureau. Chief Zeigler is now head of the Organized Crime Control Bureau. AL BAKER (NYT)

WHITE PLAINS: PARENTS PLEAD GUILTY IN TODDLERS' DEATHS The parents of two toddlers who were burned to death in scalding water while trapped in the bathroom of their Yonkers apartment last July pleaded guilty to manslaughter and homicide charges on Wednesday. The parents, David Maldonado and Luz Arroyo, had maintained their innocence ever since the boys died, but on Wednesday they reversed themselves and pleaded guilty after prosecutors agreed to drop drug-possession charges against them. The plea deal was made only days before the parents were set to go on trial in County Court here. Mr. Maldonado, who pleaded guilty to second-degree manslaughter, faces 5 to 15 years in prison. Ms. Arroyo, who pleaded guilty to criminally negligent homicide, faces 1 to 4 years. ANAHAD O'CONNOR (NYT)

NEW JERSEY

TRENTON: STATE GIVEN MORE TIME TO REFORM CHILD WELFARE Lawyers in a class-action suit against New Jersey's child welfare agency agreed yesterday to delay action on a request that the system be placed under federal control. The child welfare advocacy group, Children's Rights Inc., said the decision by its lawyers reflected the group's confidence in Gov. Jon S. Corzine and Kevin M. Ryan, the human services commissioner. Although the agreement still leaves open the possibility of a federal takeover of New Jersey's child welfare system, Mr. Ryan vowed that he would not allow that to occur. RICHARD LEZIN JONES (NYT)

NEWARK: UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT'S DEPARTURE IS DELAYED Trustees at New Jersey's troubled state medical school yesterday said they would wait an additional week before voting on the $600,000 severance package being offered to the school's outgoing president, Dr. John J. Petillo. Dr. Petillo resigned last week, after a year in which the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey was rattled by financial scandals and was forced to accept a federal monitor. Board members were set to vote on Dr. Petillo's resignation at their meeting, but the federal monitor requested more time to review the severance package. DAVID KOCIENIEWSKI (NYT)

Compiled by John Sullivan

(NYPOST)

By FREDRIC U. DICKER

The New York Post, January 25, 2006

FBI Director Robert Mueller will recuse himself from the potentially explosive ongoing probe of Decker College, which was once headed by his longtime friend and colleague, New York GOP gubernatorial hopeful William Weld, The Post learned yesterday.

Mueller's decision to step aside came after The Post told the FBI that New York Democrats would be joining former Republican Sen. Alfonse D'Amato's call for Mueller to do that.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko told The Post that while the Decker probe was being handled by the special agent in charge of the Louisville, Ky., field office, Mueller himself is "regularly briefed on significant investigations and cases."

And while Kolko insisted Mueller "has not had a role in directing any part of this investigation," he said, "since the issue has been raised publicly, and to avoid even the appearance of any conflict, any decisions that would otherwise be made by the director in this matter will, instead, be handled by Deputy Director John Pistole."

Kolko's announcement came a few hours after state Democratic Chairman Herman "Denny" Farrell joined D'Amato in urging Mueller to step aside.

The Post disclosed yesterday that D'Amato, who has bitterly attacked former Massachusetts Gov. Weld for his supposed role as a U.S. Justice Department official in prosecuting his brother, Armand, in the early 1990s. Alfonse D'Amato had urged Mueller to recuse himself because of his strong ties to Weld.

Farrell said Weld and Mueller were "good friends" during the 1980s when both served in the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston.

He said Mueller had also contributed to Weld's unsuccessful U.S. Senate campaign against incumbent John Kerry of Massachusetts in 1996.

Decker College in Kentucky, which emphasized job-training skills, was shut down in September amid an FBI probe into allegations of widespread financial improprieties.

Weld, whose investment company owned part of the for-profit college, served as the school's chief executive officer for several months last year and has denied any wrongdoing.

Lawyer Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

(AP) - MINNEAPOLIS-A lawyer has been indicted on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets.

Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday.

Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August.

DOJ_NMG_0012194

The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was "both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes."

Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud; unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Adkins, from St. Paul, refused to comment and referred calls to his own attorney, Earl Gray. Gray said Wednesday that the allegations "are simply not true."

Smith's bail was revoked for violating the terms of his release and he remains in custody.

No. 2 In Drug Ring Pleads Guilty (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 26, 2006

"Superman" made him nervous.

But admitting crimes that could lock him away for life made Stephen "Black" Ardis downright scared Wednesday.

Ardis, who was captured on secret recordings expressing worries that an undercover agent he dubbed "Superman" was on his trail, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to being second-in-command of a Detroit-to-Knoxville drug running operation.

But the 26-year-old drug slinger made it clear before entering his plea that a possible life sentence was a scary proposition he wanted to avoid.

"This person has a very high number of months to serve," defense attorney James W. Bell told federal Judge Thomas Phillips. "I can never be sure what (a client's) criminal history is. I've explained to (Ardis) his criminal history could push this so his sentence could be life."

It's not an entirely reasonable fear, though.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said the massive amount of drugs Ardis conspired to put onto Knoxville's streets guarantees the Detroit man a 20-year prison term.

Then, there are the half dozen or so guns the group used to protect the slew of stash and crack houses the organization set up in Knoxville, Winck said. That weaponry, Winck said, will boost Ardis even farther up the sentencing scale.

If Ardis has a criminal record already, he would climb even higher up the sentencing ladder. Still, his likely punishment would hover around the 30-year mark, not a life term.

Phillips, however, wanted to make sure Ardis knew the ramifications of his guilty plea.

"It could turn out to be very different than what it looks like now," Phillips told Ardis of his possible punishment. "Do you understand that, Mr. Ardis?"

Ardis hesitated and then replied, "Yeah."

His boss in the drug conspiracy that involved cocaine, crack, marijuana and Ecstasy is facing a life term. Conspiracy leader Robert "Party" Smith, 31, of Detroit, pleaded guilty last week. His potential penalty range is so high it outpaces the highest rung on the federal sentencing ladder.

The drug ring was broken in November after a probe led by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey.

It was Conkey whom Ardis dubbed "Superman" in a conversation secretly recorded by the agents during their investigation. In that conversation, Ardis told Smith that he had just learned that Conkey, a well-known undercover officer, had been following him.

A few weeks later, the pair, along with three others, were arrested, several houses raided, and drugs and guns seized.

Phillips set an April 17 sentencing hearing for Ardis.

Prosecutor Postpones Charges In Bomb Case (TRICH)

By John Trumbo, Herald staff writer

Tri-City Herald, January 25, 2006

Benton County prosecutors will need several weeks to decide potential charges against a Richland man who says he kept bomb-making material because he is a miner.

Kevin D. Johnson, 49, was released from jail Friday, three days after Richland police arrested him at his home where they seized gunpowder, nitro-methane and about 20 pounds of ammonium nitrate. They also found six firearms.

DOJ_NMG_0012195

Prosecutor Andy Miller said Tuesday that no charges were filed during the 72-hour hold on Johnson because more investigation is needed. Items taken from the home also have to be analyzed by agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, he said.

"To prove the elements of the case, we'd have to get the ATF to test the items," Miller said.

Johnson told the Herald in an interview at the jail last week that he has mining claims in Oregon and college degrees in civil engineering and geophysics.

"We want to follow up on some of the items mentioned in the (Tri-City Herald) news story," Miller said.

Johnson said he doesn't have a grudge against the police who arrested him.

"I think the police were doing their jobs," he said, noting that Richland officers made an arrest in an unrelated explosives case days before he was arrested.

"The police were here to check me out and it would've been irresponsible if they didn't," he said.

Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb said an ATF agent told him Tuesday analysis of the items found at Johnson's home would be completed in two to four weeks.

Cobb said the investigation also involves 91 blasting caps that allegedly belonged to Johnson that were found Jan. 15 at a home in Franklin County. Cobb said officers discovered the caps in a closet of a man's home after they investigated a domestic violence complaint.

Richland's bomb squad was invited by Franklin County authorities to pick up the material, Cobb said.

"The person who had them said he was keeping them for a guy who lives in Richland," Cobb said.

A search warrant for the Franklin County address on Quail Road said officers found 38, one-third pound sticks of an ammonium nitrate explosive. A box labeled "blasting caps," a gallon of racing nitro-methane, six jars of nitric acid and pre-made electrical charges also were found, according to court documents.

The owner of the property said the items "were used in mining and that a friend (Kevin Johnson) had given them to him to hold (for safekeeping)," the document said.

That led Richland police to Johnson's home at 914 Smith Avenue, where a search was done Jan 15. Johnson was booked into Benton County jail three days later on an investigative hold.

Johnson said if no charges are filed he hopes to have his guns returned because some of them are family heirlooms.

"The guys from the ATF were here and they didn't seem to be overly concerned," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Pinochet's Daughter May Seek US Asylum (REU)

Reuters, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON/SANTIAGO (Reuters) - The eldest daughter of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Wednesday asked the United States to grant her political asylum after she fled tax charges in Chile, Chilean officials said.

Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, 60, was being moved to an immigration detention center late on Wednesday after spending most of the day at Dulles International Airport near Washington, Chile's Foreign Relations Minister Ignacio Walker told local radio in Santiago.

Earlier, Interior Minister Francisco Vidal said Chile had been told that Pinochet Hiriart had asked for asylum.

"In the coming two or three days we will have a decision from the United States which, I insist, will be a rejection (of asylum)," Walker said.

U.S. officials would not confirm that Pinochet Hiriart had requested asylum.

"Lucia Pinochet is currently in U.S. Customs and Border Protection custody at Dulles International Airport, pending resolution of her immigration status," said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security.

"The Department of Homeland Security is unable to comment on whether or not an individual is seeking asylum."

Pinochet Hiriart has been charged with tax fraud related to some $1 million in undeclared taxes and falsification of documents as part of a widening tax evasion and fraud investigation involving the Pinochet family.

She was served with a subpoena in Chile over the weekend to attend court on Monday, but never appeared.

Pinochet Hiriart was pulled over for special screening after arriving at Virginia's Dulles airport.

"She did arrive this morning at about 7 a.m. at Dulles on a flight from Argentina and she's currently being interviewed," Customs and Border Protection agency spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino said.

Chilean officials said Pinochet Hiriart was considered a fugitive from justice and President Ricardo Lagos said she would be asked to return to her country voluntarily.

DOJ_NMG_0012196

"As I understand it, contact has been made and we are trying to see if she could return voluntarily to the country," Lagos told reporters.

EXTRADITION UNCERTAIN

A U.S. Justice Department official said the United States has a limited extradition treaty with Chile, but it did not cover all crimes and may not cover the criminal charges against Pinochet Hiriart.

Media reports in Chile said Pinochet Hiriart fled to neighboring Argentina by car on Sunday, a day before her mother and four siblings were arrested on charges of tax evasion and fraud linked to her father's multimillion-dollar bank accounts.

Pinochet Hiriart's son Rodrigo Garcia Pinochet told a radio in Santiago that his mother had decided to visit the United States and return in March to "clear up this situation."

"She never imagined being in this turmoil, in this situation," he said.

Augusto Pinochet, 90, ruled Chile for 17 years after he took power in a 1973 military coup that toppled Salvador Allende. He has been accused of responsibility in the deaths of as many as 3,000 Chileans during his regime between 1973 and 1990, and in tens of thousands of torture cases.

He was charged last year with evading taxes on an estimated $27 million hidden in foreign accounts. Prosecutors say Pinochet and his family stashed millions of dollars in more than 100 bank accounts outside of Chile.

Observers say he may end up facing prosecution for tax crimes before any of the human rights charges against him, which are stalled in the courts because of his health.

On Tuesday, a Santiago court of appeals approved bail for wife Lucia Hiriart, his youngest son Marco Antonio, and his daughters Jacqueline and Veronica.

Pinochet's eldest son Augusto was released on Monday, hours after being arrested on charges of falsification of documents related to a fraud and tax evasion investigation involving more than 100 secret foreign bank accounts.

The bank accounts have damaged Pinochet's reputation domestically. The left has long accused him of being ultimately responsible for thousands of deaths and the torture of tens of thousands of leftists that occurred during his regime.

But many Chileans had supported him partly because he was seen as a clean leader in financial matters compared with many other Latin American presidents and dictators.

(Additional reporting by Antonio de la Jara in Santiago, Louise Egan in Buenos Aires and David Wiessler in Washington)

TAX:

Hatch Guilty Of Failing To Pay Taxes On 'Survivor' Winnings (AP)

By Ray Henry, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2006

(AP) - PROVIDENCE, Rhode Island-Richard Hatch, who won $1 million (â‚¬810,000) in the debut season of the reality show "Survivor," was found guilty Wednesday of failing to pay taxes on his winnings and taken straight to jail.

Hatch remained calm as the court clerk read the verdict. He waved goodbye to family members, then was handcuffed and taken into custody after U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres said he was a potential flight risk.

The charges carry up to 13 years in prison. Torres said he expected a sentence of between 33 months and 41 months, but said the time could be longer because prosecutors say Hatch committed perjury. Sentencing was scheduled for April 28.

Hatch, 44, was also convicted of evading taxes on $327,000 (â‚¬265,983) he earned as co-host of a Boston radio show and $28,000 (â‚¬22,775) in rent on property he owned. He was acquitted of seven bank, mail and wire fraud charges related to a charity, Horizon Bound, he planned to open for troubled youth.

Hatch's lawyer, John MacDonald, said he would appeal the verdict. He said Hatch was aware of the possibility of jail time.

"Rich has been going through this now for three years and he's prepared himself mentally and emotionally for this date," MacDonald said.

Torres said Hatch never accounted for a significant part of his money, including the "Survivor" prize, which he said could be used to flee.

Near the end of the trial, an explanation for Hatch's failure to pay taxes was raised by his lawyer - but never mentioned in the jury's presence. Hatch's lawyer, Michael Minns, said Hatch caught fellow contestants cheating and struck a deal with the show's producers to pay his taxes if he won. But Hatch was never asked about the allegation when he testified.

Instead, Minns told jurors Hatch was the "world's worst bookkeeper" and said his client never meant to do anything wrong. Hatch testified that he thought producers were supposed to pay his "Survivor" taxes, and said the donations he took from his charity were far less than the money he had already poured into it.

DOJ_NMG_0012197

One juror, Robert Paquette, said in a telephone interview that the jury believed Hatch had legitimate questions about who was responsible for paying his "Survivor" taxes. But he said Hatch crossed the line when he didn't report income from his rental property and radio show.

"Even if you take the `Survivor' money out of there, there was still a lot of evidence," Paquette said.

More than five years after winning, Hatch remains reality TV's most famous villain, the man viewers loved to hate. He first captured their attention for shedding his clothes on "Survivor," prompting David Letterman to nickname him "the fat naked guy," and became known for manipulating competitors to his advantage.

Government Says Struckman Nabbed (PSBIZ)

Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal, January 26, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday that former Renton resident David Struckman has been captured in Panama. Struckman had been charged by the Internal Revenue Service for running an operation that promoted tax-avoidance plans.

Struckman was indicted in 2004 and charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States. He then "disappeared," according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. He was arrested in Panama earlier this month and deported, the department said, and will be transported to Western Washington.

The government alleges that Struckman and four others sold "Global Prosperity" wealth-building products, including videotapes, CDs and seminars, which "included fraudulent methods of income tax elimination."

The seminars cost as much as $37,000 to attend and, according to the government, the group then concealed income earned from the products by using bogus trusts and offshore bank accounts.

Struckman's four co-defendants pleaded guilty and face sentencing on April 10 in Seattle. Last year, Struckman was also charged by the government with tax evasion for 1999 through 2001. If convicted, he faces up to 20 years in jail and $1 million in fines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Moves Toward Senate Confirmation (SACBEE)

By jesse holland

The Sacramento Bee, January 26, 2006

Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito is moving toward all-but-certain confirmation as the nation's 110th justice, with unhappy Democrats keeping up a drumbeat of criticism of the conservative judge while advising their leaders against attempting a filibuster.

"Because we have such a full plate of pressing issues before Congress, a filibuster at this time would be, in my view, very counterproductive," said Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who wants the Senate to concentrate on Hurricane Katrina rebuilding programs. "We simply cannot afford to bring the Senate to a halt at a time when we need its action the most."

Without a filibuster, Alito will be confirmed as the replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who throughout her years on the high court often has been a key fifth vote on contentious social issues including abortion, affirmative action and the death penalty. Alito already has majority support in the Senate, with 51 Republicans and Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska already publicly supporting his confirmation.

The confirmation debate on the Senate floor was continuing Thursday, but Republicans and the White House are so confident that Alito will be approved by the Senate that they've already started congratulating him and sending up new lower-court nominations for senators to consider.

A few hours after senators started debating his nomination Wednesday, Alito met with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Majority Whip Mitch McConnell and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter in a U.S. Capitol room that directly faces the neighboring Supreme Court.

The conservative judge shook their hands and joked with the Republican leaders and thanked them for their efforts. Alito, who had met privately with more than 80 senators since President Bush nominated him in October, also thanked "all of the senators who supported me and were kind enough to meet with me."

The 100-member Senate is expected to confirm the 55-year-old judge from the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia before Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday.

"I call on the United States Senate to put partisanship aside and give Judge Alito the up-or-down vote he deserves and confirm him as the next associate justice of the Supreme Court," the president said at the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0012198

Even though Democrats like Landrieu and Ken Salazar of Colorado won't support a filibuster, that doesn't mean that liberals aren't working to get the largest vote against Alito possible.

Nelson is the only Democrat to express support for Alito, and all eight Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee voted against his nomination on Tuesday. Twenty-three Democrats have already said they will vote against Alito, which is one more than opposed conservative Chief Justice John Roberts last year.

If the pattern continues, Alito may be on his way to the most partisan Senate victory for a Supreme Court nominee in years. The closest vote in modern history is Justice Clarence Thomas' 52-48 victory in 1991, when 11 Democrats broke with their party and voted for President George H.W. Bush's nominee.

Democrats argue that replacing O'Connor with Alito would put people's rights and liberties in danger.

Alito "will tip the balance of the scales of justice," said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat. "He will tip the balance against protecting our basic privacy and personal freedoms. He will tip the balance in favor of presidential power even when it violates the law."

Senate Debates Bush Court Pick, Approval Expected (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, January 26, 2006

U.S. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito appeared to have the votes for confirmation on Wednesday as the Senate began a bitter debate about the conservative judge who could push the high court to the right.

Democrats said Alito valued presidential power over civil liberties, and Republicans denounced what they described as a smear campaign against President George W. Bush's 55-year-old nominee.

At least 51 of the Senate's 55 Republicans, along with at least one Democrat, plan to vote for Alito, according to an unofficial tally based on statements and interviews with lawmakers and aides in the 100-member chamber.

"Judge Alito deserves to become Justice Alito," said Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. "Those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man."

Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record) of Massachusetts ripped into Alito by complaining about what he described as bid for expanded power by Bush. He cited in particular the administration's program of domestic eavesdropping without warrants.

"The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the president is out of bounds," Kennedy said. "He (Alito) is a long-standing advocate for expanding executive power, even at the expense of core individual liberties."

If confirmed, Alito would replace moderate conservative Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and could help move the nine-member high court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other hot-button issues.

The Senate began its debate a day after its Judiciary Committee split 10-8 along party lines to approve Bush's second justice on the high court, which the president has promised to make more conservative.

NO FILIBUSTER

Democrats have not threatened a filibuster since they do not appear to have the votes to sustain such a procedural roadblock. But they appear certain to push the Senate into holding at least a few days of debate.

At the White House, Bush called on the Senate to "put partisanship aside and give Judge Alito the up-or-down vote he deserves and to confirm him as the next associate justice of the Supreme Court."

Flanked by 39 of Alito's former law clerks, Bush said, "In its 216-year history, the Senate has held an up-or-down vote on every Supreme Court nominee with a majority of Senate support."

Democrats have made clear they intend to make Alito and the high-court an issue in the November congressional elections.

Republicans have said they would welcome such a debate and argued that Alito, a federal appeals judge for the past 15 years, is far more mainstream than many Democratic supporters.

Traditionally, the Senate has approved successful Supreme Court nominees with broad bipartisan support, but Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), an Alabama Republican, charged that Democrats have sought to mount opposition to Alito to score political points.

The "knife cuts both ways," Sessions said. "If this is affirmed, then it will be more difficult in the future for Democratic presidents to have their nominees confirmed."

Republican backers have hailed Alito as a fair-minded judge who received the American Bar Association's top rating. But Democratic critics say he has staked out extreme positions on such matters as abortion, civil rights and presidential powers.

DOJ_NMG_0012199

With Republicans holding 55 of 100 seats in the Senate, Alito appears certain to be approved. As of Wednesday, only four Republicans had not disclosed their intentions.

The Senate vote on Alito is expected to be far closer than the 78-22 one that John Roberts, Bush's first nomination to the high court, received in September in being confirmed as U.S. chief justice.

Half of the Senate's 44 Democrats voted for Roberts but only one of them, Ben Nelson of Nebraska, has announced he will vote for Alito. All but a few other Democrats appear certain to oppose him.

Parties Shore Up Votes On Alito (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Democrats took their opposition of Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Senate floor yesterday as Republicans rounded up the 60 votes they need to block any attempt to filibuster his nomination.

"The Democrats know that they can't defeat this nomination," Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said yesterday. "There won't be a filibuster, in all likelihood. But what they can do, unfortunately, is smear the name and the reputation of this good man who has offered himself to public service."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and one of Judge Alito's harshest critics, called the vote on the nomination "the vote of a generation."

"The American people will have no second chance to decide whether this person should be trusted with such an awesome responsibility," Mr. Kennedy said. "As their representatives, it is our responsibility to ask the tough questions and demand meaningful answers."

Republicans, meanwhile, counted the 60 votes they need to prevent a filibuster. Party leaders expect at least five Democrats to join the chamber's 55 Republicans in opposing a filibuster, although they expect to win fewer than 60 votes on final confirmation.

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat, has announced that he will support Judge Alito's confirmation. Also, Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California, Mark Pryor of Arkansas, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut have said they see no grounds for a filibuster.

Sen. Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat, who campaigned on a pledge not to participate in filibusters of judicial nominees, has declined to rule out supporting an Alito filibuster.

Mr. Salazar is part of the so-called "Gang of 14" senators who last year brokered an end to the judicial filibusters. Of those seven Democrats and seven Republicans, 11 say the Alito nomination is not an "extraordinary circumstance" under which a filibuster would be acceptable.

Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey have speculated that Democrats won't filibuster the nomination. But the Democratic leadership in the Senate repeatedly has refused to say that a filibuster is no longer being considered.

However, not everybody who supports Judge Alito wants to avoid a filibuster.

"If they move forward with such a filibuster, my reaction is: Make my day," Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, said yesterday. "We'll enjoy pulling the constitutional trigger to allow Judge Alito a fair up-or-down vote."

The "constitutional" route would require 51 votes to ban judicial filibusters.

With a filibuster looking unlikely, the only question remaining about Judge Alito's Senate confirmation is when the full vote will occur.

Republicans said yesterday that they are hoping for a vote Monday. Democrats, however, are aiming for a vote as late as Tuesday so President Bush's State of the Union address that day will downplay news of the confirmation.

Robert Novak (CHIST)

By Alito a dilemma for red state Dems

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2006

As the Senate moved this week toward the anticipated vote to confirm Samuel Alito, a resident of far-off North Dakota was likely to watch a heavily aired television ad. A female announcer read this:

"Along with Democrats and Republicans, newspapers across America . . . are endorsing Judge Samuel Alito for the U.S. Supreme Court. Yet, politically motivated liberal extremists like Ted Kennedy continue to attack Alito. Sen. Kent Conrad will soon cast his vote. Call Sen. Conrad and tell him to vote yes on Judge Alito and stand with mainstream America, not Ted Kennedy."

Conrad, a powerful figure in the Senate as ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee, normally experiences no difficulty in making up his mind to express firm opinions. But not on the Alito confirmation. He scheduled an extra meeting with the judge on Friday, and his staff said an internal meeting to decide his vote would be held later that morning. Facing re-election this year in the very red state of North Dakota, Conrad may be wondering what political price he might pay to vote no on Alito.

DOJ_NMG_0012200

The Democratic leadership has made a calculated decision to follow Kennedy and liberal pressure groups in opposition to Alito. Sen. Ben Nelson, up for re-election in Nebraska, at this writing is the Senate's only Democrat to endorse Alito. Regarding this opposition as a political decision, conservative strategists are determined to play politics themselves this year against Democrats -- particularly red state senators who oppose Alito.

That has opened the door for conservatives to turn the Alito confirmation into a political asset in the 2006 elections. Two unnamed donors have contributed $100,000 for current TV ads in the Dakotas to influence Democrats Kent Conrad and Tim Johnson. These same contributors, who spent $4.5 million in the 2004 election cycle, have privately committed $5 million against the re-election of red state Democrats who actually vote against Alito.

Conrad and his North Dakota colleague Byron Dorgan, Bill Nelson of Florida, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas are red state Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts. While Roberts is no less conservative than Alito and was markedly less forthcoming in answering Senate Judiciary Committee questions, these Democrats who voted for the chief justice have been under intense pressure from the left to oppose Alito.

All such senators may be willing to risk a politically unpopular "no" vote, partly thanks to disappointing Senate Republican candidate recruitment this year. With party leaders unable to persuade popular Republican Gov. John Hoeven to run in North Dakota, Conrad does not yet even have an opponent. Florida Republican leaders did not get the candidate they wanted with Rep. Katherine Harris running far behind, enabling Bill Nelson to surprise many colleagues by announcing opposition to Alito. However, conservative money now will pour into both Florida and North Dakota.

Politicizing the confirmation vote also poses problems for prominent Democratic non-incumbent candidates. Pennsylvania State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., the nominally pro-life opponent of Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, is keeping quiet about Alito. In New Jersey, newly appointed Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez does not have Casey's luxury of neutrality on Alito. He is expected to vote no, threatening Italian-American votes against him this year in favor of Republican Thomas Kean (son of the former governor).

Alito strategists were delighted this week when "Friends of John Kerry" dispatched over the whole country an e-mail signed by the 2004 presidential nominee. That facilitates the conservative tactic of linking Conrad with Kennedy and Kerry in the minds of North Dakotans if he votes against Alito.

"We can't trust [Alito] to defend mainstream American values," contended Kerry's letter. The contention that President Bush's nominee is outside the "mainstream" is the major talking point against Alito, but polls show support for him and his endorsement of spousal abortion notification. That debate's outcome may determine whether senators who vote against Alito will suffer at the polls this year and in the years ahead.

Senators In Need Of A Spine (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Judge Samuel Alito Jr., whose entire history suggests that he holds extreme views about the expansive powers of the presidency and the limited role of Congress, will almost certainly be a Supreme Court justice soon. His elevation will come courtesy of a president whose grandiose vision of his own powers threatens to undermine the nation's basic philosophy of government — and a Senate that seems eager to cooperate by rolling over and playing dead.

It is hard to imagine a moment when it would be more appropriate for senators to fight for a principle. Even a losing battle would draw the public's attention to the import of this nomination.

At the Judiciary Committee hearings, the judge followed the well-worn path to confirmation, which has the nominee offer up only the most boring statements and unarguable truisms: the president is not above the law; diversity in college student bodies is a good thing. But in what he has said in the past, and what he refused to say in the hearings, Judge Alito raised warning flags that, in the current political context, cannot simply be shrugged away with a promise to fight again another day.

The Alito nomination has been discussed largely in the context of his opposition to abortion rights, and if the hearings provided any serious insight at all into the nominee's intentions, it was that he has never changed his early convictions on that point. The judge — who long maintained that Roe v. Wade should be overturned — ignored all the efforts by the Judiciary Committee's chairman, Arlen Specter, to get him to provide some cover for pro-choice senators who wanted to support the nomination. As it stands, it is indefensible for Mr. Specter or any other senator who has promised constituents to protect a woman's right to an abortion to turn around and hand Judge Alito a potent vote to undermine or even end it.

But portraying the Alito nomination as just another volley in the culture wars vastly underestimates its significance. The judge's record strongly suggests that he is an eager lieutenant in the ranks of the conservative theorists who ignore our system of checks and balances, elevating the presidency over everything else. He has expressed little enthusiasm for restrictions on presidential power and has espoused the peculiar argument that a president's intent in signing a bill is just as important as the intent of Congress in writing it. This would be worrisome at any time, but it takes on far more significance now, when the Bush administration seems determined to use the cover of the "war on terror" and presidential privilege to ignore every restraint, from the Constitution to Congressional demands for information.

DOJ_NMG_0012201

There was nothing that Judge Alito said in his hearings that gave any comfort to those of us who wonder whether the new Roberts court will follow precedent and continue to affirm, for instance, that a man the president labels an "unlawful enemy combatant" has the basic right to challenge the government's ability to hold him in detention forever without explanation. His much-quoted statement that the president is not above the law is meaningless unless he also believes that the law requires the chief executive to defer to Congress and the courts.

Judge Alito's refusal to even pretend to sound like a moderate was telling because it would have cost him so little. Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., who was far more skillful at appearing mainstream at the hearings, has already given indications that whatever he said about the limits of executive power when he was questioned by the Senate has little practical impact on how he will rule now that he has a lifetime appointment.

Senate Democrats, who presented a united front against the nomination of Judge Alito in the Judiciary Committee, seem unwilling to risk the public criticism that might come with a filibuster — particularly since there is very little chance it would work. Judge Alito's supporters would almost certainly be able to muster the 60 senators necessary to put the nomination to a final vote.

A filibuster is a radical tool. It's easy to see why Democrats are frightened of it. But from our perspective, there are some things far more frightening. One of them is Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court.

The Roberts-Alito Court (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

With at least 52 Senators already on record in support, it's clear that -- short of some smear ex machina -- liberal Democrats can't stop Samuel Alito from being confirmed to a seat on the Supreme Court. So it's a good moment to consider what this says about our politics and what it means for the Court as it enters a new era.

One conclusion is that the confirmation of both Chief Justice John Roberts and Judge Alito marks the most important domestic success for President Bush since his 2003 tax cuts. These look like legacy picks. Despite the Harriet Miers misstep, Mr. Bush has now fulfilled one of his campaign promises. And with two distinguished conservative jurists joining Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the Court is closer than it's been in 50 years to having a majority that can restore Constitutional interpretation to its founding principles.

In this sense, the Alito-Roberts ascendancy also marks a victory for the generation of legal conservatives who earned their stripes in the Reagan Administration. The two new Justices are both stars of that generation -- many others are scattered throughout the lower courts -- and they are now poised to influence the law and culture for 20 years or more. All those Federalist Society seminars may have finally paid off. Call it Ed Meese's revenge.

The Roberts-Alito Court also represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its "borking" strategy. They have long thought of the Courts as their personal legislature, and they have shown they will do and say anything to keep control of it. But this time they lost, and on their own ideological terms.

Senator Chuck Schumer declared in 2001 that he wanted to turn judicial confirmations into battles over "ideology." The New York Democrat succeeded in doing so, but he ended up losing in a self-knockout. One reason Democrats couldn't defeat Chief Justice Roberts or Judge Alito, despite near party-line opposition, is that their filibuster strategy had made judges a top-line election issue in both 2002 and 2004.

The battle over their unprecedented filibuster of 10 appeals-court nominees helped to sweep Democrats out of the Senate in Bush-leaning states and give Republicans a larger majority. The Democrats who remain in red states -- five of whom are up for re-election in November -- saw all this and had no appetite for a repeat in 2006. The liberal interest groups that devised the filibuster strategy and wrote the anti-Alito talking points for Senators Ted Kennedy and Patrick Leahy thus contributed as much as anyone to Judge Alito's confirmation. Congratulations, Ralph Neas. It's your finest hour.

While it's impossible to know how any new Justice will vote on specific issues, every indication is that the new duo will fit somewhere along the Court's conservative-libertarian wing. With Judge Alito replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who in her later years had moved markedly left on the culture, we can anticipate more skepticism toward both racial preferences and campaign-finance restrictions on free speech.

We can also expect more respect for the Free Exercise of religion clause in the First Amendment, as opposed to the rigid invocation of the Establishment Clause's "wall" of separation between church and state. We'd also hope for greater respect for property rights, including a revisiting of last year's egregious Kelo decision, as well as a revival of the Lopez line of Commerce

DOJ_NMG_0012202

Clause cases showing more respect for federalism. Roe v. Wade may survive, or not, but we'd expect that individual states would receive more leeway to enact restrictions on abortion as per the wishes of their citizens.

This does not mean this will be a "conservative" Court, however. Four reliable liberals remain, as well as the protean Justice Anthony Kennedy, who has been making his own migration to the cultural left and the make-it-up-as-you-go jurisprudence exemplified by Lawrence (on state laws on homosexuality) and Roper v. Simmons (on the juvenile death penalty). You can bet the press corps and liberal politicians will now apply their carrot-and-stick strategy of praise and castigation to push Justice Kennedy further to the left and retain a five-vote liberal majority. This will be especially true on the polarizing cultural disputes that are better solved democratically.

All of which means that the political battles over the Courts will continue. It is possible Mr. Bush will get another Supreme Court nomination before his term ends. Even if he doesn't, there will be many crucial places on the appellate courts to fill. There are eight appeals-court nominees awaiting action and a total of 15 vacancies, excluding Judge Alito's slot on the Third Circuit.

The White House and Senate should move with confidence and dispatch to fill these openings with judges in the Thomas-Scalia and now Roberts-Alito mold, while they still have the votes to confirm them. One thing we've surely learned from the past six months of Supreme Court debate is that elections matter to the courts as much as they do to the other two branches of government.

A Stop At Senate On The Way To Court (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

On the verge of a second successful Supreme Court appointment, the White House flexed its judicial muscles yesterday, sending Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Capitol for an early victory lap and resubmitting a contentious appellate court nominee blocked by Democrats in past years.

Just hours after Senate debate opened on his nomination to the Supreme Court, Alito posed for photographs and congratulations with Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) and other senior GOP senators. Although a Senate confirmation vote is not expected until Friday at the earliest -- and possibly as late as Tuesday -- the group acted as if the result was not in doubt. Alito, an appellate judge for 15 years, thanked "all of the senators who supported me and were kind enough to meet with me."

Meanwhile, the White House renominated Brett M. Kavanaugh to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. President Bush nominated Kavanaugh, the White House staff secretary, in July 2003, but he fell victim to intense battles between Senate Democrats and Republicans over numerous judicial appointments. A May 2005 bipartisan pact averted a showdown over judicial filibusters and enabled some contested nominees to win confirmation. But it left Kavanaugh in limbo.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's eight Democrats complained last year that Kavanaugh took several months to answer their written questions about his qualifications. Other Democrats have noted that Kavanaugh, 40, has limited courtroom experience and helped independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr pursue the Monica S. Lewinsky case during the Clinton presidency.

Senate debate on Alito opened with Republicans praising him and Democrats calling him a threat to long-established rights such as access to abortion in all 50 states. "He has voted to narrow that circle, to restrict the rights that Americans hold dear," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) said.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) said Alito "has stated he looks at the facts of each case. Yet time and time again his decisions show support for big business, for the executive branch, but not so much for everyday Americans."

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said Alito "is highly qualified to serve on the Supreme Court." Democrats, he said, "are so intent on manufacturing a case against this nominee that they brush aside this seemingly minor detail of his qualifications as if it were just an annoyance."

Frist began the debate by saying that "those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man and imposing an unfair, political standard on all judicial nominees." The senator added: "He has a record that demonstrates a respect for judicial restraint, an aversion to political agendas on the bench, and a commitment to the rule of law and the Constitution."

At the White House, Bush met with 54 of Alito's former law clerks. The president told reporters that Alito "has earned broad support from his fellow judges on the 3rd Circuit" and said: "There's no doubt about Judge Alito's qualifications, his intellect, or his complete dedication to our Constitution and laws. He is exactly the kind of person Americans want on the Supreme Court."

Bush NJ Federal Court Nominees Include Abramoff Prosecutor (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Wednesday nominated one of the Justice Department's lead prosecutors in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe to a U.S. District Court seat.

DOJ_NMG_0012203

Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, was nominated for the federal judgeship in New Jersey, where he served in the U.S. Attorney's office under Michael Chertoff, now secretary of Homeland Security.

The White House was poised to nominate Hillman last summer, after New Jersey's two Democratic senators took the opportunity to weigh in on Hillman and other nominees in exchange for lifting their objections to another candidate Bush had nominated in 2003.

White House press officials did not immediately comment on the timing of the nomination.

Hillman will step down as chief of the public integrity unit next week, but remain in the Justice Department's criminal division until he is confirmed, a department official said. Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Miami, will lead the public corruption-fighting office on a temporary basis, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss personnel matters.

Lourie performed the same role until Hillman took over early in 2003.

During a news conference earlier this month following Abramoff's guilty plea on corruption-related charges, Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said Hillman played an important role in providing leadership in the investigation.

Hillman came to Washington in 2001. Before that, he was an assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey from 1992 to 2001, coming in while Chertoff was the U.S. attorney.

Last summer, Democratic Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg signed off on the nominations of Hillman and two others nominated to judgeships in New Jersey on Wednesday. They gave the OK as part of an agreement to lift their objections to Bush's nomination of Peter Sheridan, a lawyer and Republican activist, to the federal bench.

Bush Plays Down Bailout Prospects For GM And Ford (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper And John D. Mckinnon, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. should develop "a product that's relevant" rather than look to Washington for help with their heavy pension obligations, and hinted he would take a dim view of a government bailout of the struggling auto makers.

In an Oval Office interview, Mr. Bush said that his administration has discussed the development of new fuel technologies with the nation's top two auto makers, which might make them more competitive, but that he has had no talks about the companies' finances.

Asked if he had spoken to GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner or Ford Chairman and CEO William Clay Ford Jr., Mr. Bush replied: "Not about their balance sheets." He added: "And I haven't been asked by any automobile manufacturer about a bailout."

Earlier this week, Ford announced sweeping layoffs and plant closings, amid falling sales and increased foreign competition that have sparked concerns one or both of the auto makers may seek bankruptcy protection. Both have denied such plans. But the prospect has fueled speculation that the federal government could face pressure to bail out the companies, as President Carter's administration did in 1979 with $1.5 billion in loan guarantees for Chrysler Corp.

Mr. Bush said little to suggest the companies should find comfort in that precedent. "I have been very reluctant -- I'm mindful of the past where at one point in time, a predecessor of mine was faced with that same dilemma," he said. "I would hope I wouldn't be asked to make that decision."

Asked if the government should take any pre-emptive action, he said: "I think it's very important for the market to function." He suggested he felt optimistic about the companies' prospects.

1 TRANSCRIPT

Read an edited transcript2 of the interview with President Bush.

The auto industry's struggles could become a big political issue in this year's midterm elections and beyond, especially in Midwestern states such as Michigan and Ohio, where much of the industry's manufacturing base is located. Ford and GM plan to cut at least 60,000 jobs over the next few years, and the fallout could ripple across the auto-supply industry as well, whether or not the companies ever seek bankruptcy protection. While resisting a bailout could cost Republicans support among some voters, it also would serve to shore up their support among those who favor free-market solutions.

While neither GM nor Ford has explicitly sought a Chrysler-style bailout, the two auto makers have dropped hints they would welcome government help in areas such as coping with rising health-care and pension burdens and the high costs of developing fuel-efficient vehicles. And both are key administration priorities in 2006.

Market Forces for Health Care

Speaking less than a week before his annual State of the Union address, Mr. Bush previewed his push to harness market forces to make health care more affordable by giving consumers more direct control of their care. Among other things, Mr. Bush signaled he wants to significantly expand the Health Savings Account program, under which workers who sign up for special high-deductible insurance are allowed to put away money tax-free to bankroll basic expenditures.

DOJ_NMG_0012204

On other matters, Mr. Bush:

· said he would not deal with the radical Hamas Islamist party, regardless of how many seats it won in yesterday's Palestinian parliamentary elections until it accepts Israel's right to exist;

· declared that "it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy" in trying to halt Iran's nuclear program, and said he advocates a plan for Russia to enrich nuclear material and deliver it to Iran for a civilian nuclear-energy program;

· said the controversial program to wiretap conversations between people inside and outside the U.S. without warrants was developed by national-security experts and was constructed outside an existing law on covert surveillance because "we require a different response to an enemy" in an era of terrorism.

In discussing the auto companies' woes, Mr. Bush suggested his sympathies lie more with the workers who are displaced or unsettled by a changing corporate environment, saying his administration would focus on ways to retrain laid-off employees. "This is going to be a very troubling time for workers and their families," Mr. Bush said, adding that companies had an obligation to assist employees they cut loose.

On the subject of ballooning pension expenses, which are part of Detroit's problems, Mr. Bush called on GM, Ford and the airline industry to think twice before backing away from their promises to pay in full. "That's not how the market works and that's not corporate responsibility as I see it," he said. "I'm very firm on seeing to it that this government hold people to account."

While neither GM nor Ford has sought to pass on pension obligations, a few airlines have. After filing for bankruptcy protection, UAL Corp.'s United Airlines and US Airways Group Inc. dumped nearly $10 billion in unfunded pension obligations on the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal insurer of private-sector traditional pension plans. Northwest Airlines and Delta Air Lines, which are currently operating in Chapter 11, have said they haven't decided whether they will ask the court to shift their pension plans to the PBGC.

Mr. Bush suggested that one way auto makers can make more appealing products is to promote cars using alternative fuels -- a topic he plans to touch on in his speech next week. He said U.S. auto makers could find new market share in the competition to sell so-called flexible-fuel vehicles, which can use gasoline or blends containing such alternative fuels as ethanol.

"As these automobile manufacturers compete for market share and use technology to try to get consumers to buy their product, they also will be helping America become less dependent on foreign sources of oil," he said.

Mr. Bush's discussion of alternative fuels is likely to boost efforts on Capitol Hill to set targets for reducing U.S. oil consumption, and to start mandating flexible-fuel technology on motor vehicles. He said he has been impressed by the example of Brazil, where alternative auto fuels made from sugar are expected to soon help that country end dependence on imported oil. But Mr. Bush's proposal is likely to focus more on government-sponsored research than expansive new tax breaks for purchase of flex-fuel vehicles, for example.

On the health-care front, Mr. Bush will call on Congress to provide more information on providers, including how much they charge, so consumers can be smarter shoppers. "The patient-doctor relationship is a crucial relationship in helping control the costs of medicine," Mr. Bush said. "The more transparent pricing is, and the more opportunities patients have to make decisions in the health-care field, the more likely it is costs will not increase as dramatically as they have in the past."

He said he also will push for legislation making it harder to file malpractice lawsuits, which he said are "running up the cost of medicine." Congress has declined to address this issue in the past.

Acknowledging that he hasn't always managed to get the Republican-controlled Congress to take on his priorities, Mr. Bush called Washington gridlock "the challenge of the '06 year." He said he would make an effort to draw Democrats into the health-care debate.

During the interview, Mr. Bush appeared relaxed as he sipped coffee and called for questions, often holding up his hands to say more about a topic or finish a thought. His most animated and expansive comments came as he discussed his drive to introduce democracy in the Middle East, a topic that often drew him to the edge of his seat.

The president said his administration's efforts are advancing across the Middle East, despite concerns that they are sowing instability. "My attitude is that America must have faith in our values, be idealistic about our vision, and practical about what's possible," he said. "But it's changing. It's changing."

Conditions for Hamas

Still, Mr. Bush warned he isn't prepared to accept one offshoot of that drive: the electoral rise of the radical Hamas party among Palestinians. Whether Hamas is democratically elected or not, Mr. Bush said, the U.S. won't deal with the group. Hamas has claimed responsibility for many attacks on Israel over the years and continues to deny its right to exist.

DOJ_NMG_0012205

"A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," Mr. Bush said. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you. "

The Palestinian election is a reminder that, in some countries in the region, elections could elevate Islamic religious parties that aren't friendly to the West or eager to see other Western values spread. But Mr. Bush made clear he isn't deterred by such concerns, saying he sees "no alternative" to democracy as a long-term stabilizing force.

Elsewhere in the Middle East, Mr. Bush said he is working with other international leaders to defuse Iran's nuclear program. He made it clear that he is particularly supportive of a proposal under which Russia would enrich nuclear material on the Iranians' behalf in return for that country's renunciation of nuclear-weapons research.

Iran has said it is interested in the idea. Its top nuclear negotiator has been discussing it with Russian officials this week, but no agreement has been reached.

Mr. Bush suggested he had grave reservations about the West's ability to work with Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, citing that leader's call for the destruction of Israel. Mr. Bush said Mr. Ahmadinejad's "interest in the destruction of one of our closest allies" is a matter of concern "to people who care for the peace around the world."

Mr. Bush also had words of criticism for Syria, saying that government continued to meddle in the affairs of its neighbor Lebanon in direct defiance of United Nations disengagement demands.

--Joseph B. White in Detroit contributed to this article.

Write to Christopher Cooper at christopher.cooper@wsj.com3 and John D. McKinnon at john.mckinnon@wsj.com4

Managing Detroit (WP)

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

IT'S BEEN YEARS since chrome and tail fins seduced consumers, and few people still believe that what's good for General Motors is good for America. But the big Detroit carmakers remain so prominent -- as employers, industrial symbols and purveyors of cultural icons -- that it's hard to keep their grim results in some sort of perspective. Last year General Motors Corp. announced plans to cut 30,000 U.S. jobs, and this week Ford Motor Co. followed with plans to cut at least 25,000. These losses are painful. But they do not herald the death of American car manufacturing. Nor do they justify special measures from the federal government.

Since 1985 the value of cars, trucks and components manufactured in the United States has roughly doubled. Even more remarkably, the industry employs about the same number of workers it did 20 years ago -- a notable achievement given that employment in other types of manufacturing has fallen. What the GM and Ford announcements signal is not the decline of an industry but rather a shift in its makeup. The U.S. payrolls of Detroit's Big Three (the third company being Chrysler, though it is now German-owned) fell from about 1 million people to roughly 400,000 between 1979 and 2003. Some of those jobs were transferred to components makers that were spun off by GM and Ford, and some were replaced by foreign "transplant" factories whose American payrolls have grown to just under 300,000. As a result of this process, membership in the United Auto Workers union has fallen by more than half over the past quarter-century.

The dislocation has been grueling. Michigan has been a net loser of at least 100,000 automobile jobs since the late 1970s, although other Midwestern states have held roughly level; Indiana has even gained a bit. The new Sun Belt factories make up for Michigan's loss to some extent, but some of the foreign plants offer workers lower benefits and remain union-free partly because of harsh laws that discourage workers from organizing. Even with fairer labor laws, though, the generous compensation offered by Detroit would not have been sustainable. Only a combination of oligopoly and perverse government policy disguised this fact for a generation.

Until the 1970s the Detroit three accounted for more than 80 percent of vehicle sales in the United States. At its peak, GM alone controlled more than half of the market. This power allowed Detroit to charge high prices, which hurt ordinary families, and in turn to pay wages that were much more generous than workers in other industries could expect. But by the late 1970s foreign imports were growing, and generous compensation became unaffordable; in 1979, Chrysler had to be rescued by the federal government. The arrival of transplant factories in the 1980s was an extension of this foreign competition -- and a welcome one. If the foreigners hadn't started making cars here, imports would have boomed even faster. Michigan's pain would not have been offset by gains in the Sun Belt.

The rise of foreign competition should have forced the auto workers' compensation into line with that of other industries, but this is where perverse government incentives kicked in. The government allowed companies to boost compensation by promising generous retirement benefits, but it failed to require firms to set aside the cash to make good on those pledges. In the case of pensions, companies had to set aside something, but not the full amount needed. In the case of retiree health benefits, they were free to set aside only what they wanted . This "promise now, pay later" option allowed carmakers to postpone adjustment to foreign competition. But "later" has arrived, and the Detroit three confront benefit costs that undermine their ability to compete against the transplant factories.

DOJ_NMG_0012206

Detroit's advocates understandably wish that the old world of oligopoly wages could somehow be preserved forever. They tend to oppose trade, which they rightly identify as the root cause of their problems. But trade and competition promote efficiency and innovation -- new models, safety features and hybrid engines, not to mention good prices -- and these consumer gains outweigh the losses for unionized car workers. Equally, Detroit's advocates tend to favor regulation that expands the option of paying later; right now, they are pushing Congress to weaken rules on pension funding still further. But the pay-later approach is cruel to workers who count on benefit promises that turn out to be fake, and it increases the risk that pension plans will ultimately be bailed out by taxpayers.

It's not clear whether the GM and Ford restructuring plans will be enough to avert bankruptcy. Their difficulties may take on a more political tone, particularly since the Midwest is a key battleground for presidential campaign strategists. But Congress needs to keep Motown's troubles in perspective. They are the result of competitive pressures that most parts of the U.S. economy take for granted every day. And it is precisely by embracing competition that the United States has become the world's most powerful economy.

In Address, Bush Is Seen Avoiding Large Initiatives (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — Having stabilized his political standing after a difficult 2005, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday intent primarily on retaining his party's slim majority in Congress this year and completing unfinished business from his existing agenda.

Unlike last year, when he used the occasion to kick off an ambitious and ultimately failed effort to overhaul Social Security, Mr. Bush seems unlikely to reshape the political landscape with his speech on Tuesday, members of both parties said.

Lawmakers said this election year would not be a good time to push difficult initiatives, and the White House has already shelved what it had initially planned as its big idea for 2006, a rewriting of the tax code.

Administration officials and other Republicans in Washington said Mr. Bush would focus on several topics, including health care, spending restraint, illegal immigration and the nation's international economic competitiveness, as well as an unapologetic restatement of his national security policy.

Much of the speech, they said, will be tied together under a broad theme acknowledging that the United States is going through transitions that involve wrenching dislocation as well as opportunity.

His aides portray Mr. Bush as undaunted by the plague of setbacks last year that loosened his grip on his party and drove down his poll numbers, which although up from their lows last fall remain at anemic levels. They said he was intent on using the nationally televised address on Tuesday to set out a forceful agenda that he will use to draw sharp contrasts with Democrats.

"People don't sit around here wallowing and wondering if we should go the school uniform route because we had some challenges last year," said Nicolle Wallace, the White House communications director, referring to an initiative once championed by President Bill Clinton that has come to symbolize a retreat into small-bore leadership.

"The state of the union address will be directional for our party and our country, and visionary," Ms. Wallace said. "That is not code for it lacking substance."

In the broadest sense, Mr. Bush's challenge is to demonstrate to both parties that he can still drive the national agenda despite the increasing difficulties he has had keeping Republicans together on domestic issues and in line with his assertively expansive view of his own wartime powers.

After five tumultuous years in office, he must show that his administration is not exhausted and bereft of ideas, and that the more ambitious goals he has set out at home and abroad have not crashed up against the nation's tolerance for ideological change.

The president's main goals for the year appear to be showing progress in Iraq, the issue that more than any determines his public support, and doing all he can to help maintain Republican control of Congress in the fall elections.

Part of that calculation, members of both parties said, is acknowledging that overreaching on legislative initiatives this year could carry outsized political risks, since the loss of even of few seats in either chamber could endanger his ability to get anything done for the remainder of his term.

"We shouldn't underestimate the White House's ability to win a political campaign, so to the extent that success in November is his objective, this is his announcement speech, and an important one," said Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council, an organization of centrist Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0012207

The speech is an opportunity for Mr. Bush to frame the legislative debates that will dominate Congress in coming months and provide ammunition for the fall elections. He has signaled that he will push hard for the extension of his tax cuts, arguing that failure to do so would amount to a tax increase that would endanger the economy. He is also fighting big fights over reauthorization of the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act and legislation to stem illegal immigration.

Aides said he also wanted to set out a broader vision of where the country should be heading and how it should get there.

"He views the times we are living in to be transformational, and with that comes great anxiety," said a senior administration official who is working closely with the president on the speech and who spoke on the condition of anonymity to provide a glimpse of the speech's contents.

Mr. Bush, the official said, will bring up topics like protectionism and isolationism to make a point that "America is at its best when we are shaping events, not when we are being shaped by them, both in foreign policy and domestically."

The president goes into the speech having dealt to a large degree with the most acute political problems from the latter half of last year. One was the demoralization of his conservative base, whose enthusiasm could determine the control of Congress. The other was his loss of control last fall of the terms of the partisan debate over national security, the issue that more than any other has determined his political fortunes.

The nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court, and the smooth handling of his confirmation process, has gone a long way toward calming social conservatives. Economic conservatives say they have been reassured by signals from the White House that Mr. Bush will tackle more directly their main area of concern, the rapid growth in government spending.

On the politics of national security, Mr. Bush has struck back forcefully after spending much of last year on the defensive, especially over the continued bloodshed in Iraq and his evolving rationales for taking the United States to war.

"They're on their way up, and they're going to be slow and methodical about recovering the political capital and the ground they will need to advance more of their agenda," said Pat Toomey, a former Republican member of Congress who is now the president of the Club for Growth, a conservative political action committee.

Mr. Bush and other White House officials have issued broad hints about his 2006 agenda, especially a repackaged set of health care initiatives built on existing proposals.

The White House has signaled that Mr. Bush will highlight his support for expanding the tax deductibility of medical expenses for people who lack employer-provided insurance or who have out-of-pocket expenses.

Economists who have consulted with the administration on the issue said Mr. Bush might push for a tax credit for uninsured medical expenses that would be structured so that even people who pay little or nothing in federal income tax would receive it.

Supporters of this proposal say it would mitigate a bias in the tax code that encourages employer-provided health insurance rather than individually purchased coverage.

R. Glenn Hubbard, dean of the Graduate School of Business at Columbia University and a former chief economist at the White House, and two other economists set forth the rationale in a recent book, "Healthy, Wealthy and Wise."

If the government encourages people to buy individual insurance policies with lower premiums and higher co-payments, they said, consumers will "make careful choices about their health care spending," and this, in turn, "will significantly reduce the growths in health costs."

In his budget last year, Mr. Bush proposed a refundable tax credit for the cost of health insurance bought by individuals under 65. The Treasury estimated the 10-year cost at $74 billion. Mr. Bush also said that people should be allowed to take tax deductions for the premiums they paid for high-deductible health insurance plans.

People buy such plans when they establish health savings accounts to pay routine medical expenses. The Treasury said the proposed deduction would cost $28 billion over 10 years.

On health care and other issues, however, Mr. Bush faces daunting hurdles. House Republicans are in the middle of a leadership fight that will not be concluded until after the State of the Union address. In addition, the criminal inquiry into bribery and corruption by lobbyists holds huge risks for Republicans.

Federal budget deficits limit the president's ability to undertake new programs. And members of his own party, especially in the Senate, are beginning to maneuver for advantage for the 2008 presidential race.

"You're starting to see the beginnings of a shift in the center of gravity away from Bush and his agenda toward the next agenda and the next leader of the party," said Bruce Bartlett, a conservative commentator who is often critical of the administration.

Health Of The Union (WSJ)

By David Gratzer

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012208

During next week's State of the Union address, President Bush will cite rising health costs as a major problem for Americans and their businesses, and he will outline steps to strengthen health savings accounts as a remedy. But he is unlikely to mention Medicare reform -- and that would be a mistake. Indeed, if the president is serious about health reform, he will have to tackle Medicare. And he can start by re-engaging a debate from 1999.

Seven years ago, Sen. John Breaux and Rep. Bill Thomas completed the final report of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. Considering various reforms, they eventually settled on a proposal modeled after the popular Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP), which covers nine million federal employees and their families. Instead of today's one-size-fits-all Medicare structure, they envisioned a program where seniors choose among competing private plans.

Since then, Washington has debated the size and scope of Medicare expansion -- such as the prescription benefit -- but the program itself has yet to be fundamentally rethought. It needs to be, because faced with Medicare's rising costs over the past four decades, the only real response has been a bipartisan exercise in wage and price controls. The results have been dismal:

· Poor physician participation. In cities such as Denver, it is hard for the elderly to find a doctor. According to a new study by the Center for Studying Health System Change, nearly 30% of American physicians will not accept new Medicare patients.

· Regulatory excess. Medicare requires hospitals and other providers to comply with over 130,000 pages of regulations, according to a Mayo Clinic estimate. A study for the American Hospital Association found that for every hour of care delivered to a Medicare patient, hospital officials spend roughly a half-hour completing the paperwork.

· Uneven service. "One unintended consequence of [Medicare's] administered pricing systems," notes a recent Federal Trade Commission report, "has been to make some hospital services extraordinarily lucrative and others unprofitable. As a result, some services are more available (and others less available) than they would be in a competitive market."

Herein lies the core problem with attempting to separate health reform from Medicare reform: The pricing and regulations of this massively large federal program have a profound impact on the rest of health care. With its controls, Medicare bureaucrats simply shift costs over to insured Americans. And if we really fret over rising health care costs, Medicare gives us plenty of reason for angst: It will consume 25% of federal income-tax revenues by 2030.

What then to do about Medicare? Breaux-Thomas proposed various worthwhile ideas, like collapsing the archaic structure of Medicare (Parts A and B) into a single plan. But the most far-reaching ideas focused on replacing the present program with competing private plans. The federal government would then offer premium support to individuals, providing more subsidies for lower-income seniors than those with higher-incomes.

Premium support is mentioned in the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, but the idea is confined to a handful of demonstration projects starting in 2010. Writing on this page, former House Majority Leader Dick Armey observed: "I was in Congress long enough to know how demonstration projects really work. . . . On meaningful needed reforms, demonstration projects mean a quiet, obscure death."

There are, of course, other steps that must be taken to reform Medicare. The age of eligibility remains 65 -- just as it was 40 years ago when House Ways and Means Chairman Wilbur Mills helped ink the original legislation. Even social security changes its age of eligibility, albeit over the next two decades. We live longer and work longer than ever before -- shouldn't Medicare reflect that?

Medicare works on a pay-as-you-go basis, meaning that today's retirees depend on the financial support of today's taxpayers. With an aging population, the foundations are sinking. Some type of prefunding would be critically important. Indeed, the arguments made in favor of private accounts for social security are even stronger for Medicare reform, given that the unfunded liability is so much larger.

The White House is unlikely to touch prefunding again. Still, it would make sense is to finish the job started by Sen. Breaux and Rep. Thomas. Let's not forget that premium support won approval from a majority on a commission appointed by President Clinton.

In his State of the Union address three years ago, President Bush outlined sweeping changes to Medicare, suggesting that the program needed choice. He even alluded to the FEHBP when he suggested that seniors should have coverage "just like you -- the members of Congress, and your staff, and other federal employees." If the president is serious about taming rising health costs, he will use his second term to act on these words. In fact, the cool reception to his new prescription drug benefit may present an opportunity, since many seniors want the coverage but are hesitant on Plan D. Certainly a bold proposal will give Congress more to discuss than earmarks.

Protesters Sue For Speech Spot (WP)

By Karlyn Barker

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012209

Organizers planning a protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week say they have been denied a permit to hold the demonstration around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool because that area has been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of the speech.

The organizers of the Tuesday protest, called "World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime," say the National Park Service and the U.S. Capitol Police initially offered them the Capitol Reflecting Pool as a demonstration site but changed their minds.

Demonstrators have been told to confine their gathering to the gravel walkways on the Mall between Third and Fourth streets, farther from the Capitol. The grassy areas are fenced off because they are being resodded.

Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, said the restrictions effectively deny the protesters a meaningful public space to gather as a group. The nearest place to meet together, he said, is Seventh Street, about a mile from the Capitol.

"We are being told that turf renovation and security trump our First Amendment right to protest," he said.

Morales said the group was offered use of the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on Jan. 10 and that the site was not then part of any security perimeter. But on Jan. 19, he said, the group was told the security area had been expanded to include the Reflecting Pool.

He called the change "politically motivated," adding that the Bush administration "is trying to push us so far away that we can't be seen or heard. . . . A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest."

The demonstrators filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking a court order that would enable them to gather at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina will convene a hearing, possibly today.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Capitol Police declined to comment on Morales's allegations that politics played a part in the decision and would not say if the Capitol Reflecting Pool has been used in the past as a protest site.

"Many of the questions you are asking are security-related, so we can't comment on that," said Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, a public information officer with the agency.

Mara Verheyden-Hilliard, a lawyer with the Partnership for Civil Justice, said the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on the west side of the U.S. Capitol has historically been a site where demonstrators have staged protests.

"It's been used time and time again for major demonstrations and small demonstrations," she said. "It's been a critical location for First Amendment expressive activity for a long, long time."

James R. Klimaski, an attorney for the demonstrators, said protesters have been told they can't use the area because it would interfere with Bush's motorcade. But, Klimaski said, that portion of the Capitol grounds is normally used as a parking lot.

Klimaski said that other groups have previously held demonstrations on the east side of the Capitol during State of the Union addresses but that those areas are now off limits because of the construction of a new visitor center.

Morales said organizers of the Capitol Hill protest expect it to draw about 5,000 participants. The demonstration is one of several planned around the country. The group's Web site urges people to gather on the night of Bush's address to Congress and to "symbolically drown out" the president's speech with drums, pots and pans, and other noise.

He said organizers are trying to get a permit from D.C. police to close part of Third Street so they can rally there. The group said it does have a permit to hold a national demonstration against the Bush administration at the Ellipse on Feb. 4.

Moderate, Picked As Dems' Voice, Faces Liberal Outcry Governor To Respond To State Of The Union (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine lifted the Democratic Party's spirits last fall when he won in a conservative state and gave his fellow Democrats some ideas about how to replicate his success.

The fruits of victory include the honor of being picked to respond to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday — and the wrath of liberal bloggers wondering why Democrats didn't choose somebody else. Anybody else.

On the campaign trail, Kaine was “not at all bashful about talking about faith and values,” as he puts it, or about contrasting the successes of his state's popular Democratic leaders with the record of the Republican president and Congress.

He set “a leadership example for the rest of the country,” Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said when they named Kaine to give the party response on national TV.

Their pick — a Roman Catholic who opposes gay marriage — highlighted fault lines within the party. Bloggers on several liberal websites were furious for reasons including Kaine's looks, style and obscurity, his open talk about religion, his moderate positions and his inexperience in foreign affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0012210

"What the hell are they thinking?" Arianna Huffington demanded on www.huffingtonpost.com. In a post that drew 262 responses mostly echoing her irritation, she accused Democrats of choosing "someone whose only claim to fame is that he carried a red state" when they badly need to make the case that "the GOP is not the party that can best keep us safe."

Kaine is not planning to ignore Iraq, national security or what Democrats call the Republican "culture of corruption." But, he said, when he speaks from Richmond on his 17th day as governor, he won't throw red meat either.

In an interview Wednesday, Kaine said he insisted on writing his own speech. He said it will highlight results, bipartisanship and good management at the state level. He'll draw a contrast with "the partisan gridlock, corruption and back and forth" in Washington.

"Bad management at the federal level covers a litany of sins, and corruption is one of them," Kaine said. Others he might mention, he said, include problems with the Iraq war, the Katrina response and the Medicare prescription-drug program.

The overall message: "Results matter. Management is important. Management can be life or death."

Nathan Gonzales, an analyst for the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report, said anyone responding to a State of the Union speech is in a "futile" position, given the trappings of the main event. For Kaine the job is especially tough, he said, because "people don't have any idea who he is or what he's done."

Bloggers at dailykos.com, talkleft.com and other liberal sites showered cyberspace with alternatives: new faces — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer — and famous faces — Al Gore, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Rep. Rick Boucher, D-Va., said Kaine is a "brilliant" choice. He won rural and suburban support last fall, Boucher said, "the very constituents that Democrats need to … regain the House and the Senate."

Liberal writer Ezra Klein atezraklein.typepad.com was unimpressed. He called Kaine "a squat, squinty, pug-nosed fellow" with little oratorical skill.

Kaine addressed his appearance in a USA TODAY interview last fall. "I start with looks that appeal to the homely," he said. His press aide grew agitated, but Kaine reassured him: "Homely polls well."

DIRTY TRICKS (HP)

Huffington Post, January 26, 2006

Why is the White House desperately stonewalling requests to release information about Jack Abramoff's White House comings and goings? I mean, sure, the former uber-lobbyist has become the poster boy for the GOP's culture of corruption -- but it's not like he's been implicated in murder, right? Oh, wait a minute, he has -- the 2001 gangland-style murder of Gus Boulis, a Florida businessman involved in a disputed business deal with Abramoff and two of Abramoff's buddies from his College Republican days. Abramoff has denied any involvement in the murder, but the more you learn about his connection to the case, the more something smells fishy in Florida.

Dems Pick Villaraigosa To Rebut State Of Union, In Spanish (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats announced today that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will deliver the party's Spanish-language response to next week's State of the Union address

Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine will deliver the Democratic response in English from the governor's mansion in Richmond, Va., while Villaraigosa will do so in Spanish from his office in Los Angeles City Hall, said Sen. Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

The annual presidential address, before a joint session of Congress and a national audience, gives the chief executive the opportunity to lay out his agenda for the coming year.

Bush's speech will begin at 6 p.m. PST; the Democratic response generally begins about an hour later. The mayor's comments will be carried on Spanish-language networks.

This will be the third consecutive year that Democrats have offered a Spanish language response to Bush's speech.

Two years ago, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico delivered the first such response. Last year, it was jointly given by then Rep. Robert Menendez, now a senator from New Jersey, and Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico.

Bush began editing drafts of his speech yesterday. He is expected to propose an array of new initiatives, including allowing Americans to take tax deductions on more of their out-of-pocket medical expenses.

"We are proud to have Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa delivering the Spanish language response this year," Reid and Pelosi said in a joint statement issued in both languages.

DOJ_NMG_0012211

"Mayor Villaraigosa is working hard to increase economic opportunity and provide affordable and quality education for the people of Los Angeles. As the first Latino mayor of Los Angeles in more than a century, we are proud to have his diverse voice within the party," they said.

Prognosis Is Mixed For Health Savings (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

President Bush has made "consumer-directed" health savings plans a cornerstone of his policy for addressing runaway medical costs, and he plans to push them again in the State of the Union address next week. But so far there is little evidence that the approach is helping many consumers come to grips with the high price of health care.

In a way, the early results do offer some hope. More than two million people have signed up for the plans, which were created as part of Medicare overhaul legislation in 2003 but were not an option for many people until the health insurance sign-up season last fall. While that is a tiny fraction of the 180 million Americans with health insurance, some experts say the numbers show a notably fast adoption rate for a complicated new consumer program.

By other measures, though, workers and employers have been slow to embrace health savings plans, which are intended to reduce corporate health care costs while giving individuals more control of their medical spending.

In essence, health savings plans are high-deductible insurance policies that people can obtain through their employers or buy independently from insurance companies. In exchange for paying at least the first $1,050 of their medical expenses each year (or for families, a deductible of the first $2,100, consumers are supposed to benefit in two ways: lower monthly premiums and the ability to put pretax dollars into a savings account that grows tax-free.

Those savings, in theory, could be used toward the deductible in future years and help pay additional health bills not covered by the underlying insurance policy. As with a 401(k) retirement account, the health savings are the individual's to keep when changing employers — a portability feature that Bush administration officials like to cite.

But in many cases, people have evidently signed up not because they are eager to direct their own medical spending but because the plan looked cheap or they had no other insurance option. And at least half of those enrolled have not put money in their health savings accounts. So there will be no money building up for next year's out-of-pocket expenses — a big selling point for these health plans.

In addition, many employers have been slow to offer the plans. And companies that do so have been reluctant to encourage worker participation by contributing money to the savings accounts. The employers figure that "portability" means that their money will go out the door with workers who leave.

"That is our main concern," said Eric Airola, benefits director of J. B. Hunt Transport Services, a trucking company based in Lowell, Ark. "Turnover in the truckload industry as a whole is very high," he said.

As the plans were conceived, people using their own money could be expected to spend less on health care, switching to lower-cost drugs, for example, and adopting healthier lifestyles. Employers were promised savings as they shifted responsibility to workers for thousands of dollars in costs. Uninsured employees of small companies and self-employed people would be able to set aside pretax dollars for low-cost, limited coverage.

But for those who criticized the idea of health savings plans from the start, the early results simply confirm their gloomier forecasts. The critics say this approach is increasing many people's out-of-pocket expenses and warn that it will make them less likely to seek routine preventive care that might stave off bigger problems down the road.

Pat Schoeni, executive director of the National Coalition on Health Care, a group seeking better, more affordable medical care, said, "The savings accounts are not designed to help people pay for health care; they are designed to help employers unload their health care costs."

Mr. Bush, in his weekly radio talk last Saturday, said he would call on Congress in the State of the Union speech to make the plans "more available, more affordable and more portable." Among other steps, White House officials say, he will propose raising the tax-free contribution ceiling, which for 2006 is $2,700 for individuals and $5,450 for families.

Frank McArdle, a health policy expert in Washington for Hewitt Associates, the big benefits-consulting firm, predicted that "expanding health savings accounts to make them more attractive to employers and their people will be a hot issue in Congress this year."

For people with modest incomes who are hard put to save for medical needs or much else, raising the contribution limit may be a moot point. But for those who have the money to set aside, the savings accounts can be attractive.

Eric Kok, 32, a printing and packaging company manager in Lancaster, Pa., says he will put part of his pay this year into a tax-free health savings account. "Because I'm young, I'm still maxing out my 401(k)," he said of his retirement plan at the Banta Corporation. He calls that Step 1. "Step 2 is opening a health savings account and trying to put as much into it as possible."

DOJ_NMG_0012212

He and his wife, Susan, who has her own insurance from her employer, together have a six-figure income. Mr. Kok said that when he retires, he can use the health savings tax-free for care and for premiums in the company's retiree health plan. If he dies with a balance in the account, his survivors can inherit the money, as with a 401(k) account.

Stacy Ryan, the benefits manager at Banta, said the company saw the plan as "the new wave of health care." Banta added health savings accounts and eliminated company-subsidized health benefits for its 4,000 nonunion workers this year.

She said the health savings plan had already had "a huge impact" on employees' actions. They are "making better decisions, such as not going to the emergency room if it is not an emergency."

Based on the acceptance of health maintenance organizations in the 1980's, some industry analysts predict the pace of people signing up for the plans will continue to grow quickly. Forrester Research, a market research firm, projects that nearly 22 million people will have health savings plans by January 2008 — about 12 percent of those with insurance.

While nonunion employees of Banta have no insurance alternative, workers at large companies that still offer a choice have been slow to abandon coverage like H.M.O.'s and preferred-provider networks.

At I.B.M., only "a very small number" of employees have selected the health savings account option, according to Marianne E. DeFazio, the director of global health benefits, who declined to provide a specific figure. Industry experts estimated that 3 percent of I.B.M. employees had signed up for the savings plans, which the company has offered for the last two enrollment periods.

UnitedHealth Group, the largest provider of the savings plans, says that of the 24 million people insured under its various types of policies, 654,000 now have health savings plans. But so far, only about half have started setting aside money, a spokesman, Daryl Richard, said.

Among UnitedHealth's policy holders, a larger number — 846,000 — are still covered under an older type of policy that, like health savings plans, has low premiums and high annual deductibles. But instead of employees' setting aside money, the employer contributes to an account that gradually grows in value and is available for the employee to draw down for health expenses.

The money in these plans, known as health reimbursement accounts, reverts to the employer when workers leave their jobs. That is one reason some large employers are sticking with this older form of insurance.

Schneider National, a big trucking company in Green Bay, Wis., went further last year and chose such a plan as its only insurance option.

A happy beneficiary of Schneider's insurance plan is Lara Hobbs, 36, of Spring Hill, Fla. Ms. Hobbs, who drives 18-wheelers cross-country, has the liver disease hepatitis C. "It's terminal and deadly unless you cure it," said Ms. Hobbs, who is being treated with an expensive drug, a form of alpha interferon. "I've already been tested," she said. The hepatitis was not detectable. "They are hoping that I've beat it."

Last year, Schneider contributed $750 to Ms. Hobbs's health reimbursement account. She paid $1,500 more herself. But beyond that, her insurance covered 100 percent of weekly injections and six pills a day, whose total cost exceeded $50,000 — more than her annual income.

For Schneider, the first year was "pretty challenging," a spokeswoman, Janet Bonkowski, said. "There was a lot of learning that goes on. Our associates had to become much more involved and active in their care." But Schneider saved money and intends to continue the program, she said, though it is also considering whether to offer the savings plans.

At the White House, the deputy press secretary, Trent Duffy, said the president had no preference between the older health reimbursement plans and the new savings accounts he has been promoting.

But these days, Mr. Duffy said, people change jobs so frequently that they need a health plan they can take with them when they move. Mr. Bush, he said, believes "that the health care system that worked 30 or 40 years ago isn't working."

Bush's Cure-All For Health Care Sidesteps Big Ills (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

President Bush has found the cure for what ails the American health-care system.

"Do you realize the medical field is one where you don't do any comparative shopping," he told an audience last week. "When you buy tile ... for your house, you're out there shopping it. You ... say, 'Look, what am I bid?' When you're buying pipe or things you put in the wall ... you're out there bidding price."

"There's no transparency in pricing in medicine," he said. "You don't know whether the guy next [door] is going to offer a better deal."

DOJ_NMG_0012213

That's true. The issue is what to do about it. Mr. Bush's reply: Give Americans more skin in the health-care game so they'll be better shoppers. (That's what he means when he talks about health savings accounts and policies with large deductibles.) Make health care more like the market for tile and pipes, he argues, and Americans will get better health care for less.

Set aside the case that only a taxpayer-financed, government-organized solution works. A Republican president and Congress aren't going there, and a lot of Democrats are skeptical, too.

Instead, the U.S. is going to experiment with market forces to solve this problem: that Americans aren't getting their money's worth for the $1.9 trillion a year they spend on health care. For that sum, we ought to have more equitable access to health care and have healthier people. Politicians too often boast the U.S. has the best health-care system in the world, marvel at medical technology -- and then fail to ask if we should be getting more, given what we spend.

In the 1990s, the U.S. focused market weaponry on providers, not patients. Managed care was about giving groups of health-care providers a flat sum, thus giving them incentives to do what was necessary to keep patients healthy and costs down, rather than underpaying for preventive care and paying up each time a patient showed up ill. Forcing managed-care outfits to compete for patients was supposed to stop them from skimping on care.

Americans tasted that and spit it out. The 2000s "pay for performance" version, one Medicare is toying with, is to pay doctors and hospitals not for how much care they give but rather for how well they care for patients.

Mr. Bush, by contrast, is talking about using market forces to influence individuals, not providers. He reasons that if Americans had to pay more out of their pockets, perhaps with money that employers or government hands them, they'd use health care more judiciously. And if Americans were better shoppers, health-care providers would compete much as cellphone companies and auto makers do -- to the benefit of consumers.

Implicit in this approach is the notion that Americans use too much health care. So, make them pay for unnecessary emergency-room visits or the costlier one-a-day antibiotic instead of the generic, and they'll spend less. That's a sound idea. It may save the system some money by eliminating the cost of processing small claims for essentially healthy people. But is avoiding the emergency room the big problem that needs solving?

Not Really. A bigger problem is that too many healthy (for now) Americans go without preventive care, and too many chronically ill Americans don't get care that would avoid costly, painful complications later. HSAs don't help there. And then there's the uncomfortable fact that 80% of health spending in the U.S. each year is spent on 8% of the population. Giving them tax breaks to buy health-insurance policies with $2,000 deductibles won't ensure that money is well spent.

"HSAs aren't a way of responding to the very sick people who are responsible for the bulk of health-care spending," says James Robinson, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley.

Is moving to "empower the individual" appropriate to health care? In part, it is. Doctors, hospitals and insurers need a nudge to think of us more as customers than they sometimes do. But choosing floor tile is easier than distinguishing between a headache caused by stress and a headache caused by a brain tumor. The costs of a mistaken decision to avoid a doctor visit are greater than choosing the wrong cellphone plan.

Well-functioning markets require consumers with enough information to make sound choices. That doesn't yet describe health care. "It's going to take a lot of effort to get us to the point where we're confident that using the market is going to improve care, rather than make it worse," says Elliott Fisher, a Dartmouth Medical School professor.

Talking about health care on the national stage is better than not talking about it. But let's clearly define the problem so we devise the right solutions.

The Fix-It Myth (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Almost everyone agrees that we ought to "fix the health care system" -- a completely meaningless phrase despite its popularity with politicians, pundits and "experts." Indeed, it is popular precisely because it is meaningless. The people who proclaim it rarely tell you the discomforting choices it might involve. Instead, they focus on a few specific shortcomings of our $1.9 trillion health-industrial complex and imply that, if we correct these often serious flaws, we'll have "fixed" the system or at least made a good start. This is rarely true, and so most forays into "health reform" end with disillusion.

We are about to start the cycle again. By most accounts, President Bush plans to highlight health care in his forthcoming State of the Union address. His proposals may or may not have merit, but they surely won't fix the health system in any fundamental way. The reason is that most Americans don't want to fix the system in that sense. Most are satisfied with their care. Most don't see (or directly pay) the vast majority of their costs. Because politicians -- of both parties -- reflect public opinion, they won't do more than tinker.

DOJ_NMG_0012214

Unfortunately, tinkering isn't enough. As everyone knows, health care spending has risen steadily. In 2004, it totaled 16 percent of national income, up from 7.2 percent in 1970. Spending will continue to rise, if for no other reasons than that the population is aging and the average annual health costs for someone 65 and older ($7,910 in 2003) are -- surprise -- more than twice those for someone 35 to 54 ($2,966). As health insurance becomes more costly, the number of uninsured, now about 46 million, may grow. Worse, health costs may depress wage gains, raise taxes and squeeze other government programs.

Here's the paradox: A health care system that satisfies most of us as individuals may hurt us as a society. Let me offer myself as an example. All my doctors are in small practices. I like it that way. It seems to make for closer personal connections. But I'm always stunned by how many people they employ for nonmedical chores -- appointments, recordkeeping, insurance collections. A bigger practice, though more impersonal, might be more efficient. Because insurance covers most of my medical bills, though, I don't have any stake in switching.

On a grander scale, that's our predicament. Americans generally want their health care system to do three things: (1) provide needed care to all people, regardless of income; (2) maintain our freedom to pick doctors and their freedom to recommend the best care for us; and (3) control costs. The trouble is that these laudable goals aren't compatible. We can have any two of them, but not all three. Everyone can get care with complete choice -- but costs will explode, because patients and doctors have no reason to control them. We can control costs but only by denying care or limiting choices.

Disliking the inconsistencies, we hide them -- to individuals. We subsidize employer-paid health insurance by excluding it from income taxes (the 2006 cost to government: an estimated $126 billion). Most workers don't see the full costs of their health care; a reported Bush proposal to add new tax subsidies would magnify the effect. A similar blindness applies to Medicare recipients, whose costs are paid mainly by other people's payroll taxes. Despite complaints about rising co-payments and deductibles, out-of-pocket costs are still falling as a share of all health spending. In 2004, they were 12.5 percent; in 1993, they were 15.8 percent.

We're living in a fantasy world. Given our inconsistent expectations, no health care system -- not one completely run by government or one following "market" principles -- can satisfy public opinion. Politicians and pundits can score cheap points by emphasizing one goal or another (insure the uninsured, cover drugs for Medicare recipients, expand "choice") without facing the harder job: finding a better balance among competing goals.

Every attempt to do so has failed. Consider the "managed care" experiment of the 1990s. The idea was simple: Herd patients into health maintenance organizations or large physician networks; impose "best practices" on doctors and patients to encourage preventive medicine and eliminate wasteful spending; and cut costs through administrative economies. For a while, it seemed to work. From 1993 to 1997, private insurance premiums rose only 2.6 percent annually. But managed care upset doctors and patients. It restricted personal choice. Some coverage denials seemed inhumane or inept. After a political backlash, managed-care organizations relaxed cost controls.

Now, some say that because the "market" has failed, greater government control is the answer. Private insurance has high overhead costs and generates too much paperwork. True. Still, there's not much evidence that over long periods government controls health spending any better. From 1970 to 2003, Medicare spending rose an average of 9 percent annually, reports the Kaiser Family Foundation. In the same years, private insurance costs rose 10.1 percent annually. Part of the gap reflected private insurance's greater generosity. It covered drugs while Medicare didn't.

Americans want more health care for less money, and when they don't get it, they indict drug companies, insurers, trial lawyers and bureaucrats. Although these familiar scapegoats may not be blameless, the real problem is us. We demand the impossible. The changes we truly need are political. We need to reconnect people with the public consequences of their private acts. We should curb the subsidization of private insurance. Medicare recipients, especially wealthier ones, should pay more of their bills. But these changes won't happen because people don't want to see the costs. We don't have the health care system we need, but we do have the one we deserve.

Drug Benefit Suffers Side Effects (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Administration officials yesterday told senators the new Medicare prescription-drug program has problems, but they're under control, and states will be reimbursed for covering seniors' prescription costs resulting from the glitches.

Senators on the Finance Committee seemed cautiously optimistic at the assurances, but some said Congress will still probably need to act.

"I think there's no question that the issue of prescription drugs will be back on the [Senate] floor in some form this year," said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0012215

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday, "We've identified the problems, we're working on them and the plan gets better every day."

He and Medicare chief Mark McClellan had a private meeting yesterday with committee members to brief them on the situation.

Since the new Medicare drug program began three weeks ago, enrollment problems have left many seniors without coverage, and more than 20 states stepped in to cover costs. Low-income seniors had the most trouble, as the government worked to automatically transfer them from Medicaid drug coverage to the new Medicare program.

Mr. McClellan said states should first seek reimbursement from private plans offering the drug coverage, but the government will reimburse the states for any difference. The total price tag isn't clear yet.

"The good news is the administration does admit there's problems," said Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat and the Finance Committee's ranking member, who will work with committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, to "nail down" a timeline for reimbursement. He said that if he's not satisfied with the reimbursement plan, "then I think legislation will be much more likely."

He also said some seniors are paying co-payments they shouldn't.

Mr. Grassley said he'll follow up with a public hearing on the new program, but he's satisfied Mr. Leavitt has it "under control."

"They've identified problems very well ... and I feel they're making good progress," he said.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, Maine Republican, said officials are "making good-faith efforts," and reimbursement legislation "may not be necessary."

But she and other senators are ready with a bill that would reimburse the states, cut the wait time for seniors who call the Medicare hot line and make other changes.

Today, top Senate Democrats will demand President Bush make immediate changes to fix the program.

Mrs. Snowe said legislation may be required to extend the mid-May deadline seniors face for choosing their new drug plan. Mr. Grassley said that will be decided closer to May.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said he worried the administration will "leave the states holding the bag" on the reimbursement issue.

"We have to monitor very carefully," Mr. Schumer said.

Caution Urged For Executives Seeking Spots On Nonprofit Boards (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, January 26, 2006

Agencies should be careful about allowing employees to serve on the boards of nonprofit organizations that have an interest in their work, according to a recent opinion published by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel.

Federal executives can serve as officers or directors at nonprofit organizations, a 19-page opinion released Jan. 11 stated. But agencies should take into account the appearance of an ethical violation before permitting employees to serve in a group that handles issues related to their government work.

"Government employees [have a] . . . duty to 'avoid any actions creating the appearance that they are violating the law ... or ethical standards,' " the Justice office's opinion said.

"If an outside organization in which an employee is a director has been advocating its views directly to the federal government on a matter that the organization has identified as especially significant, there is a significantly heightened risk that the employee ... will at least appear less than independent in his judgments," the legal counsel stated. "And that risk ... calls for serious consideration by the employee's agency."

Federal law requires government employees to recuse themselves from work activities when a nonprofit on which they serve has a financial interest in the matter. But just because nonprofits spend money advocating a position does not necessarily mean they have a financial interest in an agency action, according to the opinion.

The case leading to the opinion originated in July 2004 when a senior executive at the Education Department was told by the Office of Government Ethics that election to the Senior Executives Association board of directors would result in a criminal conflict of interest due to his service on his department's Executive Resources Board.

An executive resources panel, among other things, makes recommendations on the senior executive pay system to the Office of Personnel Management. The SEA is a nonprofit professional association that advocates in the interest of career federal executives.

According to SEA President Carol Bonosaro, the association appealed the case in August 2004 and is pleased with the Office of Legal Counsel's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0012216

"Employees who want to serve on boards like this should not have to worry about being charged under a criminal statute," Bonosaro said. "To us, [the opinion] essentially puts the matter to rest. It's up to the agencies, where individual decisions will be made by ethics officers."

Bonosaro said that since the opinion was released, a federal executive was approved by his agency's ethics officer to serve on the SEA board, which has 15 members serving staggered three-year terms.

The Office of Government Ethics' verbal opinion had made several members of the association hesitant about running for a board of director position because they didn't want to put themselves at risk, according to Bonosaro.

Had the 2004 opinion been permitted to stand, it could have eliminated some federal employees not only from consideration for the SEA board but for the boards of other organizations, such as the International Personnel Management Association or the American Society of Public Administration, according to Bonosaro.

Bonosaro said the decision was a long time in coming and added that the association's lawyers are working to issue a statement carefully laying out what the appearance standard means.

"Appearance is often in the eye of the beholder," Bonosaro said.

The Justice opinion also addresses a situation where National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration employees were serving as councilors of the American Meteorological Society, a position equivalent to a member of a board of directors.

Despite the fact that the society spent money advocating positions on matters such as hurricane research, the opinion found that the organization did not have a financial interest in the matter and NOAA employees could serve with the group.

The American Meteorological Society did not return calls for comment and NOAA was not able to comment in time for publication of this article.

Senators Debate Details Of Lobbying Rules (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — After weeks of calls for restrictions on how lobbyists influence Congress, lawmakers began Wednesday to grapple with the thorny details of just how to do it.

At the first congressional hearing on revamping the rules, lobbyists argued against proposals to ban privately financed trips for House and Senate members and their aides, saying travel helps them make good policy decisions in an era of globalization.

Some senators rejected calls for more restrictions, saying problems illustrated by the scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff are rooted in lawmakers' own behavior, the way Congress operates and a failure to enforce rules already on the books.

“I don't believe lobby reform is the problem. Congress is,” said Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., a member of the Senate's governmental affairs committee.

At the same time, Senate leaders clashed over how to go about writing the new rules. Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., proposed a bipartisan task force to handle the job. Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., rejected the idea, saying the legislation should be drafted through the Senate's regular committees.

At the hearing, former senator Dick Clark, D-Iowa, who runs educational trips for members of Congress through the non-profit Aspen Institute, said a total ban on privately sponsored travel would be “foolhardy.”

He said his group, which has sponsored more than $3.5 million in trips since 2000, accepts only foundation funds and does not allow lobbyist participation. That should be the standard for future trips, he said.

Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins said drawing distinctions among groups that sponsor travel would be difficult. Many non-profits that sponsor travel are backed by interests that lobby Congress, and their boards are heavily sprinkled with lobbyists.

“Today, lobbying too often conjures up images of all-expense-paid vacations masquerading as fact-finding trips,” the Maine Republican said.

There is broad agreement on Capitol Hill for greater disclosure of lobbyists' activities, limits on gifts and travel paid for by special interests, and a longer “cooling-off period” — currently one year — before members of Congress and staff who take lobbying jobs can lobby their former colleagues.

Contentious proposals also are on the agenda, including limiting lobbyists' ability to raise campaign funds for lawmakers, banning or limiting the use of corporate aircraft for lawmakers' travel, and making it tougher for members of the House and Senate to “earmark” tax dollars for pet projects.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said corruption stems from the growing cost of campaigns and the constant chase to raise funds for re-election. He proposed limiting members of Congress to raising money only from their home states, and not from Washington lobbyists. In the House, Reps. David Obey, D-Wis., and Barney Frank, D-Mass., proposed a new system to publicly finance congressional elections.

DOJ_NMG_0012217

For Would-Be Lobbying Reformers, Money Habit Is Hard To Kick (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Paul Miller had the bad luck to ascend to the presidency of the American League of Lobbyists just as Jack Abramoff was descending from the profession. And so it was that the young and earnest Wisconsinite found himself before the Senate governmental affairs committee yesterday explaining why "this is not a widespread scandal."

"Our government is not corrupt, lobbyists are not bribing people, and members of Congress are not being bought for campaign contributions," pleaded Miller, wearing a boyish hairdo and the gray pinstripe suit, French-blue shirt and wingtips of his profession. "I don't think we can say with certainty that the current system is broken."

To the Abramoff-panicked lawmakers, Miller might as well have been asserting the airworthiness of pigs.

Miller and his cohort -- the ones in the gallery with the leather portfolios -- were about the only ones in the room who thought everything was hunky-dory. The senators seemed virtually unanimous in their view that, when it came to influence peddling, "the status quo stinks," as Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the recipient of more than $2 million from lobbyists and lawyers in recent years, succinctly put it.

As the hearing kicked off the congressional debate on lobbying reform, the lawmakers had no difficulty conceding they had a problem. But there was yawning disconnect between the problem and the proposed remedies. While most everybody agreed that Congress was being subverted by lawmakers' reliance on lobbyists for campaign cash, the proposals getting the most serious consideration yesterday were relatively minor: whether to ban lobbyist-paid lunches or a few million dollars' worth of privately funded congressional trips.

"I don't believe lobbying reform's the problem; I believe Congress is," committee dissident Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) lectured his colleagues. "We ought to be real frank with the American people. We're going to do a lot of window dressing, but in the long run we're not going to change anything till we change the motivation that the next election is more important than anything else."

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, found himself in a rare convergence with Coburn. "We are carping on trifles here," he testified. "Why is it that we warm up to all these lobbyists? It isn't for a meal. . . . We know when it comes time to finance our campaigns, we're going to be knocking on those same doors."

Registered lobbyists have served as treasurers of at least 868 political committees, according to the Center for Public Integrity, including the campaign committees or leadership PACs of at least 39 sitting members of Congress. And virtually all members benefit from lavish fundraisers arranged by lobbyists or contributions from lobbyists that have exceeded $100 million in recent years. This money frightens challengers out of the race -- a main reason 98 percent of incumbent House members won reelection in 2004.

The senators yesterday sounded like addicts, powerless to overcome their reliance on lobbyist cash. "It's out of control," lamented Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), a recipient of $573,000 from lobbyists and lawyers over five years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. "We all hate it. And it's about time we collectively think about how we can get off the treadmill."

"I'm afraid nobody will take me seriously unless we can also find some way to do something further about campaign spending and fundraising," fretted Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.), recipient of $314,000.

New Mexico Republican Pete V. Domenici ($196,000) proposed limiting fundraising to a lawmaker's home state. Alaska Republican Ted Stevens ($229,000) suggested a constitutional amendment.

But these cries for help fell on the deaf ears of Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the man designated by Senate GOP leadership to draft a lobbying reform bill. Santorum, in a tough reelection race, ranked fifth out of the 535 members of Congress in receipts from lobbyists and lawyers ($519,000 last year alone).

"We need to look at a variety of different things -- look at gifts, we need to look at meals, we need to look at travel," Santorum testified. He didn't say a peep about campaign financing.

Instead, he delivered a campaign speech. "I have a long history of being involved in congressional reform," he said, boasting that "those of you who frequent the Senate restaurant and barbershops now know that they are no longer taxpayer-subsidized."

If Santorum's presentation lacked details, it didn't seem to matter. Only two of the 16 senators on the committee sat through the entire hearing. National Association of Manufacturers chief John Engler, missing when called to the witness table, explained later that he had been taking "a quick break."

Engler, like Miller, assured the nervous lawmakers that all was well. "Additional rules and laws weren't needed" to catch the bad guys, he advised. And besides, he said, "working meals" are legitimate. "A hamburger, I don't think, is going to change the mind of members of this committee."

DOJ_NMG_0012218

Engler didn't say what might happen if that hamburger came with a side of campaign cash.

Senators Say Ethics Issue Goes Beyond Lobbying Reform (GFH)

By Jim Abrams

The Grand Forks Herald, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Members of Congress must look at their own behavior as well as lobbyists' if they are to regain the trust of the American public, senators said Wednesday.

At the same time, lobbyists and those who sponsor trips for lawmakers warned against overreacting to the headlines on the influence peddling activities of Jack Abramoff. In particular, they said, banning all privately funded travel could isolate lawmakers from the knowledge they need to write law.

What's clear, said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chair of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, is that Congress can't tackle the big issues facing the nation without the trust of the public. "And the public's trust in Congress is perilously low."

"Frankly, the status quo stinks and cries out for us to clear the air," Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's top Democrat, said at the first hearing following the Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Leaders from both parties in both chambers have promoted measures to tighten rules and laws governing lawmaker contacts with lobbyists. There are several common themes: restricting or banning the giving of gifts to lawmakers, prohibiting lobbyists from arranging or funding trips, lengthening the time between when a lawmaker leaves office and takes a job as a lobbyist and requiring greater disclosure of lobbyist activities.

But speakers at the hearing also said members of Congress must look at how they do business and get elected, larger issues that could complicate quick passage of the first lobbying reform bill in a decade.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., co-sponsor of one of the major lobbying bills, said Congress must tackle the problem of earmarks, special interest projects that get inserted in larger pieces of legislation, often with the help of lobbyists. "We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks," he said. "It's disgraceful, this process."

Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., who is preparing legislation at the behest of the Senate GOP leadership, said his bill might also look at spending by tax-exempt partisan groups known as 527s, a touchy subject because Democrats relied heavily on such groups in the last election.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., also noted, in a broader sense, that Congress must look at how lawmakers finance their political campaigns. "Unless and until we address this in an honest fashion, we are carping on trifles here."

In the House on Wednesday, Democrats David Obey of Wisconsin and Barney Frank of Massachusetts said they would introduce legislation to eliminate all private money for House elections, turning instead to public financing. "The problem with politics is more fundamental than meals or trips with lobbyists," Obey said in a statement.

Taking a different approach, Sens. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., Wayne Allard, R-Colo., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., unveiled a plan to create an independent commission, similar to the 9/11 Commission, to recommend ethics reforms. "What is at stake here is clearly the credibility of the institution," Coleman said at the hearing.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., separately wrote Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., asking him to join in establishing a bipartisan Senate lobbying reform task force to explore the various proposals.

Reid, who has linked the lobbying scandal to GOP control of Congress, declined. "We don't need a task force to study what's wrong. We know what's wrong," he said at a news conference.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, urged Congress not to respond to the actions of a "few unscrupulous operatives" by impeding the rights of citizens, including lobbyists, to petition Congress and keep members of Congress informed.

John Engler, former governor of Michigan and current head of the National Association of Manufacturers, told the panel that the current system was working, noting that a lobbyist was going to jail and a member of Congress was going to be sentenced. He was apparently referring to Abramoff and former Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., who recently pleaded guilty to bribery.

"Whatever occurs, I think it is imperative that you do not overreact," he said.

Dick Clark, a former senator from Iowa who established the Aspen Institute program for Congress, said it was right for Congress to reject lobbyist involvement in trips. But a total ban on privately funded travel "would be a disservice to members of Congress," he said.

Aspen arranges seminars both inside the country and around the world where members of Congress are required to attend conferences that last six hours a day over four days. It does not pay for recreational activities.

"Foreign travel is essential in an era of globalization," he said. "Insularity is not an option for the world's only superpower."

McCain Calls To Reform Pork Barrel Politics (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

A Senate committee reviewing proposals to reform lobbying today heard calls for Congress to reform its pork barrel politics by ending the practice of quietly adding pet projects known as "earmarks" to appropriations bills.

Appearing as a witness on the opening day of a Senate hearing on lobbying reform, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) was one of several senators to denounce earmarking, a practice he called "disgraceful." He outlined one of several proposals to tighten rules and require greater disclosure of lobbying activities. But he told the committee, "We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks."

McCain made the comments before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, which convened to discuss lobbying reform proposals amid a scandal surrounding the activities of Jack Abramoff, a once-powerful Republican lobbyist. Abramoff pleaded guilty earlier this month to federal charges including bribery of a congressman. His cooperation with investigators as part of a plea deal has stoked concerns on Capitol Hill that other legislators could be implicated, and Congress has responded with a flurry of legislative proposals to reform the system.

However, representatives of lobbying organizations urged the committee today not to overreact to what they described as the unscrupulous activities of one corrupt lobbyist.

And Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), the Senate minority whip, said the problem goes beyond earmarks and that solving it must start with reducing the "outrageous expense" of political campaigns.

The chairman of the committee, Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Me.), said the actions of Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Fla.), who resigned from the House in November after pleading guilty in a separate case to federal bribery and fraud charges, "have prompted a much-needed review of legal lobbying activities that raise questions of improper influence."

As part of reform efforts, she said, "We must end the practice of allowing members to slip earmarks that have received neither scrutiny nor a vote in either the House or the Senate into the final versions of legislation."

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the top Democrat on the committee, said he and McCain have proposed legislation -- the Bipartisan Lobbying Transparency and Accountability Act of 2005 -- that would require more frequent and detailed disclosure of lobbying activities "and, for the first time, full disclosure from grassroots lobbying firms paid to conduct mass television or direct mail campaigns to influence members of Congress." One such firm was used by Abramoff to conceal millions of dollars in payments that he received from overcharging Indian tribes, Lieberman said.

Other lobbying reform bills have been introduced by Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the Senate minority leader, and by Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.). Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is separately working on lobbying reform legislation on behalf of the Senate GOP leadership.

Lieberman said differences among the proposals are "reconcilable" and that "we now have a once-in-a-generation opportunity to reach agreement on a broad set of lobbying reforms that will reduce the cynicism" of many Americans toward their government. "Frankly, the status quo stinks," he said.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) backed the call to end earmarking, saying, "The problem is us." In the long run, he said, "we're not going to change anything 'til we change the motivation that the next election is more important than anything else."

McCain said his reform bill, among other things, requires lobbyists to disclose their involvement in congressional travel and report gifts worth more than $20. Members of Congress would be required to pay the fair market value of charter flights for travel on private airplanes and would have to file reports of meetings, tours, events or outings in which they participated while on official travel.

McCain also said that "if we don't stop the earmarking, we're not going to stop the abuses of power here in Washington." He suggested that his own party was largely responsible.

"In 1994, when the Congress was taken over by Republicans, there were 4,000 earmarks on appropriations bills," he told the committee. "Last year there were 15,000. It's disgraceful, this process."

McCain said he was especially bothered that at the end of the last congressional session, various extraneous appropriations were "larded onto the money that was supposed to be devoted to the men and women in the military and their ability to conduct the war on terror."

Citizens Against Government Waste, a fiscal watchdog group, estimates that earmarks last year cost taxpayers $27.3 billion, up from $10.1 billion in 1995, the year that Republicans took office as the majority in Congress.

McCain, who uses a broader definition of earmarks, calculates that the pork barrel projects amounted to $47 billion last year.

DOJ_NMG_0012220

In testimony to the committee, lobbyists stressed that the practice of petitioning the government is protected by the Constitution.

Dick Clark, a former Democratic senator from Iowa who now heads the Aspen Institute's congressional program, expressed support for some reforms on congressional travel. "However, a total ban on privately funded travel would be a disservice to members of Congress," he said in prepared testimony.

John Engler, a former Republican governor of Michigan who now is president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said, "Whatever occurs, it is imperative that you do not overreact."

Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, told the committee, "Members of our profession are as disgusted and appalled by what Mr. Abramoff has done as you are. But we should not allow the actions of a few unscrupulous operatives to paint our entire profession as 'crooks' or unscrupulous scoundrels who will stop at nothing to have their way with members of Congress."

Miller added in his prepared testimony: "Our government is not 'corrupt.' Lobbyists are not 'bribing' people; and members of Congress are not being 'bought' for campaign contributions. One man broke the law by lying, cheating and stealing from his clients. Unfortunately, he was a lobbyist."

He said he wanted to assure the panel that Abramoff was "not the norm in our profession," but "truly the exception." Any profession has "bad apples" no matter what rules are in place, he said.

"Unfortunately, we often find our bad apples on the front page of every newspaper, because frankly, scandal sells," Miller said.

Earmark Reform Requires Oversight And Accountability (RC)

By Rep. Jerry Lewis

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

In the early morning hours, in a remote tribal area of Afghanistan, a gathering of al Qaeda leaders is interrupted by the explosions of Hellfire missiles launched from a Predator unmanned aerial vehicle. The UAV has become one of the most effective weapons in the global war against terrorism. Its development came not from war planners within the Pentagon, but from a Congressional earmark.

Some have suggested that Congressional earmarking should be eliminated. But this course of action cedes to the executive branch Congress' Constitutionally based spending prerogatives.

The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency. Teach for America, The Points of Light Foundation, and America's Promise are just a few examples of unauthorized, limited-scope initiatives that routinely receive a line-item request in the president's budget. Yet elected representatives know more about local, state or national priorities than the Beltway bureaucracy. It would be a mistake to ignore this expertise when determining how to allocate scarce federal dollars.

Another misguided proposal would give Member project funding the force of law by requiring all earmarks to be listed in statute. This would eliminate a federal agency's flexibility in allocating federal spending, particularly in time of national emergency or crisis, while doing nothing to improve the transparency and accountability of the appropriations process. Thoughtful, timely and orderly consideration of individual appropriations bills would be replaced by partisan one-upmanship. The increased delays would make it inevitable that Congress would revert to the fiscal mischief fostered by wrapping these bills into a massive end-of-session omnibus.

In 2005, House Republicans began taking tangible steps to restore accountability, increase transparency and reform the annual budget process. But few outside of Congress have taken notice of the considerable progress that's been made over the past year.

We reduced non-security discretionary spending for the first time since the Reagan administration, eliminating 53 low-priority programs and saving taxpayers more than $3.5 billion. We got our work done on time: The House passed all 11 individual appropriations bills by June 30, the earliest that each of the bills has been passed in 18 years. We reduced Congressional spending on Member requested projects by more than $3 billion.

Most importantly, this progress set the stage for an even larger success: eliminating, for the first time in years, a massive, year-end, omnibus spending bill. Just one year earlier, Congress wrapped nine appropriations bills into one colossal, 3,500-page spending package.

Though it's been less noticed, the committee also has taken positive steps toward strengthening transparency of the appropriations process by Webcasting all full-committee markups, requiring open House-Senate Conference Committee sessions and making Appropriations Committee conference reports publicly available at least one day prior to House consideration. Important progress was also made to ensure that an unprecedented degree of oversight is provided for taxpayer dollars spent on federal programs as well as necessary hurricane relief on the Gulf Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0012221

These are critical first steps to reforming the budget process and restoring confidence in Congress. Unfortunately, this solid record of reform has been largely overshadowed by the criminal, self-serving actions of a few individuals who violated both the public trust and the law.

The next step involves further curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and making the appropriations process more open and transparent. In order to succeed, the House and Senate must jointly embrace these efforts. Specifically, the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee recommends the following:

1) Sharply limit the number of Member project requests. Curtailing the number of Member requests per Appropriations subcommittee would dramatically improve oversight and lead to a reduction of earmarks. Last year, the House Appropriations Committee received nearly 35,000 individual project requests. In the Labor-HHS appropriations bill, 417 Members requested 10,272 projects, or nearly 25 per Member.

2) Require increased accountability, disclosure and transparency by requiring that Member request letters be made public prior to House consideration of each appropriations bill. These letters would be provided by the Members' offices to the Clerk of the House and printed in the Congressional Record.

3) Require that all project requests be submitted in writing to the appropriations subcommittee of jurisdiction via a Member-signed request letter or form.

4) Establish clearly defined criteria for all project requests and require Members to specify how each project meets the criteria. Member requests would also be required to be strictly germane to the spending bills in which they are contained.

5) Increase the proportion of projects that have a dollar-matching requirement. Economic development initiative grants from the Department of Housing and Urban Development are among those that ought to be considered for a local matching requirement.

6) Require all Congressionally approved projects to go through a formal executive branch contracting and auditing process.

7) Finally, require that all other committees adopt similar earmarking reforms. Earmarks are not unique to the House Appropriations Committee. The most notable earmark in recent history — the "Bridge to Nowhere" — had its origins elsewhere.

Senators Want Outsiders For Ethics Overhaul (LAT)

By Mary Curtius, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Convinced that Congress cannot overhaul its rules on ethics and lobbying in the politically charged atmosphere of an election year, two senators called Wednesday for the creation of an independent commission to do the job.

Sens. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said an outside panel was more likely to come up with a sweeping package of changes than a Congress riven by partisanship.

But their proposal faced quick resistance from two senators leading the reform push — Democrat Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Republican John McCain of Arizona. They have proposed legislation that would require lobbyists to provide more detailed reports about their contacts with lawmakers and other business activities.

Both said Wednesday that they feared creating an independent commission and that waiting for it to act would slow the momentum for change that had been building since former lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty this month to corruption charges.

"I don't want to wait," McCain told reporters. "We've got to act quickly."

The call for an independent panel also was likely to face opposition from Senate veterans who zealously guard the institution's prerogatives and are loath to allow outsiders to help drive its decision-making.

The commission proposal and the hurdles to it underscore the difficulties lawmakers face as they attempt to rewrite the guidelines that govern the dealings between themselves and lobbyists.

Proposals for tightening ethics and lobbying rules have proliferated in the House and Senate. They include measures that would ban trips by lawmakers and their aides that are financed by outside groups. GOP leaders of both chambers have vowed to push through an overhaul by the middle of the year.

Some members of Congress say the packages go too far, arguing the efforts to rein in travel would prevent them from getting firsthand information about domestic and international problems.

Others complain the reform proposals fail to address what they say are the roots of the problem spotlighted by the Abramoff case — private funding of campaigns and the common practice of lawmakers inserting money for pet projects and programs into government spending bills. Lobbyists offer help to lawmakers on both fronts.

DOJ_NMG_0012222

Coleman said he believed the creation of an independent commission offered the best hope for Congress to grapple with such issues and to "overcome the stain" caused by the Abramoff scandal.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) said he supported the idea because it would provide "a whole lot more credibility" to the reform process.

Only by bringing in outsiders to make recommendations, he said, could Capitol Hill achieve "real reform based not on political reaction but on what is best for the institution and best for the republic."

The proposal received no support from Senate leaders in either party, who engaged in their own squabble about how to proceed with carrying out reforms.

Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) offered to create a bipartisan task force with equal numbers of Democratic and Republican senators to rewrite ethics and lobbying rules — a proposal quickly rejected by Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Such a task force, Reid spokesman Jim Manley said, would hamper the process. "Legislating is hard work," Manley said. "We know what the problem is and we know what needs to be done. We should just do it."

Coleman and Nelson said the independent panel they wanted would be modeled on the commission appointed after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to investigate failings by the U.S. intelligence community. That panel, divided evenly between Democrats and Republicans, produced a report that spurred Congress to restructure the workings of intelligence-gathering agencies.

But former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission, noted that lawmakers rebuffed the panel's recommendations for reorganizing congressional oversight of the intelligence community.

"They didn't pay any attention to us at all," Hamilton said. "They reformed the executive branch, but on the whole question of robust oversight they just totally ignored those recommendations."

Hamilton, who served on the House Ethics Committee, said he believed Congress was incapable of policing itself. He advocates the creation of a permanent, independent commission to oversee congressional ethics, a proposal supported by some watchdog groups.

To be effective, Hamilton added, the commission would "have the power to initiate investigations, hold hearings, hear complaints and … make recommendations about punishment."

Lobby Battle Splitting Parties (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

House Democratic leaders are preparing to offer the toughest lobbying reform package yet, with a measure that would in some ways be more stringent than other bills offered so far.

On Wednesday, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.) circulated principles of the plan to their Democratic colleagues and asked for their support. Included in the measure will be provisions that force lawmakers to report when they are sponsoring earmarks, require them to pay fair market value for travel on private jets and create an office of public integrity to oversee these and other new lobbying rules.

Details of the plan emerged after a day in which lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol traded barbs, with each party claiming to want a bipartisan solution, but finding no partner across the aisle. Though the House isn't even in session yet, both chambers of Congress have been absorbed this month by responding to the scandal involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Meanwhile, momentum appears to be growing for reforming the earmarking process. Beyond the new disclosure requirement House Democrats are planning to push, several GOP Senators on Wednesday expressed support for cracking down on the practice. And in an op-ed in today's issue of Roll Call, the spending chief of the House, Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), laid out a plan for cleaning up the budget process (see Guest Observer, p. 8).

"The next step involves further curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and make the appropriations process more open and transparent," Lewis wrote.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is trying to round up as much bipartisan support as possible for his own plan, said he is adamant that some form of earmark reform be included in the bill as a way to get at the "root cause" of lobbyist corruption. "I'm going to fight as hard as I can to get it in," said McCain, who added Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) to his plan Wednesday.

Sen. Bob Bennett (Utah), a member of both the GOP leadership and the Appropriations Committee, expressed support for more "transparency" in lobbying reform, but he did not endorse a broad prohibition on earmarks. Bennett said he would support the idea of each earmark being identified with its sponsor and that each one appear in the Congressional Record.

Wednesday's action kicked off in the Senate, where the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee convened in the morning for its first look at the lobbying reform proposals offered so far. At that event, bipartisanship was the buzzword, as Senators from both parties insisted that only cooperation would yield a solid solution to the systemic problems highlighted by the Abramoff scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0012223

As the day wore on, however, the early détente on the politically charged issue began to disappear as both parties dug in their heels over the best way to move forward.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), in a letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), asked for the two leaders to agree to a bipartisan task force to develop any reforms. But Reid shot back by calling on Frist to instead assign the Homeland Security panel — led by Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) — to work on a bill he introduced that has already gathered wide support from Democrats.

"Lobbying and ethics reform should not be a partisan issue," Frist wrote Reid. "The rules apply equally to every Senator and every staffer, regardless of political party. The rules are bipartisan and the reforms should be bipartisan."

Reid said that instead of another task force to look into the chamber's ethics, the bipartisan Senate panel should consider his lobby reform bill, which has attracted 39 Democrats but no Republicans. Among other things, the measure calls for a ban on lobbyist travel and gifts.

With little agreement over how to proceed, it remained unclear Wednesday whether and how the Senate will move ahead.

As one GOP Senate aide characterized the hope of togetherness: "The Republican door is always open about working together on a bipartisan basis, even after Harry tossed a hand grenade into it."

Across the Capitol, the parties were no more friendly. House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.), the Member tapped by GOP leadership to lead the chamber's reform drive, is focusing on the "really good feedback" a spokeswoman said he has received from some Democrats, despite being rebuffed by several.

Among those unwilling to work with Dreier is his panel's ranking member, Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.). She said when the California Republican asked for her help constructing a reform package, she replied, "I don't see how you people can clean this up. I think it's our job.

"The people who got us into this swamp are not going to be able to get us out," she added. "This is, in my view, the worst scandal that has ever fallen on Congress."

Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said the Democrats' position is typical of their "just-say-no obstructionist tactics."

"For them, it is a partisan political exercise with the hopes of winning in November," he said.

Despite the partisan rancor, there were a few signs of bipartisanship. Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) teamed up to unveil a bill that would establish an independent commission to examine and report a range of reform proposals.

McCain dismissed that idea as taking too long, but he expressed hope for some new Democratic support on his own measure, indicating that his longtime partner in past reform efforts, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), may eventually come aboard his bill. "Russ and I will work things out. I am confident," he said.

And in the House, Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), himself a partner of McCain's from the fight to reform campaign finance laws, said that he thinks there is still room for the parties to work together.

"I think there are many Republicans and many Democrats who want to see Congress as a whole clean up its act," he said.

GOP Freezes Jobs List, A Vestige Of The K Street Project (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Republican lawmakers yesterday ended their long practice of routinely summoning lobbyists to the Capitol to try to persuade them to hire their aides and colleagues, in the wake of the Jack Abramoff political corruption scandal.

GOP lawmakers for years have regularly presented lists of job openings on K Street to lobbyists to encourage them to hire Republicans over Democrats. The program is a remnant of the K Street Project once championed by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) as a way to coerce trade associations and companies to hire Republicans as their top lobbyists and to warn firms that hired Democrats that they would not be welcome.

Yesterday, the staff director of the Senate Republican Conference said that a K-Street-job-vacancies memo -- the heart of Congress's remaining involvement in the effort these days -- will no longer be distributed during high-level meetings hosted by the conference on Capitol Hill between lawmakers and lobbyists. Responsibility for the listings migrated from the House to the Senate several years ago, according to lobbyists.

While lobbyists and others could still obtain the information elsewhere, the change removes the formal involvement of lawmakers from the process and any implied encouragement by them to transform K Street into a Republican bastion.

DOJ_NMG_0012224

In addition, the decision could provide a public relations benefit to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the conference head and the person who has long chaired the lobbyist meetings. He is facing a tough reelection fight this year that has been made even tougher by Democratic accusations that he is too close to lobbyists and the GOP's K Street jobs operation.

In recent years, the effort has become less aggressive and now includes in its non-congressional component a job listing service on the Internet.

Participants describe the meeting as an information exchange at which Santorum and other GOP senators discuss their priorities and collect intelligence from lobbyists. Toward the end of the meetings, which begin at 8:30 a.m. every other Tuesday, a representative of the Republican National Committee distributes the document that lists who in Congress is looking for work and what jobs are available. A discussion of jobs sometimes ensued.

Asked whether the document will continue to be passed out during those meetings, Mark D. Rodgers, the conference's staff director, said, "Since the RNC is already widely distributing the jobs list, we have decided it is duplicative to hand it out and will no longer do so." But Brian Jones, a spokesman for the RNC, said the data were not easily obtainable. "It's not public information," Jones said.

The decision to drop the list comes as Santorum is being disparaged by his opponents in Washington and at home as the "liaison to the K Street Project." Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) last week said Santorum is "as responsible as anyone in the world for the K Street Project." He added that Santorum was unsuited to serve in his current role as the Republicans' point man in the effort to overhaul lobbying laws.

Those sorts of assertions are "one of a series of problems" Santorum has in his race this year against Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., said Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan election analyst. "Santorum at the moment is the No. 1 most vulnerable Republican senator seeking reelection," Rothenberg added.

A Republican Conference aide said there is "no connection" between Santorum's meetings and the K Street Project, and Santorum has said that everything he has done in the meetings is appropriate. Last week, Santorum characterized the meetings as a way for Republicans to get their points of view disseminated in Washington.

"If you're going to affect public policy in a positive way, you've got to get your message out," Santorum said. "That's what the project that I've been involved with has been about, period."

Democrats have also been passing around jobs memos of their own during Monday meetings between lobbyists and congressional chiefs of staff. A spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said the "job bank" document -- as the Democrats called their listing -- has not been distributed for months and "there's no plan to put it back in place."

But Democratic attacks on Santorum and the K Street Project will continue, lawmakers said. Yesterday, Reid and Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) wrote Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs, to ask for an investigation of the project. "What we seek to do is just shine a little sunlight on this K Street Project and have one of our committees investigate what happened so that we can see if there's legislation needed," Schumer said.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, said that he pioneered the project in the late 1980s and continues to urge companies and associations to hire free-market advocates via a Web site called the K Street Project. But when Democrats and others refer to the project, they speak more generally about the efforts of DeLay and his colleagues on Capitol Hill after the Republican takeover of the House in 1994. The House ethics committee privately warned DeLay in 1998 about threatening the Electronics Industry Alliance with retaliation for hiring a prominent Democrat.

Yesterday, Collins's committee held a hearing on lobbying legislation that highlighted the range of opinions Congress will have to bridge if it is to pass a bill that deals with abuses of travel, fundraising and other matters. Former senator Dick Clark (D-Iowa), director of the nonpartisan Aspen Institute Congressional Program, urged a ban on lawmakers' trips that include "in any way, shape or form the participation of lobbyists."

But John M. Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said information-gathering trips are essential for lawmakers. Private groups should be allowed to fund some of them, within ethical guidelines, he said.

Reform Talk May Spur Hill Exodus (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

Democrats and Republicans might not agree on all things lobbying, but they seem united on doubling the current one-year cooling-off period for newly minted advocates. And that has Congressional staffers, who already had an eye toward employment on K Street, stepping up their job-seeking efforts.

Lobbyists, headhunters and Capitol Hill aides speculate that a mini-exodus of staffers from both sides of the aisle may be coming as a result. The lobby ban may not be the only potential reform drawing staffers downtown, either. Congressional aides and lobbyists say that the ongoing discussion of other bans, or tougher restrictions, on free travel and entertainment will make working on Capitol Hill less appealing.

Nels Olson, managing director of the Washington, D.C., office for search firm Korn/Ferry International, said in recent days he's been fielding calls from Democratic and Republican Hill aides who are quickening the pace of looking for work downtown.

"For obvious reasons, there's been a heightened interest for those who were thinking about leaving anyways, about leaving potentially a bit earlier," Olson said. "There is some concern about the potential of their livelihood going forward. It tipped the balance toward leaving."

Olson said the volume of staffers looking to quickly jump ship is small for now, but "as the legislation moves forward, you could see a greatly increased number as it becomes more real."

Because discussion of staffers' future employment options tends to be deeply personal and secretive, most lobbyists and Congressional aides would talk only on the condition of anonymity. But in interviews with 24 high-level lobbyists and Congressional aides, it is clear that discussions about job opportunities off the Hill have increased as Members of Congress have stepped up their talk of tightening lobbying rules.

Steve Phillips, a partner at DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary and a former legislative director to then-Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), said he has heard from many staffers who are thinking about leaving the government payroll — fast.

"This has definitely expedited their decision-making process, no doubt about it," Phillips said. "They think their value is greatest now, whether that's real or perceived. We have definitely had a spike in conversations about this."

Ralph Hellmann, the chief lobbyist at the Information Technology Industry Council, said Hill aides were looking toward K Street even before Members began introducing reform measures after former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea in a bribery scandal earlier this month.

"This is now going to speed up that effort," Hellmann said. "The morale up there is awful."

A senior-level GOP leadership aide added, "I have heard some of my senior staff indicate that they would have to consider" leaving now because of the likelihood of reforms.

This longtime staffer added, "What does a two-year ban accomplish? ... So I'm going to be punished for something somebody else did? Do I really want to stay now for another year, and then tie my hands for an extra year" in the private sector?

The kind of travel experiences that could soon be eliminated, the staffer said, "are nice benefits to the job. It's going to get to the point where this just isn't a great place to work anymore."

Rich Gold, who heads the public policy group for Holland & Knight, said he, too, expects a rise in movement off the Hill.

"There's definitely going to be a swing, and not just on the two-year thing," Gold said. "I've definitely heard staff say if there's no travel, I'm out of here. It's one of the main things they love about the job."

Gold said people don't take the jobs for the perks, but he added that those comforts have been part of the employment package of working for Members.

"It's the equivalent of somebody coming to me and saying we're no longer going to have the cafeteria in the basement and we're getting rid of parking spots," he said. "The folks work long hours and these were all the little things that made it bearable sometimes. If you don't think staff are telling Members that, you're mistaken."

A Democratic head of a lobbying practice said that some senior Republicans on the Hill have reached out to his firm, in some cases using the reform proposals as a starting point.

"A couple of them have said this whole thing, in their judgment, is out of control and they're going to start looking around. They're just perplexed and if they're talking about two-year bans, then they may go now," this lobbyist said.

House Republican Conference Chief of Staff Andrew Shore, who has already told his boss that he plans to head to the private sector, said impending reforms are not the reason why.

"It's not a factor that has played into my thinking," Shore said. "This is about my family."

A senior GOP aide said that while his colleagues are giving careful consideration to leaving before more expansive restrictions could take place, they won't jump for just any job.

"It's a double-edged sword," this staffer said. "People don't know that lobbying will be what it has been, so it might not be the same job that it has been. Most of the people I know have pretty high [salary] expectations and probably won't be met in this environment."

One Hill aide flat-out questioned why his colleagues would eye K Street in the current climate. "The industry is sort of tainted," he said.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, said that extending the one-year ban amounts to penalizing people for government service "and that's not fair."

Miller said he has personally heard from one senior staffer who told Miller that he was considering leaving the Hill because of the reforms.

DOJ_NMG_0012226

Of course, there are at least a few people on K Street who think a two-year ban could be a good thing.

Juleanna Glover Weiss, a former aide to Vice President Cheney and a former Senate staffer, said a two-year ban might encourage people to stay in Hill jobs longer, enabling Congress to keep employing individuals who have significant experience in their area of expertise.

"The majority of staffers go up there because they want to make a difference," said Weiss, who lobbies at the Ashcroft Group. "They want to work in government, they want to do that job."

Trevor Potter, president of the Campaign Legal Center, said he supports expanding the cooling-off period to two years, and he hopes that and other new lobbying regulations take effect quickly — leaving little time for would-be lobbyists to line up new jobs on K Street.

"Congress is talking about doing something in the next couple of weeks, so it would seem to me to be unlikely that people would have enough time to go through the process" of finding a private-sector job, Potter said.

Under the current ban, former senior staffers aren't allowed to lobby their old offices, and ex-Members are barred from directly lobbying the entire Congress for one year. These budding lobbyists, though, can strategize and work issues from behind the scenes.

"I can tell you for an absolute fact that the year when people are banned is a year when some of them are unproductive," said a Democratic lobbyist.

Headhunter Olson said it's hard enough "for them to be sitting on the sidelines for a year. Two years is a long time."

And Michael Fulton, a lobbyist with Golin/Harris, said the former Congressional staffers "we have hired here view that one-year ban as practically an eternity."

But, he said, from the firm's perspective the ban isn't much of a hardship. "We don't sell access," Fulton said. "Our clients have all the access they need. We sell process, and timing and extra arms and legs and strategy and creativity."

Ivan Adler, a lobbyist headhunter for the McCormick Group, said that an extension of the lobbying ban would likely have zero impact on the salaries and job opportunities of former Members and senior-level Congressional aides. But expanded bans could deeply hamper junior and mid-level staffers, he said. "I think their value will go down because of their inability to reach out to a particular Member or committee," Adler said.

Of course, some existing lobbyists see the ban's extension as good for their own business.

Stewart Van Scoyoc, who runs the firm Van Scoyoc Associates, said the two-year ban would give big firms like his an advantage when trying to lure people off the Hill because it will be more difficult for an ex-staffer to set up his or her own shop. Instead, they will need the extra resources of a firm. "We can absorb the cost," he said.

One established GOP lobbyist said he was rooting for a 50-year ban to cut down on the competition. "I'm kidding," he quickly added.

Dodd Out, Link In (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Larson Dodd Stewart & Myrick is now Larson Stewart Myrick and Link, with co-founder Quin Dodd having left after being appointed by President Bush to the Consumer Product Safety Commission and with the addition of veteran lobbyist and GOP congressional staffer James Link .

Link moves over the lobby shop from Fleischman and Walsh , bringing his clients, including Barcardi and some hospitals, according to Dave Larson . Larson Stewart has a roster of more than 30 clients, Larson said, including Fannie Mae and the Grocery Manufacturers Association.

Earlier, Link was deputy director of the Senate Republican whip's office, as well as an aide to then-Rep. Richard B. Cheney (R-Wyo.).

While the lobby shop is now all-GOP, Larson, a former health policy adviser to Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), said he is talking to some Democrats about joining the team. "We don't look at the party; we look at the person," he said.

Hammering Away (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

RICHMOND, Tex. -- Out here, where the tendrils of Houston's growing exurbs reach for open ground, sits Rio Bend, a cluster of new houses and other facilities for parents having difficult times with troubled foster children -- difficulties like those Tom and Christine DeLay experienced with several teenagers they took into their home. Rio Bend was built by the DeLays, with help from friends, of sorts.

DOJ_NMG_0012227

She, an acerbic realist from south Texas, says more houses are planned by their charitable organization, but: "I hated to lose the leadership position because it helps me to raise money for those kids." Note her agreeably guileless acknowledgment that some friends of Rio Bend may not have been seized by simple altruism. She shares her husband's credo -- power is useful and should be used -- and knows the moral ambiguities it can involve.

He strides like a bantam rooster into the living room of one of the Rio Bend bungalows, having just been buoyed by an appreciative luncheon of 400 Realtors to whom he read a list of earmarks -- personally directed spending, aka pork -- he has delivered to his district. Most people, battered as he recently has been, would be curled up on the carpet in a fetal position. But DeLay is as direct and uncomplicated as the tool that supplies his nickname -- "The Hammer" -- and his faults do not include being a whiner.

Furthermore, he is not about to plea-bargain in the court of public opinion. He chafes under prudential reticence: His attorneys tell him not to trumpet the fact that the Justice Department told them he is not a target in the Jack Abramoff investigation. But about other matters, the bantam is belligerent.

Earmarks? Although recently "they got out of hand," they are, he says, necessary and proper because it is best to have spending dictated by a politician who knows his district's needs: "We are an equal branch of government -- why should we let a bureaucrat decide?" He says that in a state such as Illinois, which is dominated by Democrats "who play hardball," earmarks are the only way even House Speaker Dennis Hastert can get highway money spent in his district.

The K Street Project? That is, getting interest groups to hire Republican lobbyists, and to make such hirings fruitful by transactions using, among other things, earmarks? The author of this insists: "I'm very proud of it." In 1994 "we were coming as a Republican majority into a Democratic culture" in Washington. For 40 years, he says, the media had hired people congenial to sources who controlled Congress. And K Street -- the lobbyists' habitat -- hired Democrats to ensure access to Democrats. K Street Republicans "never got to see John Dingell or [Dan] Rostenkowski," two Democratic chairmen of crucial committees.

So, DeLay asks: In 1995, what do you think Democratic-dominated K Street was interested in? "Helping us get our work done? Secure our majority?" Those are rhetorical questions.

DeLay's Democratic opponent this fall will be Nick Lampson, a former congressman who in 2004 lost his seat in another district, partly because of the redistricting DeLay engineered that resulted in five additional Republican seats. DeLay won in 2004 with only 55 percent of the vote, partly because he thought that "to set an example" he should consent to making his district more Democratic in order to make others less so.

Referring to his trial on campaign finance charges brought by a notoriously political Democratic prosecutor, DeLay says, with a confidence that might be misplaced but clearly is unfeigned, "I'll be acquitted by the end of April." Then he says he will secure a 12th term, winning "the most expensive congressional race ever ." The national Democratic Party and several liberal groups -- already running ads and phone banks -- spend, well, liberally.

Because undecided voters are thin here -- he estimates they are about 13 percent of the district -- this election will be about mobilizing the faithful. So the piling on by his critics -- their wretched excesses in response to what they perceive to be his -- may help him.

Congress under Republican control has increased earmarks 873 percent in a decade and validated the axiom that the more solicitous government becomes, the more servile it seems and the more scorn it receives. Congress has not been so unpopular since 1994, when Democrats lost their 40-year grip on the House. But here on the east bend of the Brazos River, unlike on the Potomac, the fever for reform is not high. To a visiting columnist who waxes censorious about earmarks for highway projects, DeLay responds with a notable lack of repentance: "You just drove out on one."

GOP Will Regain Trust (USAT)

By Roy Blunt

USA Today, January 26, 2006

House members cannot ignore recent scandals that have many questioning the credibility of our system.

Republicans will regain Americans' trust by enacting tough penalties for those who break the law and focusing on our agenda of limited government, personal responsibility and growing the economy by returning money to the Americans who earned it.

Lobbying reforms should include new rules governing travel and disclosure and regulations subjecting shadowy, tax-exempt "527" political groups to the same standards as others who attempt to influence the process. Then the credibility of honest public servants will be not be questioned — even when some try to paint them with the same brush as those who break the law.

I personally adhere to the strictest policy on Capitol Hill regarding interactions with lobbyists. I insist my staff does the same.

DOJ_NMG_0012228

A top priority of mine is to retain and grow our Republican majority. I visited more than 100 congressional districts last campaign season. It's not glamorous, but it's important work that often puts me in three towns in one day. Private travel, in accordance with the law and House rules, has enabled me to reach multiple events for members, often in remote locations, in a single day.

Republicans, as we consider lobbying reform, will address proposals that would enhance the immediacy and transparency of disclosure — critical to the democratic process — and are another step in earning the American people's trust.

Rep. Roy Blunt, of Missouri, is House majority whip. He has been acting majority leader since September.

Proven Record (USAT)

By John Boehner

USA Today, January 26, 2006

House Republicans need leadership that will help provide a vision and a plan for renewal. We need a leader who will stand up to Democrats when they're wrong, but who has credibility to work with them when it's in the country's best interests.

I have a proven record of bringing together members of both parties to support bills rooted in Republican principles, such as stronger accountability, fiscal responsibility and greater competition. Recently, I managed a bipartisan overhaul of our nation's pension laws, strengthening worker retirement security and protecting taxpayers from a massive bailout of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. And when it comes to reform credentials, actions speak louder than words:

· I've never requested pork money for my Ohio district.

· I've never taken a dime from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

· Every trip I've taken has been within the rules.

· Every relationship I have with a contributor or a lobbyist is an ethical one.

In the early 1990s, I exposed the corrupt practices of the Democrat-controlled House and have worked ever since to strengthen ethics rules under the Republican majority.

As of now, I am the only candidate who has released a detailed plan that would help House Republicans regain the spirit and energy of 1994, embrace real reform and reclaim the vision responsible for our success.

Rep. John Boehner, of Ohio, is chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce and a former chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Looking For Mr. Clean? Not In This House Race. (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Republicans in the House of Representatives need a new leader and a new image.

The former majority leader, Tom DeLay, stepped down after he was indicted in a Texas fundraising case and linked to crooked lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

So where is the GOP seeking this fresh face and new start? With two lawmakers — Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio — who have cozy relations with lobbyists and a penchant for accepting perks from corporate friends.

A third candidate for majority leader, John Shadegg of Arizona, is less enmeshed with the lobbying establishment and high-powered fundraising. That's one reason he's given virtually no chance of winning. Politicians who don't raise big money and spread it around to colleagues don't often find themselves in line to be congressional leaders.

We don't presume to tell House Republicans which of their colleagues to pick when they vote next Thursday, but the public has a big stake in the outcome. The majority leader, second only to the House speaker on the leadership ladder, has a key role in setting Congress' agenda. DeLay, for example, was the driving force behind the impeachment of President Clinton.

The leadership race demonstrates how Congress' corrupt culture extends beyond DeLay and Abramoff. Those who rise to the top tend to be the smoothest practitioners of the system: corporate lobbyists provide money and perks to gain access and legislative favors, and lawmakers use the money to win campaigns and earn colleagues' fealty.

It's a seamy game Republicans certainly didn't invent, but one at which the two leading contenders for majority leader excel. Blunt and Boehner are both calling for changes, but it's hard to take them seriously when they're so much a part of the problem:

· Blunt, 56, is a DeLay protégé who came to Congress in 1997 and quickly learned that money paves the path to power. In the past decade, he has raised $9.2 million for his own campaigns, half of it from political action committees run by a who's who of business. He hardly needs the money: He clobbered opponents, taking 70% of the vote in 2004.

In November 2002, Blunt was involved in a particularly noxious episode: He quietly inserted a provision to benefit cigarette-maker Philip Morris in a bill on the verge of passage. When other House leaders discovered the provision, they got rid of it.

DOJ_NMG_0012229

It was just the kind of thing that makes the public believe — with good reason — that Congress is for sale. Adding to the odor: One of Blunt's sons was a lobbyist for Philip Morris on Missouri state matters. And months later, Blunt married a lobbyist for Altria, Philip Morris' parent. A wedding present from colleagues: a waiver of House rules so he didn't have to disclose the gifts the couple received from lobbyists.

Blunt also punched another leadership ticket. Since 1999, he has raised $4.7 million and doled most of it out to colleagues facing tougher election battles. He campaigns for them, often on private jets loaned by friendly corporations. That, too, is legal under House rules.

· Boehner, also 56, came to Congress in 1991 in a class of reformers. As one of the "Gang of Seven," he pushed the House to name names in one of that era's scandals — a House bank that let members overdraw their accounts.

Since then, however, Boehner has grown comfortable with Congress' looser ways. In 1995, he distributed campaign checks from tobacco-run political action committees to colleagues on the House floor — an event so unseemly it made headlines. He has cultivated lobbyists, raised $14.3 million for himself and colleagues and avails himself of one of Congress' favorite perks. Since 2000, Boehner has taken $157,000 worth of "fact finding" trips, many to resorts and European capitals, paid for by special interests and non-profit groups — the 9th highest ranking in Congress.

As chairman of the House committee that oversees students' loan program, he has forged close ties with industry giant Sallie Mae. Since 2002, Sallie Mae executives have given $132,000 to a Boehner political committee, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Meanwhile, with help from Congress and taxpayers, Sallie has prospered.

To his credit, Boehner has consistently opposed "earmarks," legislative favors that lobbyists love, and he voted last year against the pork-laden highway bill.

Both Blunt and Boehner have one point right: Voters are clamoring for change. That requires recognition of what's wrong and the will to do something about it. Lawmakers who've spent their careers accepting perks and raking in special-interest campaign cash don't make for credible reformers.

Message Efforts May Boost The Messenger (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

With President Bush and Republicans struggling to regain their standing in public opinion as Senate Democrats hammer away daily at every perceived foible or folly committed by the ruling majority, one man has made it his mission to strike back.

Over the past year, Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) has become a self-appointed public relations man for Republicans in Congress and the White House, filling a communications void that has developed in the Senate GOP leadership.

“I saw it as addressing this quick-response need that I don’t think we had been set up for before, and really didn’t need before the Democrats created their war room,” said Cornyn, referencing Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid’s (D-Nev.) highly effective press operation. “It’s not enough to come back later on, a week later, two weeks later, and respond. ...

A charge unrebutted is a charge believed.”

A veteran of the Texas Supreme Court, Cornyn will undoubtedly have a high profile this week during Senate deliberations over Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito, reprising a role he has frequently played in the highly partisan judicial confirmation battles of the past few years.

Cornyn hasn’t limited himself to judicial battles, however, expanding his scope in recent months to lead an aggressive effort among his colleagues in directing staff to send out partisan press releases, opposition research papers and talking points reacting to just about every major policy issue and every major Democratic attack that is made in the Senate, and sometimes in the House.

His efforts include issuing rebuttals to Democrats speaking on the Senate floor even before the Member in question has finished his or her remarks, as well as releases pointing out inconsistencies in the Democratic message and noting when Democrats backtrack on previous statements.

But the role Cornyn is filling may be about more than party loyalty. He’s also running against Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) for the low-profile but still influential post of vice chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, which just happens to be the No. 2 “message” position.

“I’m just trying to do as good of a job that I can do, and if people think that is a benefit to the Conference and would benefit by having me in their vice chair position, then so much the better,” said Cornyn in a recent interview.

Others acknowledge that Cornyn’s PR strategies are putting him in a good position to win the vice chairman race.

“Obviously, that’s one of the things that I think he can point to,” said current Senate Republican Conference Chairman and top Conference message man Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.).

DOJ_NMG_0012230

Even Ensign concedes that he thinks "John would do a good job in leadership," but added, "I offered myself up to my colleagues, and if they think I'll do a better job, then I hope they'll support me."

Careful to stress he is not criticizing the current Senate GOP leadership, Cornyn said he thinks he fills "a niche" more than a void in the GOP message operation.

But other Republicans said a gap in messaging definitely existed, particularly prior to the creation last week by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) of a rapid response "peace room" intended to counter Reid's war room.

"Clearly, he does fill a void. He's willing to go out there and do the press work when other Members are busy with other things," said one Senate GOP leadership aide.

There has been no lack of evidence that the Senate GOP leadership has appeared to be without a rudder in its message efforts prior to last week's unveiling of the peace room.

Most notably, Santorum has been scheduling fewer GOP agenda and message events since last year while he concentrates on a tough re-election battle back home.

Frist, never regarded as a dynamic public speaker, has been dealing with legal and ethical questions surrounding his decision to sell stock in a health care company owned by his family. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and Senate Republican Policy Committee Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) often shy away from media appearances, and both are known to have a distaste for dealing with the press.

That leaves current Vice Chairman Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), who as the lowest-ranking member of the leadership team doesn't yet command major media attention.

Santorum has "done a pretty good job at messaging," noted one senior Senate Republican staffer. "But with all his attention focused on his own re-election bid, it doesn't seem that we have many members of the leadership that are willing to step in and fill that vacuum."

Santorum acknowledged that he has been somewhat distracted by his campaign, but said, "I think I still do a fair amount." But he praised Cornyn's efforts.

"I'm constantly asking him to go out [to do message events], because he's so good," Santorum said. "I'm always recruiting him, in addition to the work he does on his own."

And even with the advent of the peace room, Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said Cornyn's efforts would continue to be welcomed and encouraged.

"Sen. Cornyn is such an active voice for the Republican Conference that there will always be a need for him," Call said.

Over the past few months Cornyn has taken a lead in scoring points for the GOP in debates over reauthorization of the anti-terrorism USA PATRIOT Act, controversy over Bush authorizing the National Security Agency to spy on Americans without a warrant, lobbying and ethics reform, and the war in Iraq.

On Iraq, Cornyn said he felt the need to defend the Bush administration from Democratic attacks on the president's policies.

"I'm not the first one to observe this, but I don't think the administration was doing a very good job of defending its policies or successes in Iraq," Cornyn said. "My attitude is, Republicans are all in this together When the president does well, we do well. When the president doesn't do well in terms of public opinion, we don't tend to do as well."

Cornyn also has gone after Senate Democrats' decision last week to release a report questioning the ethics of 33 Republican Senators.

"It's beyond ironic that in an attempt to smear the ethics of others, the Democrat 'war room' chose to use taxpayer-funded staff and equipment to compile a blatantly political attack on Republican Senators," Cornyn said in a release that was widely publicized because it was one of the few GOP responses to the Democratic attack. Reid subsequently apologized for the tone of the report.

Still, Democrats don't appear to be taking Cornyn's efforts lightly. Just this week, a war room press release accused Cornyn of blindly following the administration's talking points when he accused Democrats of supporting "special rights for those who are suspected of plotting terrorism."

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) called some of Cornyn's criticisms of Democrats "hyperbolic" and reiterated that Democrats view him as simply an extension of the White House press office.

"He has been acknowledged to be very closely linked to the White House press operation," Durbin said.

Despite such criticism and regardless of whether he is elected Conference vice chairman, Cornyn shows no sign of stopping. "I'm happy to help whether I'm in the leadership or not," he said.

Just In Time For Valentine's Day (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

DOJ_NMG_0012231

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

All of them were laughing, some were horrified and a few were undoubtedly secretly delighted. When they found their boss' name on the front of thongs for sale on the Internet, aides to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) couldn't keep it a secret.

"This is just bad," read the subject line of an e-mail from one Reid staffer to another. The missive, which eventually wound up in HOH's inbox, had a link to a Web site selling "I [heart] HARRY REID" thongs for $15.99.

"Panty-minimalists love our casual thong that covers sweet spots without covering your assets — putting an end to panty-lines," the online retailer, cafepress.com, boasts. "This under-goodie is 'outta sight' in low-rise pants. Toss these message panties onstage at your favorite rock star or share a surprise message with someone special ... later."

Hmmm. Harry Reid thongs being tossed at a rock star? Impressing your boyfriend with the notion that you love Harry Reid and keep him in a very special place, not just in your heart? For goodness sakes, what is Mrs. Reid going to think?

Reid aides wouldn't dare go there. And none would admit whether she (or he) would be ordering a Harry Reid thong. But one aide, giggling as she asked that her name not be used, said, "We're just happy Sen. Reid's popularity stretches across all types."

HOH agrees with the other Reid aide: This is just bad!

Oui, ou Non? Will he, or won't he? We're talking about the newly appointed chairman of the House Administration Committee and the question, of course, is: Will he change freedom fries back to french fries?

Everyone is dying to know, but Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) is keeping tight-lipped about how he'll handle the trés, trés delicate issue, now that Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), the creator of freedom fries, has been forced out as chairman of the panel that oversees Capitol Hill eateries.

It seems like ages ago that Ney banned the term "french" from the menus in response to France's opposition to the Iraq war. A masterful move that accomplished, well, absolutely nothing as far as we can tell. So now, with the drumbeat of reform resounding throughout the land, the torch is Ehlers' and fries, be they freedom or french, are his responsibility.

Speculation is running rampant, especially on the House side, where the Rayburn cafeteria may be the only place where fries are still listed on the menu as "freedom fries." One House GOP aide said "anyone named Vern is sure to know his way around a potato farm," so he'd be happy to defer to the new chairman. "If there is a change, I think that Vern's spud fries will now be readily available in all Hill cafeterias much to the disappointment of [Sen.] John Kerry (D-Mass.) and other French loyalists."

Ehlers spokesman Jon Brandt won't say which way his boss is tilting on the freedom/french spectrum. And HOH got the feeling that he didn't want to be bothered with such nonsense, though, let's face it, Ehlers' predecessor made it a serious issue.

"The bottom line is, it is not one of our top priorities ... and it's not anything we're going to be dealing with in the near future," Brandt told HOH. "We have many other items on the agenda that are going to need to be dealt with over the near course. This is not one of the things that's on our front burner."

No pun intended.

Still the One. Despite a recent spate of bad publicity, Vice President Cheney is still a big draw for GOP fundraising.

The vice president is slated to be the headline attraction this evening at a fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). Anyone can attend for a simple $1,000. But the most generous donors may have a picture snapped with the veep: Going for that "max out" opportunity before Ohio's primary in May, the DeWine re-election campaign is charging political action committees $5,000 per photo op.

The fun starts at 5 p.m. at the Capitol Hill Club.

Sen. Clinton: Bush Ignoring Needs Of US Cities (REU)

By John Whitesides

Reuters, January 26, 2006

Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused the Bush administration on Wednesday of ignoring the needs of cities in its politically driven zeal for tax cuts and told U.S. mayors "you are on your own."

Clinton, a potential White House candidate in 2008 who is seeking Senate re-election this year in New York, said that since the September 11 attacks President George W. Bush had reneged on his obligation to states and cities to pay for crucial security and social programs.

"Across the board, federal budget cuts are leaving states and cities struggling to make up the difference," Clinton told a meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

"We know the money is going to tax cuts," she said, adding those cuts are desirable in the right political and economic climate but "it is hard to square with the challenges we face at this time of terrorist threat."

DOJ_NMG_0012232

At the federal level, "the sense of urgency that marked the months after the 9/11 attacks has largely given way to politics as usual," she said.

Bush's message in his State of the Union speech to the U.S. Congress next week "can be summed up in three words: on your own. We are shifting costs and we are shifting risks onto individuals and families and local governments," she said.

"Mayors, you are on your own to protect your cities," she added.

Clinton's comments were the latest in a series of blasts at Bush in recent weeks. She said earlier this month his presidency would "go down in history as one of the worst" and accused him last week of playing down the Iranian threat.

Talking to reporters after her speech, she criticized Bush's defense of the legality of his domestic surveillance plan, saying "their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after al Qaeda is far-fetched."

In an indirect reference to her husband, former President Bill Clinton, she told the mayors Bush had squandered the federal budget surpluses of five years ago.

She said Bush had slashed community development block grants, school improvement funds, Medicaid and foster care while not delivering the money to hire, train and equip local emergency and security personnel.

"There is hardly a program that is part of the social safety net that hasn't been slashed," Clinton said.

Hillary Has A Wobble Over Wal-Mart Days (Daily News)

By Michael McAuliff

Daily News, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Hillary Clinton easily pointed at Wal-Mart yesterday as not doing enough about health care but found it a little tougher when asked if she had ever suggested the retailer do more when she was on its board of directors.

"Well, you know, I, that was a long time ago, I have to remember," she stammered, before pointing to her work on health care while First Lady.

She sat on the Wal-Mart board from 1986 to 1992. Her spokesman insisted it's "a very different company now."

Many Faces Of Hillary -- None A Winner (LAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

LIBERALS ARE sizing up Hillary Clinton for the umpteenth time, and they don't like what they see.

To be honest, I never understood what they saw in her in the first place. The amazing thing about Clinton is that she's so unappealing. She isn't a particularly gifted speaker. She's smart, but in a conventional and lawyerly way. She doesn't connect well with audiences. Her idea of improvisation seems to be leaping from the prepared text to prepared note cards.

However, she has defied the rules of nature and gotten better looking over the years, which, along with her soap-opera marriage, probably explains some of her success with supermarket checkout-aisle publications.

Indeed, her greatest success has been at exploiting expectations others have for her. For some fans, she was the struggling career woman who could bring home the bacon. For some detractors, she was "Lady MacBeth," cold and calculating in an obviously political marriage. She was also the apotheosis of the 1960s, for friends and foes alike. For the Children's Defense Fund crowd, she was the baby boomer idealist who worked her way through the system. For the American Spectator gang, she was the former Black Panther sympathizer and acolyte of Chicago radical Saul Alinsky who finally achieved power. After the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Hillary — who was no stranger to her husband's weaknesses — suddenly became the victim in a culture with a fetish for victims.

At every turn, Hillary Clinton's Zelig-like public persona has been a fabrication — either by her fans, her enemies or herself. One telling episode came when she published her massively successful autobiography, "Living History." The book tour was nothing short of a coronation, confirming her gravitas and commitment to "the issues." She portrayed herself as resigned to the fact that she'd have to answer Barbara Walters' questions about her personal life, but she always made it seem like she'd rather wrestle with the hard issues of public policy. But when the Washington Post actually tried to ask her about something other than how she cried over her husband's sexcapades with an intern, the senator from New York "declined to be interviewed about the political content of her book."

Hillary Clinton's latest reinvention paints her as a moderate, even an Iraq war hawk. Few people buy it. Reporters regularly assume her motives are opportunistic rather than sincere, focusing on how every pronouncement will position her for the 2008 presidential race. National Public Radio's Mara Liasson, for example, recently observed, "She certainly sees it in her interest to get to the right of the president on many issues, especially in the area of national security."

Whatever the reason, some liberals have had enough. "I will not support Hillary Clinton for president," wrote Molly Ivins, the voice of conventional thinking on the left. "Enough. Enough triangulation, calculation and equivocation. Enough clever straddling, enough not offending anyone." The segment of Democrats who sanctified Cindy Sheehan can hardly countenance a presidential candidate who unapologetically voted for the war and positioned herself to the right of President Bush on foreign policy.

DOJ_NMG_0012233

The New Republic offers perhaps an even more devastating critique of Clinton for Democratic pragmatists: She can't win. Marisa Katz dismantled the myth that Clinton can appeal to "red state" voters because she won in upstate New York. Turns out former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry each did better in upstate New York than she did. And Gore, a Southerner, couldn't even win his home state of Tennessee. Meanwhile, a recent Gallup poll showed that 51% of Americans won't even consider voting for Clinton.

All of this could change. But there's a great irony here. Hillary Clinton's success over the last decade and a half has been in pretending to be her own woman while really playing one part or another for the benefit of the media, her husband or various feminist constituencies desperate for a role model to confirm all of their comfortable stereotypes.

That's why there's something oddly satisfying in the possibility that Clinton being herself is politically disastrous. And, if she's really just playing one more role according to some classically Clintonian political triangulation, there's something equally satisfying to the prospect that even her fans aren't falling for it anymore.

Obey Seeks Public Financing Debate (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

For the record, Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) doesn't have anything nice to say about Jack Abramoff: "He's a leech and a parasite on the system, and for the life of me I don't even know what he delivered for anyone."

But Obey, a Capitol Hill veteran who's played a prominent role in four decades worth of debates over Congressional ethics, thinks the legislative response to the Abramoff scandal is missing the point entirely.

"Right now, this is going to come down to who's got the tighter limits on trips, or who's got the tighter limits on meals. With all due respect, I don't care what happens with either one of those," he said.

The real issue, Obey says, is the source of campaign funds.

"In general elections, there should not be a dime of private money," he said.

To that end, Obey is joining with Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to propose full public financing of all House elections. They announced Wednesday that they will introduce the plan, which would bar all candidates from fundraising and self-financing in their campaigns, when the House reconvenes next week.

"Instead of dialing for dollars, Members could actually be in their committees, learning what their bills would actually do," Obey said. "You could actually have a Congress that's 50-50 between politics and legislating. Right now it's 90 percent politics and 10 percent legislating."

Many Congressional Democrats have long embraced the principle of public financing — House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), for instance, is a longtime backer of the idea — and Obey has pushed similar plans in the past. But concern that the public would be uneasy with the idea of taxpayer money going to political campaigns, lampooned as "welfare for politicians" by Republicans in the past, consistently undercut Democratic efforts to push such plans in the years before they lost their House majority. And it seems unlikely that even many of Obey's Democratic colleagues will be cheering his new proposal.

While freeing Members from the pressures of raising money, Obey's plan would radically curtail the financial advantage most incumbents now enjoy, even making it difficult for some of them to pay for television ads. And even if Democrats were to unite behind it, the prospect on a vote in the GOP-controlled House is less than remote.

"I didn't offer this because people would flock to it and swoon," Obey, the ranking member on the Appropriations Committee, said. "I'm introducing it so we can expand the discussion."

Beyond that, the plan also faces an almost certain constitutional hurdle, in the form of the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision that equated campaign spending with free speech.

Under the Obey-Frank plan, citizens would voluntarily contribute to the "Grassroots Good Citizenship Fund" through a "check-up" — as opposed to the current check-off that helps fund the presidential public financing system — on their federal tax return. The Federal Election Commission would then allocate funds to each of the 435 Congressional districts, based on median family income. The wealthiest districts would be allocated about $1.5 million, and the poorest about $750,000. Within each district, the money would then be distributed to general election candidates in direct relation to each party's showing in the previous two elections; if the Democrats have averaged 60 percent, their candidate would get 60 percent of the money.

The program would be mandatory for all candidates, and spending by any outside groups would be barred. Candidates would also be prohibited from opting out and dipping into their own wallets to finance their races. State and national parties could only contribute money, goods and services equal to 5 percent of their candidate's expenditure cap.

The rules would apply to general elections only, and not primaries.

DOJ_NMG_0012234

Far from protecting incumbents, a criticism leveled at some of his past public financing efforts, Obey notes that the plan would increase the bankrolls of challengers in more than 80 percent of districts. He said it's more than enough money for candidates to run credible campaigns, but Members who equate a strong campaign with television saturation might not agree.

For instance, the 5th and 13th districts in New Jersey both sit in the New York media market, where airtime is pricier than anywhere else in the country. The wealthy, suburban 5th (median income: $72,781) would likely be eligible for the full $1.5 million. Once divvied up, that could be enough for both candidates to finance modest television campaigns. But that might not be the case in the gritty 13th (median income: $37,129). By the same token, the cash allocated to Nebraska's impoverished 3rd district, home of the poorest county in America, might be enough to flood the comparatively cheap airwaves there.

And limiting the program to the general election could produce an unbalanced playing field, not to mention some significant loopholes. Incumbents in safe Democratic or Republican districts might not find much relief from the pressures of fundraising, since the main threat to their re-election is usually the primary — not the November election. And multimillionaires would be able to indirectly pay their way into office, if their money was enough to win a primary, especially in a district where their party is the favorite in the fall.

Obey warned against nit-picking, stressing that his goal is to launch a debate about real reform, saying, "I've been doing this a long time and I've heard every doggone argument against everything that everyone's said."

He also has an answer to the constitutional questions about the plan. In its 1976 ruling, he said, the court left the door open for the kind of regulation he's proposing — if it was necessary in order for Congress to protect itself. As such, Obey is including in the legislation a Congressional finding that brands the current campaign finance system "a fundamental threat to the integrity of the national election process."

That, he said, might be enough for the court to reconsider Buckley v. Valeo. And if it doesn't, the legislation also calls for "expedited consideration" of a constitutional amendment.

"I don't anticipate anyone's action," Obey said. "This comes from my gut and Barney's gut. Both of us have some goals. We're trying to get people to focus on the fundamentals."

House Republicans To Get Presentation On 'Suburban Agenda' (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

A different kind of agenda — different from the president's State of the Union address and the anticipated Democratic election year document — is scheduled to be unveiled early next month to House Republicans: "The Suburban Agenda."

It's the work of a group of 22 GOP Members from across the party's ideological spectrum and led by moderate Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who's also tried to sell it to President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove.

Instead of a laundry-list policy agenda, Kirk told me in an interview, this agenda is designed to answer the problems faced by a suburban family as it moves through its day.

Kirk represents Chicago's northern suburbs, and other members of the "suburban strategy caucus" represent the suburbs of such cities as New York, Philadelphia, Seattle, Cleveland, Atlanta and Denver.

There's clearly strategic political intent behind trying to build the 2006 GOP legislative strategy around the suburbs: More than half of U.S. voters live in the 'burbs, and these places, formerly Republican strongholds, have been trending Democratic in recent years.

As Fred Barnes pointed out in the Weekly Standard earlier this month, what Kirk calls the "inburbs" of major cities — as opposed to the more-distant exurbs — are increasingly Democratic.

Kirk's district was represented in the 1960s by current Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and for two decades by GOP Rep. John Porter. Kirk carried it with 64 percent of the vote in 2004 — far better than the 47 percent President Bush won in the district.

In the 2005 Virginia gubernatorial race, Democrat Tim Kaine won the close-in Washington, D.C., suburbs of Arlington, Alexandria and Fairfax by huge margins.

Of the 14 districts held by GOP representatives but carried by Democratic nominee John Kerry (Mass.) in 2004, virtually all are suburban. At the same time, there are 12 suburban districts held by Democrats that Bush carried. So it's not a stretch to say that suburban voters will decide who controls the House after this year's elections.

Kirk and others in the suburban caucus are scheduled to make the case for their agenda at the House GOP Members' retreat Feb. 9, which follows leadership elections Feb. 1.

Kirk had 20 issues of concern to suburbanites tested in his district and rated by GOP pollster John McLaughlin. McLaughlin is currently in the field with a more sophisticated poll of other suburbs to determine, for example, whether voters are willing to pay for proposals in the package.

DOJ_NMG_0012235

At the end of the day, there is a "laundry list" of proposals — "20 defining issues to win the suburbs and keep our Republican majority," Kirk calls it. But he insists that he got there simply by tracing a day in suburbia.

"You wake up in the morning and you might turn on the radio and hear about Iraq and the war on terror and you want it solved, but then you think, 'OK, I've got to get to work,'" Kirk said.

"'How long does it take to get there? Am I going to drive by strip malls the whole way? Can't we have more open space?'" McLaughlin found that 83 percent of Kirk's constituents support limits on the lawsuits that delay Superfund environmental cleanups. Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) is the caucus' open spaces presenter.

"I get to work," Kirk continued. "The average American has five jobs in a working life. If I switch, I don't want to be left high and dry without health insurance. Current COBRA regs allow me to pay for only 18 months of coverage? Why not indefinite?"

Portability of health insurance and expansion of health savings accounts got overwhelming support in McLaughlin's poll. Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) is the caucus expert in that area.

"Meanwhile, my kids went to school. My wife has probably looked up to see whether there's a pedophile in our neighborhood, but why shouldn't our school district be able to pay the federal government $50 to background check on new teachers and coaches?

"Also, the suburbs have an increased presence of youth gangs. In my district, Lake County, the 16th wealthiest in the country, has identified 3,000 members of international gangs. Why shouldn't the federal Bureau of Alchohol, Tobacco and Firearms not also be the Bureau of Gangs to help localities?

"We also need to clarify the 4th Amendment, so that privacy rights do not extend to school lockers, to make sure there are no weapons or drugs in school." Rep. Dave Reichert (Wash.), former sheriff of King County (Seattle), is the caucus' lead advocate on youth crime, which is also a theme of first lady Laura Bush.

Other items on the suburban agenda include a federal requirement that all medical records be made electronic by a certain date and a "401-Kids" tax-benefited savings plan allowing parents to set up accounts that children could use for purposes other than college tuition, which is now covered by 529 plans.

Kirk's poll found strong support for several kinds of tax credits — for first-time homebuyers, for computers and tutors for children and for new-career training for adults. Respondents also favored eliminating the estate tax.

Significantly, the entire suburban agenda has not been costed-out and matched against the Republicans' stated goal of closing the federal budget deficit.

The agenda is designed to keep Republicans in power, but many of the items — electronic health records and anti-gang measures, for sure — ought to be bipartisan. It wouldn't be surprising if there's a bidding war for the support of the suburbs.

Postal Service Goes On Offensive In Fight With Senators Over System To Set Mail Rates (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The U.S. Postal Service headquarters launched a blitz yesterday to block a Senate bill, contending that the legislation, in combination with White House demands, could trigger a 20 percent increase in stamp prices in the near future.

The bill's sponsors, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), said they were "outraged that the Postal Service would mislead senators." In a statement, they said, "Nothing in the bill would lead to rate increases."

Government agencies rarely risk incurring the wrath of committee chairmen who oversee their operations, as is the case with Collins. As head of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, she has made the overhaul of postal operations one of her priorities.

Her bill would create a system of setting mail rates that she believes would give the post office greater pricing flexibility and would prevent it from raising rates each year in excess of inflation as measured by the consumer price index.

The Postal Service faces a bleak future if e-mail and Internet services continue to expand and erode first-class mail volume. Although the post office has stabilized its finances in recent years, efforts continue to reduce labor costs and consolidate operations.

As the word spread this week that Collins planned to bring her bill to the Senate floor, postal officials distributed a letter from the postal Board of Governors reaffirming the board's objections to the proposed overhaul, the first in more than 30 years.

Yesterday, postal officials stepped up their effort to block the bill, contacting Senate staff members and providing each Senate office with a copy of the board's objections.

"We need meaningful reform, and this is not it," Tom Day , senior vice president for government relations, said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0012236

Senate leaders plan to bring the Collins bill to the floor for speedy approval, called unanimous consent, that does not require a roll-call vote. Postal lobbyists were on the hunt for a senator who would object to the maneuver and put a hold on the bill.

The House has approved a postal overhaul, and once the Senate clears the Collins bill, it will go to a House-Senate committee that will reconcile differences between the two versions. The White House has announced opposition to any compromise that would increase the federal deficit.

Postal officials fear that a compromise bill could leave it on the hook for two major financial obligations and would allow postal regulators to intrude on internal operations and override business decisions.

Day said mail rates could soar by as much as 20 percent if Congress and the White House agreed to extend a 2003 law that requires the post office to pay for military retirement benefits earned by employees before their postal careers, and if the post office also is ordered to prepay health benefits for employees in the Civil Service Retirement System. Such costs are usually covered by the Treasury Department, using taxpayer dollars.

In the worst scenario, he said, the post office would have no choice but to keep raising postal rates, which would set off a "death spiral."

Although the Postal Service has worked with Congress and the White House on proposals to overhaul operations, Day said postal concerns over accountability and management control have been in contention since 1996.

Collins and Carper, however, said, "We are extremely troubled and disappointed that at the very last minute, the Postal Service is attempting to block action on our bill."

They added, "It is ironic that the Postal Service -- which has been forced to raise rates four times in five years because of its inability to control its costs and respond to the new economic landscape -- is accusing us of putting the health of the postal system at risk."Helping Enrollees

Two House members wrote the Office of Personnel Management yesterday to "strongly urge . . . seamless health care coverage" for enrollees in the discontinued Postmasters Benefit Plan.

OPM dropped the plan Monday from the federal health insurance program because of concerns about its financial solvency and management.

Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Jon Porter (R-Nev.), who oversee civil service matters, asked OPM to provide information on whether benefit counselors will be made available to affected employees and what steps will be taken to ensure that the enrollees do not experience a break in coverage.

OPM has said it will move enrollees into the Blue Cross and Blue Shield standard option unless individuals opt for a different plan.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

'Nightline' accused

The Federalist Society yesterday called on ABC to investigate a report by its news show "Nightline" that suggested Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia had done something unethical by participating in a legal seminar sponsored by the group.

"The report grossly misled viewers about a recent trip Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia took to teach a 10-hour course on the Constitution and separation of powers. 'Nightline' suggested that Justice Scalia's trip was a 'judicial junket,' and even strained to manufacture a link with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff," Federalist Society President Eugene B. Meyer said in a letter yesterday to ABC News President David Westin.

The program, which aired Monday, emphasized that Justice Scalia had missed the September swearing-in of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. because of his commitment to attend the legal seminar at a Colorado resort, suggesting that the jurist spent most of his time playing tennis and engaging in other frivolous pursuits.

"Rather than taking a recreational trip with hours of tennis and going fly-fishing, as ABC would have its viewers believe, Justice Scalia was honoring an agreement made nearly a year in advance with the Federalist Society to teach a serious scholarly program to more than 100 lawyers from 38 states that required considerable work and advance preparation," Mr. Meyer said in his letter.

"Prior to the course, Justice Scalia produced a 481-page course book that attendees were expected to review in advance. The course was approved by at least 30 state bars for most of the attending lawyers' continuing education requirements. Justice Scalia was there to share his knowledge and experience and received only reimbursement for travel and lodging."

As reported in this column yesterday, the ABC program strained to link Justice Scalia to disgraced lobbyist Abramoff, saying the jurist attended a cocktail reception partly funded by a legal and lobbying firm where Mr. Abramoff once worked.

"We call on ABC to launch an independent investigation into the circumstances surrounding the development and production of this story," Mr. Meyer said.

Ney seeks re-election

Undaunted by speculation within his own party that he may have to quit Congress because of a corruption probe, Rep. Bob Ney announced yesterday he's running for re-election.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign, and I am ready for the fight," said Mr. Ney, Ohio Republican. He planned to hold his first formal campaign event today.

Mr. Ney's popularity has hardly dimmed in his expansive rural district even after he was identified in disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea as the central figure in Abramoff's scheme to bribe members of Congress, the Associated Press reports.

Spanish response

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will give the Spanish-language response to President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, Democratic congressional leaders announced.

Mr. Villaraigosa has been seen as a rising Democratic star since his election in May as the first Hispanic in 133 years to lead Los Angeles, the country's second-largest city. He will deliver his remarks from his Los Angeles office, said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

The Democrats' English-language response will be given by newly inaugurated Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine.

New name, game

An advocacy group that fought President Bush's Social Security reforms and Republican efforts to cut entitlement spending is now changing its name and going after Republicans on corruption charges.

Americans United to Protect Social Security -- an umbrella organization for about 200 liberal advocacy groups -- is retooling as Americans United. "We are shortening our name and expanding our scope," the group said yesterday in announcing a $1 million ad campaign focusing on the legal troubles of various Republicans, including Rep. Tom DeLay and lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The National Republican Congressional Committee noted the change and said Democrats are outsourcing their agenda. "National Democrats are at it again," read an NRCC statement. "Before Thanksgiving, they punted on presenting voters with their agenda for 2006. Now, they are hiding behind a shadow group that can accept unlimited donations to advance Democrat ideals, whatever those are."

Gloomy prognosis

Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell says the United States is losing its edge in the global economy and needs to spend $100 billion to recover its advantage, reports Donald Lambro of The Washington Times.

Mr. Rendell, the Democratic Governors' Association's finance chairman, presented a lengthy list of economic reforms on trade, education, health care and energy at a National Press Club news conference Tuesday. On behalf of the DGA, Mr. Rendell hoped President Bush will consider including the reforms in his State of the Union proposals next week.

"Sadly, America is losing its competitive edge," Mr. Rendell said, pointing to U.S. dependence on foreign oil, a declining number of engineers and science graduates, skyrocketing health care costs and a mushrooming trade deficit.

DGA proposals call for increased spending for higher teacher salaries, alternative sources of energy, a health care tax credit for businesses who offer worker health care coverage, and a "level playing field" in global trade.

But when a reporter asked how the United States could be losing its edge when it has stronger scores in technology development, employment, incomes, economic growth and trade exports than the rest of the major industrialized nations, Mr. Rendell dismissed those factors. "The trend line is getting worse," he said.

Hillary's numbers

Only 16 percent of voters say they would vote for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for president in 2008, while 51 percent said they definitely would vote against the New York Democrat, according to a CNN-Gallup poll.

Thirty-two percent said they might consider voting for Mrs. Clinton.

However, the poll offered Mrs. Clinton little encouragement in seeking crossover votes: 90 percent of Republicans said there was no chance they would support her.

Bennett to CNN

William J. Bennett, radio talk-show host and former secretary of education, will join CNN as an analyst and commentator for various programs, the network announced yesterday.

CNN-U.S. President Jon Klein said Mr. Bennett will be one of CNN's political commentators as part of the network's continuing effort to bring a broad range of perspectives to its viewers. The network in recent days also hired former Rep. J.C. Watts, Oklahoma Republican, to do analysis and commentary.

DOJ_NMG_0012238

Dead To The World (NYT)

By Felix G. Rohatyn

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DURING my four years as the American ambassador to France, I discovered that no single issue was viewed with as much hostility as our support for the death penalty. Outlawed by every member of the European Union, the death penalty was, and is, viewed in Europe as a throwback to the Middle Ages. When we require European support on security issues — Iran's nuclear program; the war in Iraq; North Korea's bomb; relations with China and Russia; the Middle East peace process — our job is made more difficult by the intensity of popular opposition in Europe to our policy.

Several years ago, Justice Anthony Kennedy spoke to the senior staff of our embassy in Paris on this issue to help them explain our position to a very hostile French audience. I was agreeably surprised when he indicated his belief that sooner or later, we would have to take into account the views of Europeans in determining what constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment."

Last March, the Supreme Court, in a 5 to 4 decision, abolished capital punishment for juvenile offenders, concluding that the death penalty for minors is indeed cruel and unusual punishment. "Our determination," Justice Kennedy wrote in the majority decision, "finds confirmation in the stark reality that the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty."

While, unsurprisingly, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas dissented, it is notable that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor agreed with Justice Kennedy that international trends affect the meaning of "cruel and unusual punishment." Justices Scalia and Thomas, on the other hand, took the majority to task for taking "guidance from the views of foreign courts and legislators."

This attitude, reflecting a narrow and parochial view of the issue, is also found in Judge Samuel Alito's testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on his nomination to the Supreme Court: "I don't think it appropriate or useful to look to foreign law in interpreting the provisions of our Constitution. I think the framers would be stunned by the idea that the Bill of Rights is to be interpreted by taking a poll of countries of the world."

To the contrary, globalization has made it not only "appropriate or useful" but vital to look at foreign laws. It is in our interest to be aware of their impact whether they concern antitrust, food safety or the death penalty. Contempt for the laws of our allies is a major factor in our increasing isolation in the world; our present posture in Iraq reflects that reality. That is why is it is deeply troubling that the next member of the Supreme Court will most likely share Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas's point of view.

The Supreme Court is our most respected institution. Whether it is conservative or liberal is important; but it is even more important that it be enlightened. It must show understanding, if not respect, for other peoples' beliefs and laws, and occasionally be willing to support reasonable changes. Our Constitution, itself, was an extension of Enlightenment ideas that were incubated on the Continent. It certainly did not spring up in a vacuum, but was affected by strains of political thinking in Europe.

"That our understanding of the Constitution does change from time to time has been settled since John Marshall breathed life into its text," Justice John Paul Stevens wrote last year, concurring with Justice Kennedy. Taking the views of 450 million Europeans into account is not a sign of weakness on our part, nor is it a commitment to change our views. It is simply recognition that the laws of our most important allies, our biggest foreign investors, foreign employers, foreign customers and trading partners are worthy of our attention. That is a sign of enlighten- ment.

OTHER NEWS:

Home Sales Drop 3rd Month In Row Market Cooling Off Faster Than Expected (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third-consecutive month, in a surprisingly sharp drop that signaled the housing market is cooling off faster than expected.

Home resales declined 5.7% from November to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.6 million, the slowest since March 2004, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Western states, notably California, suffered the worst, with home sales in the region skidding 11.4% from November and from December 2004.

“We got to 6.6 sooner than I expected. I hadn't expected that for two or three months,” said David Lereah, chief economist for the NAR, who conceded that his forecast for 2006 might now be too optimistic. He had predicted sales of existing homes would drop 5% this year, from a record 7.07 million in 2005. The rise in home prices, meanwhile, will slow to 6% this year from 12.7% in 2005, he projected.

DOJ_NMG_0012239

Home buyers shelled out $211,000 for a median-priced home in December, an increase of 10.5% from the year before. But rising mortgage rates are pricing many would-be buyers out of the market, Lereah said.

The average rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage was 6.27% in December, up from last year's low of 5.53% in July. The Mortgage Bankers Association predicted Wednesday that the average 30-year fixed loan would hit a high of 6.4% in the second half of this year and stay there until the end of 2007.

That's bad news, in particular, for buyers in California, where prices have skyrocketed. The median price there for a single-family home was $548,430 last month, up 15.6% over a year earlier. Many buyers can afford to buy a home only with a riskier adjustable-rate or interest-only mortgage.

Leslie Appleton-Young, chief economist for the California Association of Realtors, had been projecting over the past 18 months that the market would slow. Now that it has, the drop is deeper than she expected.

In addition to higher mortgage rates, Appleton-Young blamed high oil prices and weak consumer confidence for the cooling of California's housing market.

But after the feeding frenzy in the California market for most of last year, the recent trend has restored sanity to the home-buying process, said Lisa Strong, an agent for Lyon Real Estate in Sacramento. “There are no fights anymore” among competing buyers and their agents, she said.

In the South, sales of existing homes dropped 7.2%, and sales slipped 2.6% in the Midwest, from November levels. Sales were flat in the Northeast.

“They were disappointing, clearly, but not a catastrophe,” said Phillip Neuhart, an analyst for Wachovia. “You have to put this into perspective: 6.6 million is historically a high level. We're expecting a soft landing. We're not expecting a crash.”

Homes Sales Fell In December; A Record Still Set (WSJ)

By Joi Preciphs

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Sales of existing homes fell in December to their lowest level in three months, but they still set a record for the year.

The National Association of Realtors said nationwide sales of previously owned homes fell 5.7% to an annual rate of 6.60 million last month from November's revised annual rate of 7.0 million. Analysts had projected a 6.87 million sales rate in the existing-home market, which includes single-family residences, condominiums, townhomes and co-ops.

The national median price for existing homes of all types in December was $211,000, down from an unrevised $215,000 in November, but up 10.5% from December 2004. The inventory of homes on the market increased slightly to a 5.1 months' supply last month, compared with 5.0 months in November.

The pattern was mixed regionally, with sales falling 11.4% in the West, 7.2% in the South, and 2.6% in the Midwest. Sales in the Northeast were unchanged.

Patrick Newport, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight in Waltham, Mass., said in a statement that the movement of interest rates is cooling the housing market and will continue to do so in 2006.

Read the complete text1 of the National Association of Realtors report on December existing-home sales and analysis2 from Briefing.com.

"Interest rates have eased in recent weeks, but we are expecting them to drift back up over the first half of 2006," he said, adding that if the Federal Reserve raises interest rates two more times before pausing, the increases "will cool off the housing market and deflate many local housing bubbles."

Mr. Newport doesn't expect the market to collapse anytime soon. The first casualties might come in places like the condo market, where the inventory of unsold homes jumped 8% last month. Sales of existing condominiums and co-ops increased a modest 1.6% in December, according to the NAR report.

Financial institutions have been keeping a watchful eye on the condo market and in some cases have scaled back lending for new condo developments. "We see risk of a substantial condo-price decline in certain frothy markets, based on record high inventory levels and the recent rapid price appreciation in condos," said Banc of America Securities analyst Daniel Oppenheim.

Despite the apparent slowing, existing-home sales for the year reached 7.072 million units, setting their fifth successive annual record, the NAR said. Home prices still remain strong, despite some softening. Given these factors, NAR Chief Economist David Lereah said in a statement that there is a "soft landing in sight for the housing sector."

"The level of home-sales activity is now at a sustainable level, and is likely to pick up a bit in the months ahead," Mr. Lereah said, adding that he expects the 2006 housing market to "remain historically high but lower" than 2005.

The recent boost in mortgage applications might suggest a "partial rebound in sales is directly ahead," Banc of America Securities economist Gary Bigg said. Mortgage giant Freddie Mac said the average 30-year fixed-rate mortgage was 6.27% last month, down from November's 6.33%.

DOJ_NMG_0012240

Write to Joi Preciphs at joi.preciphs@dowjones.com3

Home Sales Fell Again In December (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third consecutive month, a trade group reported yesterday, even as the housing market registered a fifth consecutive year of increased sales.

The data appear to suggest that the era of rapidly increasing sales may be coming to a close. Sales in December fell 5.7 percent, to an annual pace of 6.6 million homes, after a 1.3 percent dip in November and a 2.7 percent drop in October. It was the lowest level of sales since March 2004.

Sales of existing homes fell or stayed flat in all four regions of the country, while the total inventory of homes for sale dipped slightly, the National Association of Realtors reported. Median prices — half the homes sold for less, half for more — were up 10.5 percent, to $211,000, from a year earlier.

For the year, home sales grew 4.2 percent, to 7.07 million, setting another record. The nation's long housing boom is almost a decade old, with the exception of 2000, when sales fell by 0.4 percent.

"The housing boom in the United States is over," said Lynn Reaser, the chief economist for Bank of America's investment strategies group. "It at this point appears to be on the soft-landing plane, with sales slowing, some growth of inventory and sellers not receiving their full asking price."

The economy has become increasingly dependent on the growth generated by home sales, mortgage refinancings and related spending. A housing slowdown is figuring prominently into many analysts' forecasts for slower economic growth in 2006.

But forecasters have pronounced an end to the boom before and were proved wrong. Mortgage interest rates, though higher than a year ago, remain near historical lows, making home ownership more affordable for many. The average interest rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage was 6.1 percent last week, up from 5.71 percent in January 2005, according to Freddie Mac.

Economists say the sharpness of the current slowdown, and whether it will become more severe, will not become clear until the peak spring and summer home-buying season.

Prices in markets on the coasts that have experienced sharp increases will be an important barometer for the housing market this year, along with mortgage delinquencies and foreclosures, said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research. Prices, though still higher than a year ago, did not rise as fast in December as they did earlier in 2005.

Officials with the Realtors' group said a fundamentally strong economy and housing demand would help keep home sales generally steady, but even they acknowledged that the market had changed. "Clearly the air is coming out of the balloon," David A. Lereah, chief economist for the Realtors association, said, according to Bloomberg News. "We're transferring from a sellers' market to a buyers' market." The association expects sales to drop 4.4 percent in 2006.

December sales dropped the most in the West, 11.4 percent, followed by the South at 7.2 percent and the Midwest at 2.6 percent. Sales activity in the Northeast was unchanged from November.

Nationwide, the number of homes available for sale dropped to 2.8 million at the end of December, from 2.9 million, but because of the slower pace of sales, that represented 5.1-month supply of homes, up from a five-month supply in November.

Weaker Outlook For Homes And Oil Profits End A Rally (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

By Bloomberg News

Stocks ended a two-day rally yesterday as a worsening profit outlook for oil companies and homebuilders, two of the market's best performers during the last 12 months, sent prices lower.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 2.18 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1,264.68, its first drop this week. The Nasdaq composite index lost 4.60 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,260.65. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 2.48 points, or less than 0.1 percent, to 10,709.74, helped by a gain in General Motors.

Some 1.93 billion shares changed hands on the New York Stock Exchange, 20 percent more than the three-month average, as investors dealt with a flurry of earnings reports. About six stocks fell for every five that rose on the Big Board.

About 37 percent of the companies that have reported earnings so far have failed to surpass analysts' estimates. For the same quarter last year, 34 percent missed or met forecasts, according to a Bloomberg analysis of Thomson Financial data.

"Earnings are not bad, but they're just not as good as they have been," said Robert C. Doll, who oversees $539 billion as president and chief investment officer of Merrill Lynch Investment Managers in Plainsboro, N.J. "We've gotten so used to them being better than expected, and now that they've returned to normal, the market is struggling with that."

DOJ_NMG_0012241

More than 140 companies in the S.& P. 500 release results this week, the busiest period for fourth-quarter earnings. The S.& P. 500 is down 2.3 percent from a four-year high reached on Jan. 11, just before the bulk of the index's members began reporting.

United States Treasuries fell the most since November after the government's $22 billion two-year note sale drew the weakest demand in nine months. By late in the day, the price of the benchmark 10-year note fell 21/32, to 1006/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, rose to 4.48 percent, from 4.39 percent on Tuesday.

Crude oil for March delivery lost 1.2 percent, to $65.85 a barrel, after an Energy Department report showed that supplies of gasoline and distillate fuel rose for a fourth consecutive week.

Shares of the oil company ConocoPhillips fell 94 cents, to $63.54, even after the company reported that its profit last quarter jumped 51 percent, to $3.68 billion, or $2.61 a share.

Amerada Hess, another oil company, gained $1.86, to $148.47. The company said fourth-quarter profit increased 97 percent, to $452 million, or $4.31 a share.

Exxon Mobil, which is set to report earnings on Jan. 30, fell 75 cents, to $60.21. The S.& P. 500 Energy Index lost 1.8 percent, cutting its 12-month advance to 41 percent.

Sales of previously owned homes declined for a third consecutive month in December, sliding 5.7 percent to a 6.60 million annual rate, the National Association of Realtors said.

"The housing news was the big setback," said Jack A. Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank, which manages $44 billion in Chicago. "While we suspect that housing is likely to slow and thereby take the primary catalyst away from consumer spending, the number came in worse than expected and forced investors to face reality much sooner."

A gauge of homebuilding stocks in S.& P. indexes dropped 2.4 percent, paring its 12-month rise to 15 percent.

Toll Brothers, the nation's largest builder of luxury homes, lost 59 cents, to $34.02. D. R. Horton, the country's No. 1 homebuilder over all, fell 78 cents, to $37.20.

Here are the results of yesterday's auction of two-year Treasure notes:

Concerns Of Slowdown (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Lower oil prices and signs of a softening housing market battled for control of the market Wednesday, sending stocks on a string of sharp jumps and sudden drops that left the major indexes where they began the day.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, which at times was up as much as 48.45 points and down as much as 39.62, finished off just 2.48 at 10709.74. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 2.18 to 1264.68 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 4.60 to 2260.65.

Also worrying equity investors: A steep jump in bond yields after a weak reception to an auction of two-year Treasury notes. Analysts said buyers were shying away from bonds ahead of next Tuesday's meeting by the Federal Reserve. The jump in yields came as especially unsettling news on a day that investors were jittery about the housing market.

At first, it appeared stocks would rack up a third-consecutive day of gains since last Friday's 200-point gut check in the Dow. But a report by the National Association of Realtors said existing home sales fell a steeper-than-expected 5.7%, the third straight decline in a row. That took the wind out of stocks, since the housing market has been a big driver of the economy, said Jay Suskind, director of trading at Ryan Beck. The Philadelphia Housing Sector Index fell 1.6%, led by steep declines by components Centex and Hovnanian Enterprises.

The market righted itself after a government report showed a build in inventories of distillate fuels, including heating oil used to warm many homes in the Northeast U.S. Light, sweet crude-oil prices tumbled $1.21 to $65.85 on the New York Mercantile Exchange, on top of yesterday's $1.04 slide. Housing versus oil "caused the market to rollercoaster," Mr. Suskind said.

There could be a bright side to housing news, though. The Fed, which has had the housing market on its radar, could be encouraged by coolness in housing sales, said Stuart Freeman, chief investment officer of A.G. Edwards. "It's good to see a little weakness in housing here," he said. "It makes it more likely that the Fed will stop raising rates soon."

Policy markers meet Tuesday to decide whether to raise rates from their current level of 4.25%. It will be the last meeting chaired by Alan Greenspan, who's set to be replaced by Ben Bernanke.

Among major stock movers: Boston Scientific slumped 1.5% on news that its $27 billion bid for Guidant won out over Johnson & Johnson's $24.2 billion offer. J&J's shares finished down by 1.5% and Guidant fell 2%. Walt Disney fell 2.1% on news it sealed a deal to buy Pixar for $7.4 billion, though the stock ran up gains of 6.2% this year on previous reports of the deal. Pixar's shares, which were flat Wednesday, have gained about 10% this year on the deal talk.

DOJ_NMG_0012242

Bristol-Myers Squibb shares rose 2.6% after reporting earnings that, excluding items, topped Wall Street's expectations. Xerox slid 1% after it posted net income of 32 cents a share for the fourth quarter, meeting analyst expectations, but revenue of $4.25 billion fell short of the $4.42 million Wall Street expected.

In major market action:

Stocks were mixed8. On the Big Board, where 1.9 billion shares traded, 1,555 stocks rose and 1,814 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.1 billion shares traded, 1,262 rose and 1,762 declined.

Bonds declined9. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note lost 22/32 point, or $6.88 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.477%. The 30-year bond fell 1 11/32 to yield 4.656%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar gained.10 It traded at 114.71 yen, up from 114.59 yen late Tuesday, while the euro fell to $1.2245 from $1.2282.

Weak Earnings Reports Soften Stocks (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

NEW YORK — U.S. stocks ended slightly lower Wednesday, hurt by signs of slackening corporate profit growth and a slowdown in existing home sales.

Shares of copier company Xerox and candymaker Hershey both declined after the companies each reported revenue that fell short of Wall Street estimates, overshadowing gains in profit.

"The market has focused on disappointing earnings or disappointing guidance about future earnings of just a handful of companies," says Brian Gendreau, strategist at ING Investment Management. "When there's any hint that we're at the peak of earnings growth, the market gets pummeled."

The Dow Jones industrial average was down 2.48 points at 10,709.74. The Standard & Poor's 500 fell 2.18 points to 1264.68. The Nasdaq composite was down 4.60 points at 2260.65.

The market has struggled since last Friday, when U.S. stocks suffered their biggest loss in nearly three years after several earnings reports missed estimates and crude oil prices surged.

Data showing softer-than-expected U.S. existing home sales also sparked some caution and dimmed hopes of a strong market rebound after U.S. stocks' slide last week. U.S. Treasury bond prices fell for the second-consecutive day on unusually heavy volume, driving the yield of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note up to 4.48% in its biggest one-day gain in six months.

Shares of Xerox fell 15 cents to $14.31, while Hershey lost $1.80 to $52.30 as investors focused on their disappointing revenue. They followed other big companies, including Johnson & Johnson, IBM, Motorola and General Electric, that have delivered sour sales news in their earnings reports.

Norfolk Southern jumped $1.84 to $47.64 after it became the latest railroad to deliver stellar results with a 37% gain in fourth-quarter earnings. U.S. railroads have seen demand and revenue soar in the past two years and last year significantly raised prices for the first time since rail freight was deregulated in 1980. Among other rallying railroads, Burlington Northern Santa Fe rose 88 cents to $75.68, and CSX gained $1.65 to $52.40.

·CNF skidded $5.41, or 10%, to $50.51 after the trucking company posted weaker-than-expected results and forecast a disappointing quarter.

·Colgate-Palmolive climbed $1.90 to $55.65. The consumer products company reported 26% higher fourth-quarter profit — the first time in two years it has topped expectations.

·St. Jude Medical fell $3.27 to $50.03. The medical device maker said fourth-quarter sales of its devices to treat irregular heartbeats were lower than expected.

Greenspan To Set Up A Consulting Firm (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan plans to set up a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, in Washington, D.C., after he leaves the Fed at the end of the month, according to people familiar with the matter.

In addition to consulting, Mr. Greenspan plans to give speeches and write a book, these people say.

One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said yesterday will leave her job as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. Ms. Smith joined the Fed as communications director in 2001 after serving as press secretary to Clinton Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers. She served in effect as Mr. Greenspan's chief of staff, advising him on relations with the public, politicians and the media, Fed insiders say. She has also advised Fed policy makers on monetary-policy communications, such as the postmeeting statement and meeting minutes, though not on the formulation of monetary policy itself.

In addition, the Fed said David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesman and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities.

DOJ_NMG_0012243

Greenspan Opposes Bank Loophole (WSJ)

By Bernard Wysocki Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan is opposing a regulatory loophole that allows corporations to own banks, thrusting himself into the middle of an effort by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to establish a bank.

Mr. Greenspan's salvo, outlined in a 12-page letter to Congress that was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, is the latest in a controversy over the separation of commerce and banking. Wal-Mart, the Bentonville, Ark., retailer, is trying to obtain a state banking charter in Utah, using precisely the exemption in the banking laws opposed by Mr. Greenspan.

His remarks, reiterating and expanding on previous comments, could be Mr. Greenspan's last major statement to Congress as Fed chairman. The 79-year-old Mr. Greenspan, who took office in 1987, is scheduled to step down Jan. 31.

Wal-Mart officials say the Utah bank would be a back-office processing center, handling debit-card, credit-card and electronic check-transfer payments by customers at its stores. A third party currently processes the transactions -- estimated at 140 million a month -- and bringing the work in-house would save Wal-Mart money. Company officials repeatedly have said they don't plan to establish bank branches. Under current law, these state-chartered banks, many incorporated in Utah, may open branches in more than 20 states and the District of Columbia.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation must rule on Wal-Mart's application for deposit insurance for the proposed bank. In the past six months, more than 1,500 comments have been filed with the FDIC about Wal-Mart's application. Last week, in a letter to members of Congress, the FDIC said it would wait for a full board, including a new chairman, before voting, and would probably hold hearings beforehand.

THE FULL LETTER

Read Greenspan's letter1 to Congress. (Adobe Acrobat required2.)

In his letter, sent Jan. 20 in response to questions from Rep. Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican and member of the House Financial Services Committee, Mr. Greenspan doesn't single out Wal-Mart's application for criticism but mentions it along with the names of other big companies that have established industrial-loan corporations -- or industrial banks, as these state-chartered financial institutions are sometimes called.

General Electric Co., Volkswagen AG, General Motors Corp., Merrill Lynch & Co. and Pitney Bowes Inc. all own industrial-loan corporations. Mr. Greenspan cited in his letter the sharp growth in such corporations, known as ILCs, noting that assets have grown to $140 billion in 2004 from $3.8 billion in 1987 when the current law created the industrial-loan exemption.

"The ILC exemption is now the primary means by which commercial firms may control an FDIC-insured bank engaged in broad lending and deposit-taking activities and thereby breach the general separation of banking and commerce," Mr. Greenspan's letter said. He warned that the growing use of the loophole is "undermining the prudential framework that Congress has carefully crafted and developed" to oversee financial institutions.

Mr. Greenspan's letter noted that the parent companies of these industrial-loan entities escape the regulatory scrutiny of bank holding companies, which must operate under the supervisory authority of the Fed. In uncharacteristically blunt language, Mr. Greenspan urged Congress to close the loophole, which he said "provides the corporate owners of exempt ILCs a significant competitive advantage over other types of banking institutions, and creates an unlevel competitive playing field among banking organizations."

In an interview, Mr. Leach, the former chairman of the House banking committee, said he considered Mr. Greenspan's letter significant.

"It's very comprehensive. It is a very considered Federal Reserve position on the issue. And it is a stark warning to the Congress" about the need to separate commerce and banking, Mr. Leach said. "This is not primarily a Wal-Mart issue. It is a 'nature of the American economy' issue."

Mr. Leach, the co-author of landmark 1999 banking legislation breaking down Depression-era laws separating securities and banking, has long warned against emulating Japan, where the lax lending of bank-centered industrial groups, called "keiretsu," contributed to the 1980s economic bubble and the sharp economic downturn of the past 15 years. The 1999 Gramm-Leach-Bliley law allowed linkups among banking, securities and insurance but largely ruled out combinations involving nonfinancial institutions' ownership of banks.

In coming out against the ILC loophole, and by implication against Wal-Mart's bid for a bank, Mr. Greenspan has parted company with some free-market advocates who believe that a Wal-Mart bank, if it did turn into a retail-banking powerhouse, would encourage competition in the financial-services field, and would ultimately lower costs to consumers.

To some experts, Mr. Greenspan's opposition to the industrial banks is largely based on maintaining the Fed's power amid constant inside-the-Beltway turf battles.

DOJ_NMG_0012244

The FDIC, which regulates the industrial banks, says it has all the tools it needs to supervise these entities for safety and soundness. The Fed, which oversees bank holding companies, says that loophole leaves the banking system exposed to risk since no financial regulators have oversight of the parent company.

"If Wal-Mart acquired an Industrial Loan Company, its primary prudential banking regulator would be the FDIC, not the Fed," Charles Calomiris, a professor at Columbia University's business school, wrote in a recent paper. "This could lead to a major incursion on the Fed's regulatory turf if nonfinancial firms entered in significant number and were regulated by the FDIC, a form of regulatory competition that would be welcomed by historians of bank regulation, but not by the Fed."

A spokesman for the Fed said it couldn't comment on whether incoming Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke would endorse every word of Mr. Greenspan's comments. However, the spokesman said other Fed officials have made similar comments, as official Fed positions, during the time Mr. Bernanke was a Fed official.

Many banking organizations oppose Wal-Mart because they fear its strength, and believe it would compete unfairly. "The Wal-Mart bank would have no incentive -- in fact it would have a disincentive -- to lend to businesses that compete with its parent company," said David Hayes, president of a small bank in Dyersburg, Tenn., and chairman of the Independent Community Bankers of America, in testimony before a congressional committee in October.

Wal-Mart has made numerous efforts to get into banking. In 1999, the company tried to buy a savings and loan in Oklahoma, but failed. Four years ago, the retailer struck a partnership with a Canadian bank to open branches in 100 U.S. Wal-Mart stores. The U.S. Office of Thrift Supervision rejected the application, claiming it crossed the line between banking and commerce. Two years ago, Wal-Mart tried to buy the Franklin Bank, an industrial bank in California, only to be thwarted when the state passed a law barring bank purchases by nonfinancial companies.

Skepticism Greeted Greenspan, Too Bernanke's Fed Chief Tenure Begins Similarly To Predecessor's (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors jittery about how incoming Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke will pan out can take some solace — folks weren't sure some guy named Alan Greenspan was up to snuff either.

Investors didn't take the news so well on the day in June 1987 when Paul Volcker announced he was leaving the Fed after eight years and Greenspan was named to his position. Bond markets took their worst one-day beating in more than five years, and the dollar fell.

“The new chairman cannot just pick up Mr. Volcker's wealth of experience or his worldwide network of trust and respect,” The New York Times said in an editorial at the time.

“Mr. Greenspan faces a daunting challenge in proving to the financial markets that he is a worthy replacement for the outgoing Fed chief,” The Wall Street Journal said in an article.

“Greenspan … will soon get his turn on the monetary tightrope,” an article in U.S. News and World Report said. “If he keeps his cool, it could be a great act. But the risks of a nasty spill are also considerable.”

Bernanke, a former Fed governor and current head of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, will take over at the Fed next week after Greenspan presides over his last policymaking meeting on Tuesday.

In many ways, Bernanke — although widely respected in economic circles — is more of an unknown to the public than Greenspan was in 1987. Greenspan in the early 1980s was chairman of a widely watched panel on reforming Social Security. He also served as chairman of the CEA for 21/2 years in the mid-1970s during President Ford's public “Whip Inflation Now” campaign. Greenspan also did numerous media interviews as head of a successful economic consulting firm.

Bernanke has served as chairman of the CEA only since June. Before that, he was a Fed governor for nearly three years and head of Princeton University's economics department. His only other public service was on a local school board.

But no matter how well they knew Greenspan, people in 1987 were still nervous about him taking over the Fed. The concerns:

·International. Although Greenspan had a solid reputation as an economist, some worried that he lacked experience on the international stage. Although calling Greenspan an “excellent choice,” BusinessWeek magazine in an editorial said he “lacks Volcker's worldwide stature.”

·Political. Still others questioned whether Greenspan was too political. He, like Bernanke, had served as CEA chairman. With an election a little more than a year away, some commentators in 1987 questioned if Greenspan would not take the necessary steps to squeeze out inflation in an attempt to juice up the economy to keep a Republican in the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0012245

·Mythical. And some questioned if Greenspan could fill the shoes of Volcker, who had become so revered and trusted that one economist in a Wall Street Journal article referred to him as a “financial demigod.”

“We were nervous for all the reasons we're probably nervous about Bernanke,” says Hugh Johnson, chairman of Johnson Illington Advisors, a money management company in Albany, N.Y.

“Paul Volcker was something of an icon for the financial markets,” Johnson recalls. “The financial markets are always uncomfortable with change. … Just as we were nervous about moving beyond Volcker, we're nervous about moving beyond Greenspan.”

Several economists even warned Greenspan's appointment raised the risk a recession would hit the U.S. economy. As an economic consultant, Greenspan himself had predicted just a few months before his appointment to the chairmanship that a recession was likely coming in the not-so-distant future.

Marshall Vest was one of the economists who was quoted as saying Greenspan's arrival raised the chances of a recession in a USA TODAY article. Eighteen years later, Vest, now director of economic and business research at the Eller College of Management at the University of Arizona, says it's hard to imagine being worried about Greenspan's talents.

“I would give him very high marks,” he says. “The economy has been much less volatile and much more predictable under his watch.”

Former San Francisco Fed president Robert Parry says it's quite possible Bernanke, like Greenspan, will develop the larger-than-life reputation enjoyed by the two chairmen before him.

“I don't know if I would have said in August of '87 that Greenspan would have developed this aura as well,” Parry says. “You just didn't know that at the time. … In some respects, if you were to base it on training and area of expertise, experience … you'd have to say Bernanke has a real shot of continuing to receive that kind of aura.”

Said Princeton University economists Alan Blinder and Ricardo Reis in a paper delivered at a conference on Greenspan's legacy in August: “Back in 1987, the financial markets viewed the impending retirement of Paul Volcker as tantamount to the end of civilization as they knew it. But they got over it, as they will in 2006.”

Dow Chemical Is Ordered To Pay In 'Janitors' Case (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

A federal appeals court ruled Dow Chemical Co. is liable for $22.2 million in back taxes and interest for claiming tax-income losses on thousands of life-insurance policies it took out on its employees.

The decision Monday by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, reverses a district-court ruling in 2003 that Dow Chemical's company-owned life-insurance plans were legitimate business transactions. The ruling is a victory for the Internal Revenue Service, which for the past decade has been cracking down on companies that take out life-insurance policies on their executives and employees, often without their knowledge, in order to reduce their corporate-tax bill. Of employers contesting the IRS stance, only Dow Chemical had prevailed in court, and a spokeswoman said the Midland, Mich., chemicals manufacturer continues to weigh its options for a possible appeal.

With such company-owned life insurance -- known as "janitors insurance" because it covered everyone including the janitors -- employers aimed to generate tax deductions with minimal cash outlay. They did this by taking a tax deduction for the interest they paid on loans taken out against the insurance policies, while allowing the policy to build value tax-free. The tactic was the subject of a series of articles in The Wall Street Journal in 2002.

Several companies using janitors insurance have settled or lost cases brought by the IRS, including Winn-Dixie Stores Inc., CM Holdings Inc. and American Electric Power Co. In these cases, the courts ruled that the company-owned life-insurance policies had no other economic value other than creating a tax loss.

The IRS disallows these types of tax shelters in part because it wouldn't make financial sense to engage in them without the tax implications.

Dow Chemical's plan worked much like the others, but the company chose not to settle with the IRS.

"We believe that Corporate Owned Life Insurance policies had economic substance, as the District Court held. We are currently reviewing the opinion with our legal counsel," said Terri F. McNeill, a Dow Chemical spokeswoman. "Once we better understand the basis of the decision and have gauged its implications, we will decide on the most appropriate course of action going forward."

Dow Chemical could appeal this decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

From 1988 to 1991, Dow Chemical purchased life insurance on 21,112 employees. The company was both the owner and beneficiary of these policies. It paid the premiums using a complicated system of loans that used the policies as collateral, taking cash withdrawals from some of the policies.

DOJ_NMG_0012246

In the tax years 1988-1991, the chemical company claimed deductions totaling $33 million for interest paid on the loans used to pay the janitors-insurance-plan premiums and for fees related to the administration of the policies.

The IRS, arguing that the policies were a sham and purchased explicitly to create income-tax losses, disallowed the deduction. It assessed back taxes and interests totaling $22.2 million.

Many large companies throughout the 1980s and 1990s purchased janitors insurance policies. Congress started to phase out the interest deduction on many of the janitors-insurance policy plans beginning in 1996.

Embattled Rep. Ney To Seek Re-Election (AP-Y2)

By David Hammer

AP2, January 26, 2006

Undaunted by speculation within his own party that he may have to quit Congress because of a corruption probe, Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record) announced Wednesday he's running for re-election.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign and I am ready for the fight," said Ney, R-Ohio. He planned to hold his first formal campaign event Thursday.

Ney's popularity has hardly dimmed in his expansive rural district, even after he was identified in disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea as the central figure in Abramoff's scheme to bribe members of Congress.

Supporters of Ney have been unfazed by Ohio party chairman Bob Bennett's pronouncement last week that Ney should resign if he's indicted.

Bennett attempted to soften his nationally televised comments Friday by noting Ney hadn't been charged with a crime, but he later reiterated that Ney should leave Congress if the Justice Department files criminal charges against him.

Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who also had ties to Abramoff, stepped down temporarily as majority leader last year when he was indicted on unrelated charges in Texas, then made it permanent after the Abramoff guilty plea. But he has not relinquished his House seat.

Earlier this month, Ney temporarily stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee. He acknowledged that his ties to Abramoff were a distraction from his duties, particularly as Republicans push an ethics reform agenda — part of which must be implemented by the Administration Committee.

But Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said no such distraction has affected Ney's work for his district, where he's known for hands-on constituent service and independence from GOP trade and labor policies.

Two Republican members of Congress have moved early to dissociate themselves from Ney. Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida gave away $2,500 he had received from Ney and Rep. Charles Boustany of Louisiana shed $10,000 Ney gave him. Ney's political action committee gave money to both lawmakers shortly before the 2004 elections.

Congressman Tied To Lobbying Inquiry To Seek Re-election (NYT)

By Christine Hauser

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Representative Bob Ney, a lawmaker from Ohio who became a target of the broad Justice Department inquiry into corruption and influence-peddling in Washington, said today that he will seek re-election.

A spokesman said Mr. Ney planned to make an official announcement on Thursday when he kicks off his campaign.

"He is filing the petitions to be on the ballot tomorrow and holding an event with a few hundred supporters tomorrow evening," a spokesman for Mr. Ney, Brian J. Walsh, said by telephone.

Mr. Ney said in a statement today that the campaign this year promises to be a "vigorous" one "and I am ready for the fight."

"I look forward to joining my friends and supporters, including the many state and local officials backing my re-election bid, as we kick off the 2006 campaign this Thursday and Friday," he said.

Mr. Ney is referred to as "Representative No. 1" in court documents filed in connection with the corruption scandal surrounding the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Democrats have attacked Mr. Ney over accusations that he assisted Mr. Abramoff in exchange for gifts and travel.

Mr. Ney temporarily relinquished his chairmanship of the House Administration Committee, acknowledging that his association with Mr. Abramoff was becoming a distraction for the Republican Party. As chairman, he would also be at the center of efforts to revise Congressional ethics rules, which members of both parties are proposing.

Mr. Ney and his lawyers say they will offer evidence to counter the accusations by Mr. Abramoff, who agreed to testify in the corruption case in exchange for a reduced sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0012247

His supporters have been unfazed by the pronouncement by the Ohio party chairman, Bob Bennett, last week that Mr. Ney should resign if he is indicted, The Associated Press reported today.

Mr. Ney represents the mainly blue-collar district in eastern Ohio.

The statement from his office said he would announce his re-election bid at a campaign rally in Dover tomorrow evening and then travel to the southern part of the district for a second rally in Chillicothe on Friday at noon.

West Virginia: Late Senate Race Entry For GOP Media Mogul (RC)

Roll Call, January 26, 2006

With the filing deadline for federal candidates set to pass Saturday, Senate Republicans finally have lured a potentially top-tier challenger into the race against Sen. Robert Byrd (D).

Millionaire media mogul John Raese (R) filed candidacy papers Wednesday and will announce today that he is trying to unseat Byrd, who is set to become the longest-serving Senator in history later this spring.

Raese, who splits his time between homes in Palm Beach, Fla. and Morgantown, W.Va., is a former West Virginia Republican Party chairman.

He currently serves as chairman of West Virginia Radio Corp., president and CEO of Greer Industries Inc., which produces steel and limestone, and vice president of West Virginia Newspaper Publishing Co. He is expected to spend personal resources in the contest.

"John has a great opportunity to become the next Senator from West Virginia," National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) said in a statement. "He will represent the state's mainstream values and bring fresh leadership to the United States Senate."

He is also no stranger to campaigning.

Raese ran for Senate in 1984, losing an open-seat contest to now-Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D) 52 percent to 48 percent. Raese was outspent by a 12-1 margin in that contest.

He later challenged then-Gov. Arch Moore (R) in the 1988 GOP primary, losing to the incumbent 53 percent to 47 percent.

Since the beginning of the cycle National Republicans have been desperately trying to generate a competitive race for Byrd, suffering several recruiting setbacks in the process.

— Lauren W. Whittington

MINNESOTA

All Eyes on Ciresi, Who Is Expected to Enter Race

A wealthy trial attorney may be about to pick the lock that Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar appears to have on the Democratic Senate primary.

Mike Ciresi, who sought the 2000 nomination, said he will announce whether he will try again next week, The Associated Press reported.

Minnesota political observers believe that Ciresi, who has been mulling a Senate bid for a year, will pull the trigger this time.

If he was disinclined to run, he would have just said so, they reason. Instead he told the AP: "I'm very close to announcing what those plans may be."

Ciresi would be wise to enter the race now, as child safety advocate Patty Wetterling dropped her bid last week and is likely to run for lieutenant governor instead. That leaves only under-funded veterinarian Ford Bell to challenge Klobuchar, who seems assured of the Democratic nod unless another heavy-hitter jumps in and mixes things up.

Wetterling endorsed Klobuchar, as did Rep. Betty McCollum (D), after Wetterling withdrew.

Ciresi also said that he "learned the last time around that you don't need to get in too early."

In 2000, now-Sen. Mark Dayton (D) waited until April to decide that he wanted to challenge then-Sen. Rod Grams (R).

Spending lavishly from his personal fortune, Dayton bypassed the state party's nominating process and forced the state party-backed candidate into a primary.

Dayton, who is retiring, will not be in the mix, but Ciresi has the ability to finance a campaign largely from his own wallet. He was the lead lawyer in Minnesota's successful $6.6 billion 1998 settlement with the nation's largest tobacco companies.

No one is seriously challenging Rep. Mark Kennedy for the Republican nomination.

— Nicole Duran

FLORIDA

Castor Has Wide Lead Over Miller in New Poll

A new poll released this week by the campaign of Hillsborough County Commissioner Kathy Castor showed her well-positioned to win the Democratic nomination in the 11th district race to succeed Rep. Jim Davis (D).

DOJ_NMG_0012248

The poll, conducted by The Feldman Group Inc., found that Castor led state Sen. Les Miller (D) 46 percent to 29 percent. The contest also features three lesser-known candidates, who registered a combined 8 percent in the poll.

The survey of 606 likely Democratic primary voters was taken Jan. 10-12. It had a 4 percent margin of error.

Castor, the daughter of 2004 Democratic Senate nominee Betty Castor, has raised $465,000 for the race so far.

"Castor is a popular member of the Hillsborough County Commission with a strong base of her own and also benefits from her mother, Betty Castor's, widespread popularity," pollster Diane Feldman wrote in a polling memo.

The poll also showed that Miller, who has a base in the black community, enjoys some crossover support, as does Castor.

The primary winner is almost certain to win the general election in the Democratic stronghold.

— L.W.W.

OHIO

Ney to Start Re-election Bid With Rally Today

Embattled Rep. Bob Ney (R) will formally kickoff his re-election campaign today at a rally in his district.

"2006 promises to be a vigorous campaign and I am ready for the fight," Ney said in a statement.

Ney has faced increased scrutiny in recent months for his involvement in the scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. His office has acknowledged that he is the "Representative #1" cited in Abramoff's plea bargain agreement.

Under pressure from party leaders, he recently temporarily relinquished the chairmanship of the House Administration Committee. Ney has said repeatedly that he has done nothing improper.

Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer and Dover Law Director Zack Space are vying in the May 2 Democratic primary for the chance to face Ney, who has held the expansive 18th district seat since 1994.

— L.W.W.

MAINE

Key Unions Back Snowe, Who Has No Major Foe

In a move that could dissuade any big-name Democrat from entering the race, Sen. Olympia Snowe (R) secured the endorsement of two major labor groups Wednesday.

The AFL-CIO and the International Federation of Professional & Technical Engineers announced that they would back Snowe in her bid for a third term.

Snowe's work to save the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard during the most recent round of base closings went a long way to help her win the endorsements. Kirk Miller, president of the local engineers union, called Snowe an effective leader on workers' issues.

"Her around-the-clock efforts ... to successfully protect the shipyard from closure last year will never be forgotten," Miller said in a news release.

The moderate Snowe is already a tough target for Democrats, but the AFL-CIO's decision could make it even harder for a top-tier Democrat to raise money.

Snowe had more than $1.6 million in the bank as of Sept. 30.

So far only Bangor lawyer Eric Mehnert and local activist Jean Hay Bright are vying for the Democratic nomination.

State Senate Majority Leader Michael Brennan (D) is still mulling the race.

One Republican, retired high school teacher S. Charles Tamboia is challenging Snowe in the Republican primary.

— N.D.

MICHIGAN

State Right to Life Group Backs Walberg Challenge

Tim Walberg (R) finally got the Michigan Right to Life endorsement he wanted so badly in the 7th district race — he just got it two years late.

In the previous cycle, six Republicans vied for the open 7th district seat. Five, including Walberg, a former state Representative, were social conservatives who desperately wanted the Michigan Right to Life endorsement. Then-state Rep. Clark Bisbee secured the endorsement instead.

Joe Schwarz, then a former state Senator, went on to win the GOP primary and the seat.

Now Walberg is the only Republican challenging Schwarz. With the backing of the Club for Growth and now Michigan Right to Life, Walberg hopes to merge the conservative primary vote, which splintered in 2004 across the five other GOP candidates and take Schwarz down in the primary.

The district is heavily Republican.

— N.D.

PENNSYLVANIA

GOP Hopes Alito Stance Hurts Casey With Base

DOJ_NMG_0012249

State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D) announced late Tuesday that he supports the confirmation of Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court, after weeks of calls from Republicans to take a position on the controversial nominee.

Casey, who is trying to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R) in November, is the first Democratic Senate challenger to come out in support of Alito's confirmation.

The announcement came on the heels of Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell's (D) announcement that he, too, is supportive of Alito, who serves on the Philadelphia-based 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals with Rendell's wife.

Casey's position puts him at odds with abortion-rights advocates, who strongly oppose Alito. Casey does not favor abortion rights and Republicans are hopeful that his Alito position could hamper his fundraising within the party's base.

"It will make his job more difficult in the state of Pennsylvania as he tries to appeal to progressive voters, and it should make his job harder," Kate Michelman, former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, told the Harrisburg Patriot-News this week.

Meanwhile, a new GOP poll out this week showed Casey with a 10-point lead over Santorum. The Strategic Vision survey of 1,200 likely voters found Casey ahead of Santorum 50 percent to 40 percent. It had a 3 percent margin of error.

— L.W.W.

TEXAS

Dallas Paper Endorses Anderson Over Taylor

Van Taylor (R) might have the money and tacit backing of the Washington GOP establishment in his bid to take on Rep. Chet Edwards (D), but former Congressional aide Tucker Anderson (R) has the support of the 17th district's biggest newspaper.

The Dallas Morning News endorsed Anderson, who used to work for Rep. Pete Sessions (R), over Taylor, a wealthy businessman and Iraq war combat veteran, in their Republican primary fight to determine who gets to take on Edwards this November.

"His opponent, Van Taylor, is a Harvard-educated Marine-turned-businessman. The 33-year-old served courageously in Iraq, volunteering for the military after college. And we greatly respect that commitment," the Morning News staff editorial, published Wednesday, said.

"But when it comes to representing the 17th District, the recent transplant to West, Texas, doesn't have the same history as Mr. Anderson. And the private equity investor wouldn't know Capitol Hill as well as his opponent."

Taylor has already begun running television ads in advance of the March 7 primary.

— David M. Drucker

ARIZONA

Ex-State GOP Chief Joins Race in Kolbe's District

The 8th district Republican primary plot has thickened, with former state GOP Chairman Mike Hellon entering the race to replace retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R), the Arizona Daily Star reported this week.

Hellon, 63, who like Kolbe is considered a moderate Republican, describes himself as a "moderate conservative," and told the Daily Star he has what it takes to keep the Tucson-area seat in GOP hands.

"A vote for Randy Graf (R) in the primary is a vote for [Minority Leader] Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) as Speaker of the House," Hellon said.

Graf, a conservative former state Representative, received 43 percent of the vote when he challenged Kolbe in the 2004 8th district Republican primary and was running before the Congressman announced his retirement plans in the fall.

Mike Jenkins (R), a Marine Corps veteran and small business owner, is also running in the primary. Hellon dismissed his candidacy as lacking the broad support needed to win.

The leading candidates in the Democratic primary are former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords, who per Arizona law was forced to resign her Senate seat in order to run for Congress, and longtime Tucson television news anchor Patty Weiss.

— D.M.D.

Ehrlich Alters Landscape Of Stem Cell Funding Debate (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Yesterday's hearings on stem cell research in Maryland had a familiar ring: Advocates touted the potential for treating Parkinson's disease, juvenile diabetes and other conditions, and opponents raised the same ethical objections they made a year ago when lawmakers proposed spending $25 million a year on the emerging science.

But it was a voice legislators did not hear, neither yesterday nor a year ago, that could alter this year's debate -- that of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0012250

After remaining mostly silent on a bill that was killed last year by a Republican-led filibuster threat, Ehrlich (R) is pushing a plan to spend $20 million next year on stem cell research.

But Ehrlich is not committing himself on the question that has stirred the most controversy: whether the money should be used primarily for work on stem cells derived from human embryos or from less controversial adult stem cells.

Although the move has drawn some criticism, Ehrlich argued in an interview that he is acting prudently, given the evolving nature of the science.

"I wasn't that good of a biology student. I'm not going to make that decision," Ehrlich said. "The point here is that the decision should be a function of the science. These are fundamentally science questions, not political questions."

The governor would leave it to a state-founded technology corporation to decide whether to provide grants for work on adult stem cells or work on embryonic stems cells, which many scientists say holds greater promise but some in his party consider tantamount to abortion.

Ehrlich, who has supported stem cell research since his days in Congress, said that his public silence last year masked a behind-the-scenes effort to develop an alternate approach that would both bolster the state's biotechnology sector and depoliticize a difficult issue for Republicans.

"The strong pro-life members know the administration does not share their views on this issue, but we wanted to try to lower the temperature on the politics," he said. "I wanted to try to keep everyone's eye on the ball, and I believe this approach accomplishes that goal."

Ehrlich's involvement has scrambled the politics surrounding the issue, making it all but certain Maryland will join the growing number of states subsidizing the research, either with the legislation considered at yesterday's hearings or a provision Ehrlich has inserted into his budget.

Ehrlich said his budget-based approach makes additional legislation unnecessary.

Some advocates of the research say Ehrlich's plan has merit and view it as more likely to withstand opposition in the Senate.

"As long as there's no preference for adult, that's fine," said Robert Johnson, a lobbyist for Maryland Families for Stem Cell Research, a coalition formed during last year's debate that has primarily supported embryonic work.

But the governor's posture drew criticism yesterday from sponsors of the stem cell bills.

In an interview, Sen. Paula C. Hollinger (D-Baltimore County) was adamant that money be spent on work on embryonic stem cells, which is controversial because it involves the destruction of human embryos. Hollinger's bill would restrict research funded with state money to embryos discarded at fertility clinics and establish other rules for funding the science.

"The only reason we're doing this bill is that the president has refused to allow the research to be done," Hollinger said, referring to a 2001 executive order by President Bush that set limits on the embryonic stem cell research that can be funded with federal money.

Her view was echoed by Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), the lead sponsor of the House bill, which passed similar legislation last year earmarking $23 million for embryonic work.

Other lawmakers questioned why a compromise could not have been worked out last session. "We wasted a year, and people still suffer," said Sen. James Brochin (D-Baltimore County).

Some advocates have questioned whether there are enough university and private-sector researchers geared up to spend $25 million on embryonic stem cell research. But that view was rebutted yesterday by Curt Civin, a stem cell researcher from Johns Hopkins University, who was among several scientists to testify at yesterday's hearing.

"Yeah, we can spend this tomorrow," Civin said. "We would be all over this."

Republican leaders signaled this week that they would put up a vigorous fight against any bill that steers money only to embryonic work, which they consider "killing unborn babies," said Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus (R-Somerset).

"We're going to be opposed to the bill," he said. "We're going to be as aggressive as we can to kill it."

Under the governor's approach, grants would be made by the Maryland Technology Development Corporation, overseen by a 15-member board appointed by the governor. Although money could still go to embryonic stem cell projects, Stoltzfus said Republicans are more comfortable with the approach.

Supporters of the Democratic bill say they fell two votes short last year of gathering enough to end the threatened filibuster, which kept the bill from the Senate floor the final day of the session. Lobbying this year will focus on two Republicans who voted for the bill in committee last year but agreed to stick with their party in a filibuster effort.

In interviews this week, both Sen. Sandra B. Schrader (R-Howard) and Sen. Allan H. Kittleman (R-Howard) said they support the governor's approach but declined to say whether they would back a filibuster of Hollinger's bill.

Because Ehrlich's plan is included in the budget bill, debate over the measure will play out among a different set of lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0012251

Some members of both parties have suggested they might attempt to use the budget process to limit the type of stem cell work permitted -- a move Ehrlich said he would oppose.

"I would discourage both sides from impacting this thoughtful approach that we've developed," he said.

Republicans Pledge Bipartisan Filibuster Of Stem-cell Bill (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

The Maryland Senate is facing a showdown over stem-cell research, with Republicans and a few Democrats vowing yesterday to stop a bill that would promote the creation of embryos for research.

"If [Senate President Thomas V. Mike] Miller wants to do this extraordinary thing, he will get a filibuster that lasts as long as he wants it to last," said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican.

Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus said he had more than the minimum 19 votes to filibuster.

"We think we have 20," said Mr. Stoltzfus, an Eastern Shore Republican. "We support stem-cell research. We just don't support embryonic. We don't believe in killing a baby, and that's what we believe embryos are."

There are 14 Republicans in the 47-member Senate, which means six Democrats have agreed to filibuster.

Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, is sponsoring the Senate bill in support of embryonic stem-cell research for the second year and supports the House version, sponsored by Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, a Baltimore City Democrat.

Mrs. Hollinger wants a Senate vote as early as next week -- the fourth week of the 90-day General Assembly session.

"I'm sure they will filibuster, and I'm sure we will round up the votes," she said.

Mrs. Hollinger also said she would fight for the bill and against the filibuster for "as long as it takes."

Her bill would give $25 million a year for five years, starting in fiscal 2008, to embryonic stem-cell research.

The bill also allows the legislature to appoint a committee of scientists and representatives from business and biotechnology industries to award grants through the state's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene.

Some scientists hope embryonic stem cells will eventually produce cures and treatments for such chronic and degenerative illnesses as Parkinson's disease and diabetes.

Opponents of the research say there have been no proven results that embryos can yield positive results, while adult and umbilical cord stem cells are now used to treat 65 medical conditions.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, announced his proposal to fund stem-cell research on Jan. 11, the second day of the session.

President Bush in 2001 restricted the use of embryos for federal stem-cell research. So scientists who want to conduct such research are looking to state governments for funding.

Mr. Ehrlich's plan would provide $20 million for one year toward stem-cell research, with no specifics on whether the money would fund embryonic stem-cell research or only research using adult stem cells and stem cells from umbilical cords.

Mr. Ehrlich's plan also would allow a committee of scientists, business representatives and biotechnology representatives to make the decisions on where the funding goes.

However, the committee in the governor's proposal would be selected by the Maryland Technology Development Corporation, created in 1998 by the state legislature.

The committee is governed by a 15-member board, appointed by the governor with advice and consent of the Senate, according to its Web site.

"Mr. Ehrlich's proposal depoliticizes the situation," said Henry Fawell, a spokesman for the governor. He also said Democratic lawmakers are publicly saying what are the best scientific decisions, but "they need to stay out of that and let the scientists decide."

Gerald Ford Returns Home From Hospital (LAT)

By Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

Former President Gerald R. Ford returned home from the hospital Wednesday morning after a 12-day stay while being treated for pneumonia, his spokeswoman said.

"He is doing well," Penny Circle, Ford's chief of staff, said in a brief statement Wednesday.

Ford, 92, originally had been scheduled to leave Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage on Jan. 19, but doctors kept him for additional treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0012252

"Obviously, we're delighted that he's doing well," said Ford's son, Mike, director of student development at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C.

Circle has described Ford during the last week as out of bed, reading the newspaper and eating well.

The 38th president was hospitalized briefly last month for a bad cold when undergoing routine medical tests. Ford suffered two small strokes in 2000 and a dizzy spell on a golf course in 2003.

The former chief executive served in the White House from 1974 to 1977, taking the oath of office after Richard M. Nixon resigned during the Watergate scandal. Nixon had appointed Ford as vice president in 1973 when Spiro T. Agnew resigned.

Ford has lived in Rancho Mirage with his wife, Betty, for nearly three decades.

Hard Line State (WSJ)

By Steve H. Hanke And Stephen J.k. Walters

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BALTIMORE -- In Big Labor's war against Wal-Mart, "collateral damage" -- in the form of lost jobs and income for the poor -- is starting to add up. Of course, since the unions and their legislative allies claim that their motive is to liberate people from exploitation by Wal-Mart, these unintended effects are often ignored.

Here in Maryland, however, that's getting hard to do. The consequences of our legislature's override of Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich's veto of their "Fair Share Health Care Act" on Jan. 12 will be tragic for some of the state's neediest residents. The law will force companies that employ over 10,000 to spend at least 8% of their payroll on health care or kick any shortfall into a special state fund. Wal-Mart would be the only employer in the state to be affected.

Almost surely, therefore, the company will pull the plug on plans to build a distribution center that would have employed 800 in Somerset County, on Maryland's picturesque Eastern Shore. As a Wal-Mart spokesman has put it, "you have to take a step back and call into question how business-friendly is a state like Maryland when they pass a bill that . . . takes a swipe at one company that provides 15,000 jobs."

Unfortunately, in Somerset, the new law looks more like a body blow than a "swipe." The rural county is Maryland's poorest, with per capita personal income 46% below the state average and a poverty rate 130% above it. Somerset's enduring problem is weak labor demand that greatly limits its 25,250 residents' economic opportunities.

There are just 0.8 jobs per household in Somerset, barely half the 1.5 figure that applies to the rest of the state. Somerset's top-10 list of employers features sectors like food services (average annual compensation per employee: $9,637), poultry and egg production ($14,320) and seafood preparation and packaging ($19,190).

It is hard to exaggerate how much the planned distribution center might have meant to Somerset's economy. Using an input/output model, we forecast the "ripple effects" of the new income and spending which could have emanated from Wal-Mart's facility as follows:

· The center's 800 employees would have created an additional 282 jobs among "upstream" suppliers and "downstream" retailers and service establishments; all told, the center would have boosted county employment by 14% and private-sector employment by 20%.

· Total annual employee compensation in Somerset would have risen by $46.5 million, or 19%.

· Annual output (or "gross county product") would have risen by $128.3 million, or 19%.

· State and local tax receipts would have increased by $19.2 million annually; this would include $8.5 million in property taxes, $5.6 million in sales taxes and $1.4 million in personal income taxes.

Those losses, though dramatic, probably understate the full extent of the damage in this case. They do not include foregone employment and income from construction of the facility and related infrastructure improvements. What is more, Wal-Mart's tentative plans for a second distribution center in Garrett County, in mountainous western Maryland, also appear dead. Garrett, with a poverty rate that is 70% above the state's, is only slightly better off than Somerset.

How could our legislators turn a blind eye to such areas? Partly, of course, they are simply eager for Big Labor's votes and money and therefore subservient to its interests. The Service Employees International Union actually helped draft what became known as the "Wal-Mart bill." Unable -- so far -- to organize workers at the company, the union's immediate national strategy is to limit Wal-Mart's competitive reach by raising its costs. Maryland was a shrewdly chosen place to kick off this campaign.

Some estimate that as much as a third of the state's economic activity stems from federal employment and purchases. Over 150,000 Marylanders -- six times the population of tiny Somerset -- are on the federal (non-military) payroll; they are concentrated in central Maryland, near the nation's capital. Nearly 268,000 more Marylanders draw checks from state and local government.

With so many workers in a sector where revenues appear to arrive automatically and inefficiency never leads to bankruptcy, our state's resulting political culture is quite predictable. Many Marylanders are simply unmindful of the necessities of survival in the private sector: pleasing customers, controlling costs and satisfying shareholders. Thanks to the federal tax dollars collected from the rest of the country and spent in Maryland, the prevailing view of economic reality is inverted: The public sector is seen as the engine of prosperity, with the private one along for the ride.

DOJ_NMG_0012253

Reflecting this culture, our legislators often behave as if business is a problem to be solved. On Jan. 17, they also overrode a gubernatorial veto of a $1-per-hour increase in the state's minimum wage. Like the health-care mandate, the hike is a job-killer -- though not in affluent areas of the state, where strong labor demand long ago pushed the going wage above the minimum. In those areas, the law is largely symbolic and enables well-meaning voters and legislators to conclude that they are "doing something for working families." Safely out of their view, however, at Maryland's impoverished margins, already-weak labor demand will be further diminished.

What remains to be seen is whether Maryland will be a leading political indicator or an anomaly, for Wal-Mart bills have been drafted in 33 other states. Emboldened by success here, lawmakers in some states have set the threshold for companies to be hit with mandated health benefits as low as 1,000 workers.

In these upcoming battles, legislators should be mindful that companies like Wal-Mart are not the enemy but rather front-line soldiers in a real war on poverty. The profit motive leads them to seek out areas where there is much idle labor and put it to work. Where they are prevented or discouraged from doing so, the alternative job prospect is rarely a cushy spot in the bureaucracy. Rather, it is continued idleness and hardship.

Mr. Hanke, a professor of applied economics at Johns Hopkins University, served as a member of the Governor's Council of Economic Advisers in Maryland (1976-77). Mr. Walters is a professor of economics at Loyola College in Maryland.

Palestinian Premier, Cabinet Resigns (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 26, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and his Cabinet ministers submitted their resignations Thursday as the Islamic militant group Hamas appeared to have captured a large majority of seats in the Palestinian elections — a shocking upset sure to throw Mideast peacemaking into turmoil.

"This is the choice of the people. It should be respected," Qureia said. "If it's true (the results), then the president should ask Hamas to form a new government. For me, personally, I sent my resignation."

Under the law, Abbas must ask the largest party in the new parliament — presumably Hamas — to form the next government. Abbas was elected separately a year ago and remains president.

Hamas said before the election it does not want to govern alone, and would prefer to bring Fatah into a coalition. Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar said Thursday that the group will declare its intentions after official results are announced later in the day.

Israel and the United States have said they would not deal with a Hamas-led Palestinian government. Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas has said he would step down if he could no longer pursue his peace agenda with Israel.

Palestinian election officials said on condition of anonymity that Hamas had won a large majority of the 66 seats up for grabs in electoral districts in the West Bank and Gaza. Half the seats in Wednesday's parliament vote were chosen on a national list and the other half by districts.

The Central Election Commission said the vote count had not been completed and that it would make an official announcement at 7 p.m. Thursday.

Hamas' top candidate Ismail Haniyeh earlier said the group had won about 70 total seats in the 132-seat parliament, based on reporting by Hamas activists who observed the counting in the polling stations. Later in the day, another Hamas official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the number had risen to at least 75.

Officials with Fatah conceded that Hamas had won about 70 total seats. They also spoke on condition of anonymity because counting in some districts was continuing.

Initial exit polls on Wednesday night had forecast a slight edge for Fatah, with Hamas coming in a strong second. The polls predicted that neither Hamas nor Fatah would have enough seats to form a government alone, and would have to rely on smaller parties to form a coalition.

The discrepancy between the exit polls and the results provided by officials on Thursday was apparently due to voting in districts, where Hamas was apparently able to capitalize on divisions within Fatah.

A senior Fatah member, Saeb Erekat, said he could not confirm the unofficial results, but blamed Israel's refusal to resume peace talks with a Fatah-led government for the party's poor showing.

DOJ_NMG_0012254

"Israel has declared us non-partners about four years ago and they were not speaking to our elected president," he told Israel Army Radio. "Everybody was blaming Fatah for every mistake in the world. Everybody was tying our hands and our legs and throwing us into the sea. And now I think all these things, including our mistakes in Fatah, led to this result."

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Wednesday, before Hamas claimed victory, that Israel cannot trust a Palestinian leadership in which the Islamic group has a role, according to a statement by his office.

"Israel can't accept a situation in which Hamas, in its present form as a terror group calling for the destruction of Israel, will be part of the Palestinian Authority without disarming," Olmert told U.S. Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record) in a meeting, according to Olmert's office. "I won't hold negotiations with a government that does not stick to its most basic obligation of fighting terror."

Israel is willing to help the Palestinians and Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "a great deal" but only if they crack down on militants, Olmert said.

Israel has repeatedly asked Abbas to force Hamas and other militant groups to disarm but Abbas has refused, warning such an act could cause civil war. Hamas has committed dozens of suicide bombings against Israel.

President Bush told The Wall Street Journal in an interview Wednesday that the United States will not deal with Hamas until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel.

The election Wednesday was the Palestinians' first truly competitive vote, with Hamas contesting a parliamentary vote for the first time and winning considerable clout. Hundreds of thousands of Palestinians flooded polling stations throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip for a vote that would determine how Palestinians wanted to be governed and whether they would pursue negotiations or confrontation with Israel.

Long lines formed at polling stations, and 77.7 percent of 1.3 million eligible voters cast ballots. Under a compromise with Israel, some Arabs in east Jerusalem were allowed to cast absentee ballots at post offices in the disputed city, and voting was extended there by two hours because postal workers were slow.

Routine power cuts in the Gaza Strip town of Khan Younis forced election workers to count ballots by candlelight.

"Whoever is the winner, it's a great victory for the Palestinians in general because partnership starts from this minute," said Samer Lulu, 29, a merchant who voted in Gaza City.

Hamas' success has alarmed Israel and the West, but Abbas has argued that luring the group, which has been behind dozens of deadly attacks on Israel, into politics would tame it and increase the chances for peace. The election will usher in a new parliament and Cabinet, but Abbas, who was elected president last year, will remain head of the Palestinian Authority regardless of the results.

"We are coming into a new phase. In this phase, we are calling for the international community to help us return to the negotiating table with the Israelis, conclude the peace process and implement it," Abbas said after the voting ended.

Palestinians were given the day off to vote, and the election was held in a celebratory atmosphere that was rare in the recent years of fighting with Israel. Some activists covered their cars with red carnations and others blasted campaign songs from car stereos and storefront speakers.

Campaign posters hung on nearly every wall, dangled from electric lines over the street and were plastered to the hoods of cars. Some children ran through the streets wearing the green flag of Hamas as a cape. Others wore the black-and-white checkered scarf of Fatah.

Some 13,500 police officers guarded the 1,008 polling stations to prevent gunmen from disrupting the vote, and there were no reports of major violence. In the West Bank's Balata refugee camp, militants who had threatened to burn down polling stations checked their assault rifles at the door with a flourish and peacefully voted.

Hoping to harness a wave of discontent with Fatah, Hamas ran an anti-corruption campaign, calling its party Reform and Change.

"We've reached the worst. The most important thing now is change," said Raed Abu Hamam, 35, a construction worker in Gaza's Beach camp who said he has lost faith in Fatah.

Fatah appealed for another chance to clean up the government and expand an economy shattered by nearly five years of fighting with Israel. Many Fatah voters said they were grudgingly supporting the party out of old loyalties.

"The Palestinian Authority did nothing for us. People here have no jobs, while people in the PA got millions of dollars," said Ali Taha, 35, a laborer in the Amari refugee camp in Ramallah, who voted for Fatah anyway.

Though the election appeared likely to turn on internal issues, the results will have deep implications for future peace efforts with Israel.

Abbas said Wednesday he is prepared to resume peace talks, even if Hamas joins his government. Hamas is expected to ask for service ministries — health, education and welfare — and to leave diplomacy to others.

DOJ_NMG_0012255

"We are ready to negotiate," Abbas said. "We are partners with the Israelis. They don't have the right to choose their partner."

Israel says it will not deal with Hamas until it disarms. But Haniyeh said the group had no intention of laying down its arms after the elections. Another candidate, Mahmoud Zahar, said his group is "not going to change a single word" in its covenant calling for Israel's destruction.

Palestinian Government Resigns In Wake Of Hamas Win (CNN)

CNN.com, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank (CNN) -- In a stunning development ahead of official election results, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qorie said he and the rest of the Palestinian Authority government will resign in the wake of militant group Hamas' apparent victory in historic elections.

The announcement was an acknowledgment that election results showed Hamas had won a majority of seats in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council, supplanting the ruling Fatah party.

Qorie's office said it will be up to Hamas to form a new government.

"It's the choice of the people and it should be respected," Qorie said. "I think, if the majority is approved and has been reached, I think Hamas should form a new government, it's true. The president should ask Hamas to form a new government.

"For me personally, I sent my resignation to the president to enable him to choose a new prime minister," Qorie said.

Initial election results are scheduled to be released Thursday at 7 p.m. (noon ET).

Exit polls earlier had shown Hamas thrusting itself into the center of Palestinian politics but had not indicated an outright majority win by the group.

The exit poll from Bir Zeit University, a respected Palestinian school, showed Fatah garnered 46.4 percent of the vote and Hamas won 39.8 percent in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council. That translates into 63 seats for Fatah and 58 for Hamas, according to the exit poll.

But other polls showed Hamas claiming a slim majority, a claim echoed by some Hamas officials, prompting a warning from Jerusalem.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel could not accept a situation in which Hamas in its current configuration -- committed to the destruction of Israel -- was a part of the Palestinian Authority.

"I will not negotiate with a government that does not meet its most basic obligations -- to fight terrorism. We are prepared to assist the Palestinians and Abu Mazen (Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas) very much but they must meet their commitments," Olmert said, according to a statement released by his office.

The European Union, meanwhile, said it was prepared to work with any government -- to a point.

"We are prepared to work with any Palestinian government, if this government seeks peace, using peaceful means," said Benita Ferrero-Waldner, EU external relations commissioner.

Hamas, which boycotted the last election in 1996, capitalized on widespread dissatisfaction with what is seen as corruption within the Palestinian Authority and Fatah, and a perceived inability by the authority to manage the affairs of the Palestinians.

Fatah was formed in 1965 by longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who died in November 2004, and dominated Palestinian politics for decades as the mainstream Palestinian nationalist movement.

"Mostly, they were voting for opposition and voting against Fatah -- against corruption, against nepotism, against the failure of the peace process, and against the lack of leadership," said Mustafa Barghouti with the Palestinian National Initiative, a democratic opposition movement.

He added: "Today (Wednesday) was a great day for Palestine. This is the best democratic practice ever in the Arab world." (Watch Gaza residents talk about why election day is so important -- 2:32)

Hamas has called for the destruction of Israel and carried out numerous terrorists attacks that have killed scores of Israelis over the years. The group is listed as a terrorist group by the U.S. State Department.Turnout near 78 percent

Election officials estimated about 77.7 percent of the eligible 1.3 million voters turned out to cast their ballots at more than 1,000 polling stations. Voting closed around 7 p.m. (noon ET) in Gaza and the West Bank, and it was extended in predominantly Arab east Jerusalem for two hours to accommodate heavy turnout. (Watch how preliminary results divide up seats -- 3:05)

Among those who joined the voters were Abbas and Mahmoud Zahar, the leader of Hamas. Militant Palestinian groups had agreed to a cease-fire during the voting, and there were no reports of major violence.

"We are embarking on a new era, and we call on the international community to help us return to the negotiating table with the Israelis, to conclude a peace agreement and implement it," Abbas said at the end of the election.

DOJ_NMG_0012256

Palestinian Foreign Minister Nasser al-Kidwa told CNN: "It's a happy day. There is no doubt about that. And I think that the Palestinian people are generally happy because of this." (Read how the vote demonstrates Palestinians' will to flex their political muscle)'Monopoly ... is finished'

At polling sites in Gaza, many voters jubilantly waved the green flag of Hamas and expressed anger at Fatah.

"Fatah hasn't done anything for us, for our children," said one Hamas voter at a polling site in Gaza.

Another said: "Fatah only helps itself. We want to see what Hamas can do for us."

Naila Ayesh and her husband, Jamal, said they are worried about the message Hamas is sending to Palestinians. Naila said Hamas told women if they didn't vote for the militant group that "at the end, God will punish you."

The couple voted for Third Way, a secular, pro-reform party. Jamal said the days when Fatah called the shots are over.

"Monopoly of the political system is finished," he said.

The results of the election were being closely monitored by the United States and European Union, both of which have threatened to cut aid if Hamas becomes part of the government.

The U.S. State Department was blunt.

"We view Hamas as a terrorist organization. We don't deal with Hamas. And under the current circumstances, I don't see that changing," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan was more cautious: "We'll see what the election results are. I'm not going to play a what-if scenario here."Impact on the peace process?

There have been talks about a power-sharing coalition, in which Fatah maintains the more political posts and Hamas has lower-level ministry positions.

Asked how Palestinians could move forward with peacemaking with Israel, al-Kidwa told CNN, "Maybe this is one of the reasons why we prefer not to have it in the government at this stage."

He added: "We have to maintain making peace with Israel as a priority. Actually, this is in our interest, in the interests of the Palestinian people. We need to reach final settlement with Israelis."

Zahar, the head of Hamas, earlier in the day left open the possibility of forming a coalition with Fatah, as well as the possibility of future negotiations with Israel, under certain conditions. (Watch Hamas attempt to redefine its image -- 2:51)

Zahar said his goals include reconstruction of areas he said have been destroyed by years of Israeli occupation and corruption, and the rebuilding of the Palestinian infrastructure.

He said he would be open to negotiations with Israel, but only if the Israelis enter into talks with good will and respect for the rights of Palestinians.

"We are not going to meet them just for meeting," Zahar told a throng of reporters after casting his own ballot. Previously, he said, many meetings have been held but "ended with nothing."

Asked if Hamas would ever recognize Israel, Zahar replied: "Never."

On the eve of the voting, Israel's Olmert had this message for Palestinians: "Do not choose extremists who have led them from tragedy to tragedy and to misery."

No Clear Victor In Palestinian Vote (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

JERUSALEM -- After a strong showing by the militant Islamic group Hamas in yesterday's Palestinian legislative election, the U.S. and Israel vowed again to have no contact with any of its members who are blacklisted as terrorists.

The reality on the ground suggests a more nuanced -- and pragmatic -- policy may loom, though.

Yesterday's vote by more than 70% of the 1.4 million eligible voters proceeded without violence or other major disruptions. According to Beir Zeit University's exit poll, the ruling Fatah party emerged victorious with 46% of the vote and Hamas captured about 40%, making its Reform and Change party the second-most popular among voters. Independent parties accounted for the difference. Final results are expected today.

The balloting marks a watershed for Palestinians, Israel and the U.S. -- and a pivotal moment in a conflict that has roiled the Middle East for decades. The legislative election was the first for Palestinians since 1996 and opens a new era of multiparty politics. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas now has the opportunity to appoint a new prime minister and government cabinet. The effort is expected to be marked by intense coalition negotiations among his Fatah party, Hamas and the scattering of independent parties.

If Hamas joins Mr. Abbas's new government, it will have an enormous impact on the future contours of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and any resolution of it. The group's official manifesto calls for the destruction of Israel and the creation of an Islamic state in its place. Yesterday, Hamas's top two leaders repeated their strident positions, saying the group has no intention of laying down its weapons after the vote and that its core goals remained unchanged.

DOJ_NMG_0012257

Though the U.S. and Israel acquiesced in Hamas's participation in the election, their response to its possible role in Palestinian government has been far chillier. Yesterday, President Bush said in an interview with The Wall Street Journal that he won't deal with any Hamas leaders until the organization renounces its call for the elimination of Israel. Similarly, Israeli officials have vowed to have no official contact with Hamas members. For the U.S., the situation is complicated by a law banning U.S. individuals from providing any form of material support to terrorist groups and their members.

Even so, Israel, and to a lesser degree the U.S., may find the no-contact policy difficult to maintain. In addition to the Palestinian legislature, many West Bank cities are now managed by Hamas officials voted in over the past year. Because Israel supplies many of these cities with electricity and sewage, informal and low-level ties already exist in many areas.

Consider the case of Hisham al-Masri, the new deputy mayor of Qalqilya, a city of 45,000 Palestinians just a short drive from Tel Aviv. A devout Islamist who says Israel has no right to exist, Mr. al-Masri was elected on a platform of clean and efficient government. When he took office last year, he inherited some $4 million of debt owed to Israel's state-owned electricity company. In the months that followed, Mr. al-Masri met regularly with executives from the power company to discuss repayment.

"There is no choice but to speak with them. Our city needs electricity, and we have to pay for it," Mr. al-Masri says. To facilitate the delicate process, Mr. al-Masri and his counterparts hold most of their meetings at the city's edge near an Israeli liaison office staffed by Israel Defense Force personnel.

Though purely administrative, such encounters could become a model for extended contacts in the future. Ehud Yaari, a prominent Israeli political commentator, argues that such contacts could presage a broad policy shift down the road. "Maybe it will be called the political Hamas or Hamas inside the parliament, but the day is approaching when Israeli representatives will sit and talk with Hamas representatives," he said in a recent TV commentary.

Mr. Yaari and other political analysts say the need for an eventual dialogue with Hamas reflects a less-noticed reality. Amid the stark chaos that has enveloped the Palestinian Authority and Fatah in recent years, Hamas emerged as a model of discipline and order on the street, able to mobilize and corral its supporters in ways Fatah no longer can match. That discipline, many analysts say, means Hamas could prove more useful than Fatah in upholding any future cease fire that both sides have been gently speculating about in recent weeks.

The emphasis on internal discipline was reflected across the West Bank yesterday. At polling stations, Hamas supporters set up tents with computers and offered training to voters on how to check the ballots. In the run-up to the election, some Hamas members had talked about their possible ambitions in government, saying they would like to focus their efforts on revamping and improving aspects of government, such as welfare and education, that have the maximum impact on daily Palestinian life and little to no contact with Israel.

Write to Karby Leggett at karby.leggett@wsj.com1

About 1 Million People Vote For Palestinian Parliament Terror Group Hamas Takes On Ruling Fatah Party In Elections (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — About 1 million Palestinians voted Wednesday in parliamentary elections that threaten to end the ruling Fatah Party's decade-long monopoly over Palestinian politics.

The elections for 132 seats in the Palestinian Legislative Council pitted the terrorist Islamic Hamas group against Fatah, founded by Yasser Arafat and President Mahmoud Abbas.

About 78% of the 1.3 million eligible Palestinians cast their ballots for one of 11 parties, according to the Palestinian Central Elections Commission.

Participation was higher than the 75% turnout in the last parliamentary elections in 1996. Hamas boycotted that vote.

Hamas, which rejects the existence of Israel and is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist organizations, wants to get members into parliament to press the Palestinian Authority to take a tougher stance against Israel.

In an interview Wednesday with Al-Jazeera, the Arabic satellite network, top Hamas candidate Ismail Hania hailed the dawn of “a new reality after five years of (a Palestinian uprising).”

Hania said “Oslo was killed,” referring the accord reached in that city in 1993 that led to peace talks with Israel and created the Palestinian Authority.

But Hamas' No. 2 candidate, Mohammad Abu Teir, said last week his group does not “rule out negotiations” with Israel.

Hamas focused its campaign less on fighting Israel than on Palestinian issues, such as government corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0012258

Last week, the European Commission announced it would suspend half of its aid to the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Authority, citing a lack of budgetary discipline. Abbas' party, in control for 12 years, also has failed to stem increasing lawlessness in Gaza and the West Bank.

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, who was among a team of international observers monitoring the vote, warned that "if Hamas becomes part of the executive branch with government portfolios … then it precludes us doing business with the Palestinian Authority."

In a reference to Hamas after the polls closed, President Bush told The Wall Street Journal, "Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

Speaking to reporters in Ramallah in the West Bank, Abbas tried to assuage concerns about a politically empowered Hamas.

"We are ready to negotiate" with Israel, the Palestinian president said.

Whatever the outcome, Abbas — elected a year ago — will remain president. However, the composition of the parliament and Cabinet could change dramatically.

Lines of voters curled outside polling stations in the West Bank and Gaza. In East Jerusalem, voters cast absentee ballots at six post offices that served as polling centers.

After voting at the an-Najah Girls School in Ramallah, which served as a polling station, Muntasser Hamdan, 23, said, "We must vote Fatah because this is the party that has led this people for 40 years."

A few feet away, clad in the emerald green that symbolizes Islam and Hamas, Fadi Ahmad, 28, said he voted for Hamas because "it gives us everything: religion and truth."

Undaunted by his party's historic antagonism toward Israel, Ahmad said, "If Israel doesn't bother us, we won't bother it."

Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 25 -- Hamas won a large share of the vote Wednesday as Palestinians selected their first new parliament in a decade, but appeared to fall short of deposing the governing Fatah movement as the leading party in the legislature, according to an exit poll conducted in coordination with the Palestinian election commission.

The poll showed that neither Fatah nor Hamas achieved a majority in the 132-seat legislature, meaning that the next Palestinian cabinet will be made up of a coalition of parties. But by gaining near-parity with Fatah in the parliament, Hamas -- formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement -- will have a major role in the Palestinian Authority and complicate efforts to revive a dormant U.S.-backed peace plan that runs counter to the party's campaign platform in key respects.

The poll, conducted by Bir Zeit University, projected Fatah winning 63 seats and Hamas 58 seats, leaving the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and an assortment of leftist and independent parties far behind.

A second poll, by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, also conducted in coordination with the election commission, showed Fatah winning 58 seats to Hamas's 53. But the poll said that at least eight seats remained too close to call. Official results were expected Thursday.

"We knew that Hamas had this strength," said Ghassan Khatib, the Palestinian Authority's planning minister, who does not belong to either party. "Having them inside the council, abiding by its laws and regulations, hopefully will be better than having them outside. Now competition will be based on legal politics, rather than outside the law in the streets."

Election officials and observers reported no serious problems from either Israeli security measures or Palestinian factional rivalry that had threatened to disrupt voting in several cities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The officials said 77 percent of the 1.3 million registered Palestinian voters cast ballots on a brisk day, far surpassing the turnout in last year's presidential race.

In an initial assessment, a member of one international observer mission described the voting as "a generally smooth process with only sporadic violence and a robust turnout." The observer from the National Democratic Institute/Carter Center delegation, who declined to be named because of the preliminary nature of his evaluation, said his team had received only isolated reports of problems with voting materials.

The only apparent violation, the observer said, was the active campaigning that occurred throughout the day despite a Palestinian election law that requires campaigning to end 24 hours before the start of voting. But because all parties appeared to be violating the rule, the observer said, "at this point it doesn't appear to be a serious impediment to the election."

The atmosphere was celebratory here in Ramallah, where cars bearing the green banners of Hamas or the black-and-white kaffiyehs of Fatah jammed the streets. Each party appeared to have well-organized efforts to ensure its supporters made it to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0012259

The last parliamentary voting, in 1996, led to a Fatah-dominated legislature, which has now been expanded by 50 percent. Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority and leader of Fatah, postponed the elections in July to secure an election law more favorable to his party.

At the El Bireh Girls Secondary School, Hamas supporters set up a card table with a bound voter-registration list and laptop computer loaded with a database of all voters and their assigned polling stations. Hamas activists said they were helping anyone who had questions, not just those who supported their movement.

"I saw Hamas closer to the people, closer to the feelings and problems of the people," said Hassan Hamudah, 44, a Hamas supporter who works for the Palestinian Water Authority. "They are honest men. The others have made many promises, but we have only seen corruption."

Hamas has built its popularity over the years through patient political organizing, charity work and an unyielding position regarding Israel. The party's charter calls for Israel's destruction, and Hamas's armed wing has carried out numerous deadly attacks on Israeli civilians, police and soldiers.

The secular Fatah movement is suffering from generational divisions and a reputation for corrupt, ineffective government.

Abbas, who has threatened to resign as president if he is unable to carry out his program after the elections, will now appoint a prime minister who must form a cabinet approved by the parliament. Although it is theoretically possible that Hamas could form the next government, it is expected that Fatah would be invited to do so and join with the nationalist and leftist parties to forge a parliamentary majority.

As the main faction in the Palestine Liberation Organization, Fatah joined with Israel to endorse the 1993 Oslo accords and the U.S.-backed peace plan known as the "road map," signed in 2003. The plan has been frozen because of the Palestinian uprising, but each side has pledged to return to its phased framework for creation of an independent Palestinian state.

Hamas, on the other hand, has pledged to maintain its military wing, which Israel says must be dismantled before new peace talks take place under the road map. It is unclear how much influence Hamas could exert over a future peace process since it is not a member of the PLO, although its strong showing could hasten talks to bring the group inside the organization.

Hamas supporters say the party, which Israel, the United States and Europe classify as a terrorist organization, will concentrate on political and educational reform before moving on to issues of peace and diplomacy. Israeli and U.S. officials have warned that its presence in government could undermine diplomatic initiatives and imperil foreign aid.

President Bush, in an interview Wednesday with the Wall Street Journal, lauded the democratic trend that produced the Palestinian elections but said Hamas would not be a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounced its call for the destruction of Israel.

"A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," Bush said. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

In a school adjacent to the al-Amari refugee camp, Ahmad Safi not only cast his vote for Fatah but draped the movement's black-and-white kaffiyeh across his shoulders against the cold.

"Historically, this is the movement that has given the most to the Palestinian cause," said Safi, 42, who works for the Fatah-run Interior Ministry and spent a dozen years in Israeli prisons.

Cars decked with banners and posters of Hamas green, Fatah yellow and the red of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine clogged the street in front of him. Many of the parties rented collective taxis to ferry their supporters to the polls.

"They are secular and democratic," he said of Fatah. "The proof of this is that we are now in pluralistic elections."

The Israeli police presence was heavy in Arab East Jerusalem, where roughly 6,000 of the 120,000 Palestinians eligible to vote in the city were expected to cast ballots. Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, agreed to allow voting to proceed in Jerusalem, which both Israelis and Palestinians claim as their capital, but prohibited the participation of Hamas.

Palestinian election officials extended voting in East Jerusalem for two hours, saying long lines caused by Israeli security measures prevented many from casting ballots on time.

In a statement issued after polls closed, Hamas officials accused Fatah of rigging the vote in the city.

At the post office on Salahudeen Street near the Old City's Damascus Gate, members of the governing party's youth movement chanted "Your blood is Fatah" from the steps and passed out lists with the names of the party's local and national candidates.

"It's good that all factions are participating in this," said Omar Bazian, 56, a Fatah supporter from the Old City. "Never mind losing some power -- this is a vote for the future."

On the other side of the separation barrier erected by the Israeli government, a cluster of Hamas flags flew from the dome of a mosque along the wide, worn avenue into the West Bank town of Abu Dis. The 24-foot-high wall, sealing what was once the main road from Jerusalem to Jericho, is covered with candidate posters and graffiti, including "This Wall Must Fall" in English.

DOJ_NMG_0012260

"We're telling people Islam is the solution," said Radi Johar, 29, who was passing out Hamas candidate pamphlets in the dirt street outside a crowded polling station. "We are victorious, whether we win or not, since we are raising the flag of Islam."

Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party eked out a narrow victory over the militant movement Hamas in parliamentary elections yesterday but will be unable to govern alone, exit polls showed.

The news sent carloads of Fatah faithful streaming into Gaza City's central square to celebrate, firing guns and honking horns in a deafening display. Hamas followers were strangely absent from the streets, even in their political stronghold.

Nevertheless, Hamas' strong challenge to the long-ruling party of Yasser Arafat in its first attempt at parliamentary politics is bound to change the face of Palestinian politics and the Middle East peace process.

To achieve a legislative majority, Mr. Abbas will have to choose between forming an unstable coalition government with smaller independent parties or forming a broad coalition with Hamas -- which has transformed itself from a small militant underground group dedicated to Israel's destruction.

Both Israel and the United States have refused to deal with a government that includes Hamas until it renounces violence and abandons a constitution that calls for Israel's destruction.

"You're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility," President Bush said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal published yesterday. "And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

Hamas in recent days had hinted at a willingness to consider a negotiated settlement with the Jewish state. But the Associated Press last night quoted Hamas' top parliamentary candidate, Ismail Haniyeh, saying the group had no intention of laying down its arms. And another leading candidate, Mahmoud Zahar, said Hamas was "not going to change a single word" in its charter.

An exit poll by Birzeit University in Ramallah showed Fatah winning 63 seats in the 132-member parliament and Hamas taking 58 seats, the AP reported. A second survey showed Fatah beating Hamas by 58 seats to 53.

The Palestinian election commission said yesterday's turnout was about 78 percent, compared to the 52 percent of registered voters who turned out in the 2002 U.S. congressional elections.

For Fatah and Mr. Abbas, heirs of the political movement that served as the foundation of modern Palestinian nationalism, the disappointing results are likely to deepen a crisis triggered by the death of Mr. Arafat.

"It's not pleasant news for Fatah, and it's encouraging news for Hamas," said Birzeit political science professor Basem Ezbidi.

"It's an indication that the Palestinian Liberation Organization has failed historically. This project of the PLO since 1965 did not work, and the people have chosen Hamas."

The vote was proclaimed a "milestone" in Palestinian history by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh, whose party boycotted the first parliamentary vote in 1995 because it was a direct result of the Oslo peace negotiations with Israel. The party decided not to challenge Mr. Abbas in a presidential ballot last year.

Mr. Abbas, for his part, hailed the peaceful conduct of the election, which saw largely celebratory crowds enjoying fair weather and a holiday atmosphere in which shops and offices were shut.

"We are so happy with this election festival," said Mr. Abbas, who added that the Palestinian Authority remains a partner for peace negotiations with Israel.

In a pointed reference to Israel's refusal to negotiate with any government that included Hamas, Mr. Abbas said it was not for the Jewish state to dictate who its counterparts are.

The hundreds of foreign election monitors who observed the voting reported few irregularities.

"People are voting in peace," said Cypriot monitor Eleni Theochapous.

"I was monitoring elections in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Compared with the Palestinians, I don't think there is that much of a difference. I saw homeless people voting three times. Here you can't do that because of the ink on your hands."

Palestinians Cast Historic Vote (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher And Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012261

BETHLEHEM AND RAMALLAH, WEST BANK; KHAN YOUNIS, GAZA STRIP - Palestinians streamed into more than 1,000 polling stations Wednesday in the first parliamentary election in a decade, one that will determine the shape of future prospects for returning to peace talks with Israel.

The ballot itself is largely viewed as a reality check over who Palestinians want steering them into that future: secular Fatah Party, the ruling faction that brought the Palestinian Authority (PA) into being through its willingness to negotiate with Israel, or Islamic Hamas, which stands by suicide bombings and other attacks as its way of facing off with the Jewish state.

Three hours after the polls closed, different organizations released varying figures. Al Arabiyeh, the Arab satellite channel, estimated that of the 132 seats, Fatah won 65 and Hamas won 48. But Al Jazeera, quoting an exit poll carried out by Bir Zeit University near Ramallah, showed Fatah winning 63 seats and Hamas winning 58.

Exit polls suggest that small parties and independent candidates attracted more supporters than expected, and many of these would be natural coalition partners of Fatah.

These potential allies of Fatah include the Third Way Party, led by former finance minister Salaam Fayyad and Palestinian spokeswoman Hanan Ashrawi, as well as a liberal, progressive party led by Dr. Mustafa Barghouti.

Official results were expected to be released Thursday. Divided between militant, moderate

Given recent unrest in the West Bank and Gaza, the elections were carried out without any major incidents of violence or disruptions at polling stations.

Still, many campaign activists bent the rules, ignoring a prohibition on any electioneering outside the voting places. Hadija Jadour and Samah Jarah passed out campaign cards to voters who made their way up the dirt road into a girls' school in Obediyeh, a West Bank municipality east of Bethlehem.

The women describe themselves as friends, but the black-and-white keffiyeh-style sash that Ms. Jadour wears stands in contrast to the green one around Ms. Jarah's veil. That seems to say it all: Palestinians are deeply divided over who should lead and how.

The keffiyah marks Jadour's support for Fatah, while Jarah's green ribbon shows the world, as she puts it, "I love Hamas."

Explains Jarah: "Hamas has always been the center of the resistance, and they are working on giving assistance to people and developing our society."

"It's not true," argues Jadour, smiling wryly at her friend's comment. "Fatah is the one who established the Palestinian Authority in the first place. Fatah wants to solve things in a diplomatic way, not by violence."

Asked if they discuss these issues often, the women grin and look in different directions. "We don't go into politics," says Jarah, "or it might ruin the good relationship we have."

That dynamic, pitting friend against friend, and even brother against brother, was repeated throughout the Palestinian territories. Among the more famed divisions, one of the senior-most members of the Fatah, Jibril Rajoub, who long served as the West Bank security czar for the PA, was running against his own brother, Naif Rajoub, an Islamic religious figure who is high on the list of candidates for Hamas.

"Let's remember that the decision to hold new elections was made by us in Fatah, to reestablish the legitimacy of the regime. But I'm sure both of us will win," Jibril Rajoub says, speaking of his brother. "There's nothing wrong with having him, as part of Hamas, in the government. I'm proud of that."

But Hamas isn't sure that it's actually prepared to be part of a government led by Fatah - particularly one with plans to carve out peace with Israel.

One top candidate in Hamas, interviewed in Ramallah, says that Hamas is keeping its options open. It may decide to join Fatah and be a partner in the PA, or it may decide to instead play the role of a feisty opposition party, blocking attempts to make concessions in negotiations with Israel. Equally interesting, however, may be what Hamas plans to do domestically with its bolstered muscle and putative legitimacy.

"We want to clean the internal Palestinian house, to put an end to corruption in the Palestinian Authority, and to bring to justice those who have stolen from the people," says Ahmad Abdel-Aziz Mubarek, a Ramallah candidate for Hamas. "The Authority sometimes banned Hamas people from getting jobs and harassed them. We will put an end to that." The Gaza situation

Driving much of the dissatisfaction with the PA is the lawlessness that has gripped Gaza since Israeli disengagement last year. At a polling station there, a spurt of machine-gun fire rang out. Voters and election workers barely flinched as sporadic gunfire has become all too common in the coastal strip.

There was plenty else to fuel the anxiety. Hamas leader Mahmoud az-Zahar predicted there would be voter fraud, and last month a Fatah primary in Gaza was cancelled because of attacks on voting booths. But voting Wednesday was festive nonetheless. Banners of Fatah yellow and Hamas green fluttered from taxis and minivans ferrying groups of voters to the polls.

"Congratulations, Palestine for the day of democracy, the day of freedom," crooned a singer on a radio station.

DOJ_NMG_0012262

In the southern Gaza town of Rafah, voters cast ballots at a school surrounded by bullet-ravaged buildings, a grim reminder of the five-year Israeli war against the Palestinians.

Atidal Hafagah says the outer wall of her house was once destroyed by the Israelis, but life has improved since the September withdrawal of Israeli settlers from Gaza. A black hijab covering her face, Hafagah says she voted for Hamas, which she thought would rid the PA of corruption and institute Islamic rule. Hamas to promote Islamic law

Indeed, Mr. Mubarek says that Hamas gradually will change Palestinian society so that it conforms with Islamic law, or sharia. For example, he says, Hamas will see to it that the casino in Jericho will be closed down, since gambling is forbidden in Islam.

He says that it should be mandatory that people give zakkat, or charity, which is one of a Muslim's five major religious duties. "Christians will pay a different kind of tax," he adds, "and we will consider Christians as full citizens. We will deal with the minorities in Palestine according to Islamic rules."

Campaign pledges like these may have attracted some voters, but they quickly turn others off - including other Muslims.

At the Deheishe Refugee Camp in Bethlehem, secular Palestinians were trying to round up support for a leftist party, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, one of 11 lists in the race.

"Hamas wants an Islamic state, not a Palestinian state," says Mohammed Ramadan, a schoolteacher who was dismayed by growing support for Hamas. "We believe we need to build our state with a political and social program, without imposing Islam on people." US, Israel refuse to deal with Hamas

Outside the polling station in Dar Salah, a large village southeast of Jerusalem, Hamas certainly seemed the most palpable presence.

Although members of Fatah were elected last year to lead the local council, posters of Hamas carpeted the ramshackle town overlooking the desert. Most of the posters featured Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and Abdul Aziz Rantissi, two top Hamas leaders assassinated by Israel in 2004.

A white four-wheel drive vehicle, festooned with Hamas flags, sat parked at the entrance to the school where voters entered.

"We will cooperate with anyone who has clean hands, who safeguards the Palestinian people, and who opposes the occupation," says Nidal Huzeibi, the man with the keys. "But I totally reject recognition of Israel because they don't give us our rights," he says. "I'm 100 percent sure that Hamas will soon be the largest force on the Palestinian street."

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, whose seat is not up for reelection, said Wednesday that the PA will renew negotiations with Israel even if Hamas is a partner in the government. But the US and Israel have made clear that they will not deal with Hamas, which they consider a terrorist group.

Former President Jimmy Carter, heading a 900-member observer mission to the elections, told reporters Wednesday that the US would distinguish being Hamas in the legislative branch and Hamas at the helm: "The US government is prepared to continue to deal with the Palestinian Authority with Hamas members in the government. But if Hamas members become part of the executive branch, US law would preclude dealing with them."

After The Election, Hamas Must Learn To Govern (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

GAZA CITY — With its capture of at least a third of the vote in Wednesday's parliamentary election, the Islamist group Hamas has cemented its place in the heart of the Palestinian political establishment and fundamentally altered it.

But the group now faces dilemmas it has never confronted before. Hamas will have to decide whether to enter into a parliamentary alliance with its archrival, Fatah, and whether to take Cabinet positions in a new government controlled by Fatah.

Most important, it must decide whether to formally renounce its stated goal of Israel's destruction and open the way for negotiations with the Jewish state.

With roots in the rubble-strewn streets and teeming mosques of Gaza Strip refugee camps, Hamas has always harbored deep mistrust of the secular-minded ruling Fatah movement. The group's very name, an Arabic acronym for Islamic Resistance Movement, was a deliberate rebuke to all who sought accommodation of any kind with Israel.

At times during the last decade, Hamas' enmity toward Fatah has rivaled its hatred of Israel. Many rank-and-file Hamas activists, along with the organization's senior leaders, have served time not only in Israeli jails, but in Palestinian Authority prisons.

Hamas by no means speaks with one voice on these crucial questions, even when the same person is doing the talking. In recent days, views aired by Hamas candidates and officials have ranged from conciliatory to studiedly vague to utterly unyielding.

DOJ_NMG_0012263

"Never!" snapped Mahmoud Zahar, a senior figure in the group, when asked Wednesday whether Hamas would recognize Israel. But Zahar, one of the few members of Hamas' upper echelon to escape assassination by Israeli forces over the last 2 1/2 years, also said this week that negotiations with Israel were not "taboo," especially if conducted through a third party.

Those who have closely observed Hamas through the years note its tendency to scrap any strategy the group believes has run its course, without necessarily trumpeting the fact that it is doing so.

Hamas did not carry out any suicide bombings inside Israel in 2005, a period that coincided with its first entry into the political arena. That strategic shift paid off with victories in municipal elections that gave Hamas control of dozens of cities, towns and villages across the West Bank and Gaza.

Over the last two decades, Hamas built a formidable following by trading on its perceived standing as an outsider, even an underdog. Being part of the Palestinian power structure will inevitably change that dynamic.

"It's good that the people are with us," Imad Afana, a Hamas election observer, said as he watched his refugee-camp neighbors waiting patiently to cast ballots Wednesday. "But we cannot pretend that the result will not be complicated for us — very, very complicated."

Governance of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, as the Palestinian Authority has long since discovered, is a messy affair. Hamas honed a reputation for fiscal integrity while administering its far-flung network of schools, clinics and charities, but playing any significant role in the sprawling, ineffectual Palestinian bureaucracy carries the risk of taint.

"You are about to enter the Authority; we warmly greet you," senior Fatah candidate Mohammed Dahlan rather sardonically told Zahar during a televised debate this week. Then came the zinger: "It's time for you to become acquainted with the suffering of being in government."

The Palestinian election campaign bared fault lines within not only Hamas, but Israel. Impassioned debate has broken out over whether the Jewish state can possibly have any political dealings with a group whose suicide bombings wrought carnage on commuter buses and in crowded cafes and markets.

"It is important to understand that the participation of terror elements in democratic elections ... is a Trojan horse that will destroy democracy from within," Ron Prosor, director-general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, told an academic conference this week.

But former Prime Minister Shimon Peres, a senior figure in the centrist Kadima Party that is expected to win Israel's March 28 general election, argued that Israel should realize that pragmatic self-interest may have changed Hamas' agenda.

"We are not fighting against a name — we are fighting against a situation," Peres told Israel Radio this week. "If the situation changes, then what difference does a name make?"

Already, Israel is starting to draw a distinction between dealing with a Palestinian government in which Hamas takes part and one controlled by Hamas.

The Bush administration, too, appeared to be giving itself room to maneuver. Though the United States considers Hamas a terrorist organization and refuses any direct dealings with it, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack on Tuesday refused to rule out negotiations with a Palestinian government that included Hamas ministers.

Some observers point out that a Hamas role in government would give Israel the advantage of dealing with a ruling body that better represents the spectrum of Palestinian political views, perhaps making for more realistic talks.

"This time around, everything that was hidden during years of negotiations will finally be on the table," Nasser Laham, editor-in-chief of the Palestinian news agency Maan, wrote in a commentary for the Israeli newspaper Maariv.

A premier Israeli political commentator, Nahum Barnea, warned that with Hamas as a player in government, the fractious Fatah would have to pull itself together or risk being outflanked.

"In the new Palestinian parliament, a cohesive and disciplined Hamas faction will contend with a disintegrated and conflicted Fatah," Barnea wrote in the Yediot Aharonot daily.

In historical terms, any Israeli decision to engage Hamas would be reminiscent of its policy shift toward the Palestine Liberation Organization after it recognized Israel's existence, opening the path to negotiations.

"The entire process calls to mind what happened to the PLO," said Shaul Mishal, a Tel Aviv University professor whose specialty is Hamas. "I understand that this is a long, rough road, but these are the new Palestinian politics, and this could be the light at the end of the tunnel."

Although Fatah cannot help but be stung by Hamas' latest showing of electoral strength, its senior officials may sense a fresh opportunity to co-opt the Islamist group rather than try to defeat it in a head-on military confrontation. That has been Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' wish all along.

"What we see is that Hamas may change its views," Abbas told the satellite TV channel Al Arabiya this week.

Hamas is reluctant to tip its hand about disarming, and for now, the group plainly intends to have it both ways.

"The Europeans and Americans are telling Hamas to choose between having weapons and being in government," said Ismail Haniya, the top Hamas candidate. "But we say we will go for arms — and parliament."

DOJ_NMG_0012264

WASHINGTON WIRE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

President Bush, in an Oval Office interview, declared that he isn't ready yet to deal with the radical Palestinian Islamist group Hamas no matter how well it does in Wednesday's Palestinian elections.

Speaking to The Wall Street Journal as Palestinians were electing a new parliament, Bush lauded the Middle Eastern trend toward democracy that produced Palestinian elections, but he said that Hamas isn't a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel. "A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," the president said. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you." (Read a transcript of the interview1.)

On other international subjects, Bush said "it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy" in dealing with Iran's nuclear program. And he said his principal hope for resolving the impasse is a plan in which Russia would enrich uranium on behalf of the Iranians, and then ship the material to civilian nuclear plants in Iran, negating Iran's need to develop its own enrichment abilities. If such efforts don't work, Bush said, "clearly, there's a set of different options available through the [United Nations] Security Council, and now we're working with our friends to review those options."

The president also said his administration's controversial plan for warrantless wiretaps of phone conversations was designed by experts at the National Security Agency to improve on a process laid out by Congress in the 1970s for eavesdropping on U.S. citizens under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Mr. Bush said he didn't use the provisions of that law allowing for court approvals of wiretaps, even after they have been instituted, because "we require a different response to an enemy" in the age of terrorism. --Gerald F. Seib

* * *

Private-Sector Growth: When Alan Greenspan leaves the Fed at the end of the day Jan. 31, he will set up a consulting firm called Greenspan Associates based in Washington, D.C.

Greenspan plans to consult, give speeches, and write a book. One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said Wednesday will quit as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. Ms. Smith joined the Fed as communications director in 2001 after serving as press secretary to Clinton Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers. Ms. Smith's responsibilities went well beyond public affairs: she served in effect as Mr. Greenspan's chief of staff, advising him on relations with the public, politicians, and the media, Fed insiders say. She has also advised Fed policy makers on monetary policy communications, such as the post-meeting statement and meeting minutes, though not on the formulation of monetary policy itself.

Also assisting Mr. Greenspan in his new business, at least initially, is Anne Nielsen, who has been his office and research assistant since his days at Townsend-Greenspan, the advisory service he ran before joining the Fed in 1987. The Fed said effective Feb. 1, David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesperson and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities. The elevation of Mr. Skidmore was made after consultation with Ben Bernanke, scheduled to take over as chairman on Feb. 1. Mr. Skidmore worked closely with Mr. Bernanke during his term as governor from 2002 to 2005. The promotion suggests that the transition will not trigger any major turnover among senior staff or the appointment of outsiders to key advisory positions, as has occurred at some other federal agencies like the CIA and SEC. --Greg Ip * * *

Medicaid Requirement: Millions of low-income U.S. citizens would have trouble meeting Medicaid's new proof-of-citizenship requirements that are poised for passage in Congress, a new survey finds.

Under the new rules, part of the budget-reconciliation agreement scheduled for a final House vote next month, Medicaid recipients would have to document their citizenship in order to get health benefits from the federal-state program for the poor. In effect, that means producing a birth certificate or passport.

But one in 12 U.S.-born adults with annual incomes below $25,000 reported not having either of those documents, according to a survey of about 2,000 people commissioned by the liberal-leaning Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. More than one in 10 adults said they didn't have a birth certificate or passport for at least one of their children. The center said that indicates as many as 4.6 million low-income citizens would have trouble meeting the new requirements, which were pushed by some Republicans as a way to ensure that illegal immigrants aren't getting Medicaid coverage. That means those needing Medicaid -- or trying to requalify for it, which often is required every six months -- might be excluded from coverage or would have to wait while they obtain proper documentation.

"It's going to cause problems for a lot of people," said Leighton Ku, a co-author of the paper. Many other groups unlikely to have the documents -- such as Katrina survivors and people in nursing homes -- weren't represented in the survey, he said. The survey showed a high percentage of elderly people -- particularly African-Americans -- lack birth certificates and passports, he added. --Sarah Lueck * * *

DOJ_NMG_0012265

Top to Bottom: U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman aims to conclude his "top-to-bottom review" of trade policy toward China soon.

Results of the administration-wide initiative are being closely held, but aides mull making it public in mid-February after the Bush administration moves beyond releasing the president's fiscal 2007 budget.

A top Portman aide, Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia, said the China initiative is in the final stages. "This has been a valuable effort and one that bears repeating from time to time to make sure that our trade policy with respect to China remains on course," Mr. Bhatia told the U.S.-China Business Council Wednesday. Mr. Portman promised to conduct the review last year, amid rising fears on Capitol Hill about the economic threat posed by Beijing.

Insisting that "China's apprentice period must now come to a close," Mr. Bhatia urged Beijing to shoulder more responsibility as a leader in the rules-based global trading system. He warned that the Bush administration "will not hesitate, when appropriate, to use all tools at its disposal to ensure that China lives up to its commitments, including dispute settlement at the WTO or the use of trade remedies within our legal system." --Greg Hitt * * *

McCain

Remembering Rehnquist: Arizona Republican Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl propose spending $10 million to set up a judicial research center in honor the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. Their bill would authorize $2 million annually through 2011 for a William H. Rehnquist Center on Constitutional Structures and Judicial Independence at the University of Arizona law school. The bill says the center "would advance nonpartisan scholarship about the judicial branch," particularly in areas the chief justice "held dearest" -- "constitutional federalism, judicial independence and the separation of powers." Although born in Milwaukee and educated at Stanford University, Chief Justice Rehnquist rose to prominence as a practicing attorney and Republican activist in Phoenix. President Nixon appointed him a Supreme Court associate justice in 1971, and in 1986 President Reagan elevated him to chief justice. He died in September at age 80 and was succeeded by his former clerk, John Roberts. --Jess Bravin * * *

Tuesday, Jan. 24

With the Feb. 3 deadline on renewing Patriot Act provisions looming, Senate Democrats predict a deal can be reached soon. To speed it along, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont is trying to tap First Lady Laura Bush's sympathies as a former school librarian.

"The time is fast approaching when we have to extend it or change it," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who hinted that House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.) will find it harder to block an extension next week. "Sensenbrenner doesn't run the House. There will be 434 other people over there," Reid said. "I think everyone agrees that with a little bit of time alone, Leahy and [Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen] Specter can work out the problems."

Majority Leader Bill Frist predicts that "ultimately if we do an extension for six to eight weeks, I think we'll be able to work it out." But any Senate deal must also be sold to the House, where Republican turmoil over leadership races could be an obstacle. "We have to work through it here," Frist said. "Then I've got to shop that over there, which -- until they get through and things settle down -- will be hard. So we need just another six weeks."

Leahy, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Democrat, recalled a Jan. 6 conversation with top players and President Bush, who had gathered at the White House for a signing ceremony for an unrelated bill. "I raised the fact that we could easily do that, work out the few remaining differences," said Leahy, who played to the first lady on the issue of searches involving libraries. "I said, `Why don't we work out that problem with the librarians?' I mentioned librarians twice and Mrs. Bush caught my drift." --David Rogers * * *

Information, Please: The U.S. dialogue with China is intensifying on the important issue of enforcing intellectual-property rights.

The two camps have sparred in recent weeks over the legal basis of a U.S. move, launched through the Geneva-based World Trade Organization last October, to compel China to provide detailed descriptions of intellectual-property rights cases it has pursued as well as the penalties imposed on infringers. But a senior U.S. trade official said Tuesday that Beijing and Washington have set aside the dispute over whether the U.S. has the right to the information and, for now, are focusing on ways to allow an exchange of the disputed information.

"They have expressed an openness to work with us," the official said. "They've agreed to talk with us." The U.S. official said filing a piracy complaint against China at the WTO "remains a possibility," but stressed the U.S. is working through a number of channels, including bilateral talks, to encourage China to step up its enforcement. --Greg Hitt * * *

DOJ_NMG_0012266

Lost Millions: Another Pentagon audit of Iraq reconstruction work found that a variety of jobs were never done and millions of dollars are missing. The report of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction4 examined 907 contracts and "micro-purchases" totaling about $88 million that were awarded by U.S. officials using Iraqi funds in 2003 and 2004.

The audit found that 17% of the work, totaling $16.3 million, was not competitively bid, that $87,000 in cash was somehow lost, and that $6.3 million was transferred to "unauthorized persons" without any trace of work being done in return. The report said that $471,000 was paid to install Internet service in the city of Ramadi, but quotes an internal memo saying, "There is no way to verify this project was ever completed, because we don't even know where exactly in Ramadi it was supposed to take place." Another 11 contracts were overpaid to the tune of $571,000.

The Justice Department has charged some U.S. officials and contractors with fraud in connection with similar work in southern Iraq, and more prosecutions are expected. --Neil King Jr. * * *

With an eye toward the oldest members of the Supreme Court, the White House is trying to scratch out a filibuster-proof 60 votes for Judge Samuel Alito to set a conservative standard that gives Bush some maneuvering room in the event of another opening.

Insiders say the odds of achieving that goal aren't good. But Bush allies take heart that the Democrats' vigorous opposition to Judge Alito irritated enough of the Republican members of the Gang of 14 -- the bipartisan group of senators who neutralized Democrats' threat to block Bush judicial nominees and Republicans' threat to change Senate rules to ban filibusters -- to edge them closer to voting for a judicial filibuster ban down the road.

After announcing the Judiciary Committee's 10-8 party-line vote for Judge Alito, Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the panel's ranking Democrat, and Republican Committee Chairman Arlen Specter wrap it up: "OK, Arlen," said Sen. Leahy as he grabbed his papers. "OK, Patrick," the chairman replied. --Jeanne Cummings

· Read excerpts5 from the Senate Judiciary Committee's meeting to vote on Alito, and see a chart of the nominees6 to the Supreme Court since the start of the Nixon administration.

* * *

Frist

Asbestos Warning: With the Senate beginning hearings on lobbying overhaul Wednesday, Frist warned Democrats against trying to use the issue to delay action on the asbestos bill.

In a letter Tuesday to Reid, Frist predicted passage of the lobbying bill early this year -- "done right and well, not fast and foolish." But the Tennessean said asbestos action has waited long enough. "This problem is devastating and it requires leadership and action," he wrote to Reid. "To postpone debate on this issue is to blatantly ignore a very real problem." --David Rogers * * *

Frustration, continued: White House officials have been frustrated for months that President Bush gets so little credit from the public for an economy that's moving along reasonably well. They will have to continue to be frustrated, it appears. A new poll7 from the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press shows that only about a third of Americans (34%) rate economic conditions as excellent or good. Almost twice as many -- 64% -- call conditions only fair or poor. Overall, attitudes are darker than they were a year ago.

The poll's authors note that on this front, as on so many, views have grown more divided along partisan lines. More than half of Republicans see an economy that's excellent or good. Just 28% of independents and 23% of Democrats agree the economy is doing well. One of the goals of Bush's State of the Union speech next week is to improve public perceptions of the economy overall. The telephone survey of 1,503 adults nationwide has a three percentage point margin of error. --Jerry Seib * * *

Bernanke

Speech Pattern: Kevin Hassett, economist at the American Enterprise Institute offers a bit of advice to Ben Bernanke, Bush's choice to head the Federal Reserve: In the early days on the job, sound as much like Chairman Alan Greenspan as possible. "Take an Alan Greenspan speech, run it through Google into Spanish then translate it back. It's still basically a Greenspan speech." --Greg Ip * * *

Flood Watch: Overhauling the National Flood Insurance Program is a prominent item on the Senate's agenda. The program has been thrust deeply in the red by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, with damage from the two storms expected to reach $23 billion -- almost all on the taxpayers' tab.

The Senate Banking Committee will kick off the debate Wednesday at a hearing on how to fix the system, "which is clearly broken," said a committee spokesman. Some lawmakers, including Committee Chairman Richard Shelby of Alabama, suggest that the insurance program should be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company.

A first step may be for Congress to direct the program to deny coverage to properties that are repeatedly flooded, they say. Also to be considered is an idea being pushed by Republican Rep. Richard Baker of Louisiana to form a new government agency to oversee redevelopment of storm-battered Louisiana. The House Financial Services Committee passed a flood insurance bill late last year, but it hasn't come up for a floor vote. --Michael Schroeder

DOJ_NMG_0012267

Vote Complicates Area's Diplomacy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration has strongly urged Palestinian leaders not to permit any Hamas members into the Palestinian cabinet, but yesterday's better-than-expected electoral showing by a group labeled a terrorist organization by the United States greatly complicates the administration's diplomacy in the region, U.S. officials said yesterday.

Hamas, which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, appears to have ridden a wave of popular disgust at the perceived corruption and incompetence of the ruling Fatah Party. Exit polls indicate Fatah will have only a slim edge over Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, giving Hamas a strong claim to a role in the government.

Fatah in theory may still be able to form a government that excludes Hamas -- formally the Islamic Resistance Movement -- but Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has expressed hope that by bringing Hamas into the political process, it will become a partner in seeking a peace accord with Israel.

The results also suggested the risks inherent in the Bush administration's campaign to bring democracy to the Middle East. Administration spokesmen officially celebrated the "historic moment" for the Palestinians while officials privately reeled at the outcome.

Bush administration officials had hoped Hamas would get as little as 20 percent of the vote. The Washington Post reported Sunday that the United States had spent $2 million in recent weeks to promote the Palestinian Authority, and by extension Fatah, in a campaign that kept U.S. involvement hidden. Before yesterday, officials were bracing for Hamas to receive 30 to 40 percent of the vote; exit polls indicated that Hamas topped 40 percent of the seats.

U.S. officials, from President Bush on down, reiterated that the United States will not deal with Hamas as long as it does not renounce violence.

"A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace," Bush said in an interview with the Wall Street Journal yesterday. "And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you."

Bush's statement left open the possibility that the United States would not reject a Palestinian government that includes Hamas, but instead that the United States would not work directly with cabinet ministers who have Hamas connections. There is a precedent for this approach: The Bush administration already works with the Lebanese government, even though one cabinet member is a member of Hezbollah, also labeled a terrorist group.

The U.S. ambassador to Israel, Dick Jones, was quoted this week in the Israeli newspaper Haaretz as saying the Lebanese model might serve as a guide for dealing with the Palestinian Authority if Hamas joins the government. Jones has told officials in Washington the remarks were made at a dinner party and were taken out of context.

One major issue is that the United States has much more extensive dealings with the Palestinian Authority than it does with Lebanon. Hamas has indicated it would like to obtain ministerial portfolios that touch on social services, raising questions about whether some of the hundreds of millions of dollars in annual U.S. aid could continue to flow to certain public works projects if they are overseen by a Hamas cabinet member.

Moreover, with Israel facing critical elections in March, the administration must deal carefully with the emerging Palestinian government.

The administration must also hold together its allies in the peace process, particularly the European Union. Last late year, the sponsors of the "road map" peace plan, known as the Quartet, issued a statement saying that "a future Palestinian Authority cabinet should include no member who has not committed to the principles of Israel's right to exist in peace and security and an unequivocal end to violence and terrorism."

But that statement was not categorical, and some European officials have indicated in recent days that instead of the black-and-white view expressed by the United States, perhaps Hamas needed greater encouragement to make a break with its past, much like the Irish Republican Army. One U.S. official sighed that the European Union was like the "International House of Pancakes -- there are a ton of waffles there."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet in London next week with her counterparts from the European Union, Russia and the United Nations to try to reach an agreement. "There will be a very healthy debate about how to encourage Hamas to eschew violence and get into the political process," one diplomat involved in the discussions said.

DOJ_NMG_0012268

Hamas Presses Fatah In Palestinian Vote, Surveys Say (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 25 — Hamas, the militant Islamic party sworn to the destruction of Israel, won a large share of votes in the first Palestinian legislative elections in a decade, depriving the more secular Fatah party of its longstanding monopoly on power, surveys of voters leaving the polls indicated Wednesday.

While those surveys showed Fatah with a narrow lead, the vote marked the first entry of Hamas into representative Palestinian politics, a fundamental change, and its strong showing raised questions about the near-term future of any peace talks with Israel.

The acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, said his country could not accept a situation in which Hamas would be part of the Palestinian Authority if the group remained armed with unchanged goals.

Detailed results for the parliament's 132 seats are not expected until Thursday. Numerous Fatah candidates are competing against one another, which could allow Hamas candidates to win in some constituencies with a minority of the votes.

But judging from the polls, Fatah, though battered, should be able to form a working majority in coalition with other independent or secular parties like that of Salam Fayyad, the former finance minister who is considered a likely choice for prime minister. But Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, who will choose a prime minister, is thought to favor the inclusion of at least a few Hamas ministers to draw the party into the duties and responsibilities of government.

As voter surveys indicated that Fatah may have fended off the Hamas challenge, celebratory gunfire echoed through Ramallah's streets. The election itself went off remarkably smoothly, with little trouble at any of the more than 1,000 polling stations or in East Jerusalem, where Israel allowed Palestinians to cast "absentee ballots" in post offices. About 900 foreign observers, including former President Jimmy Carter and the former Swedish prime minister, Carl Bildt, monitored the voting. In a preliminary assessment, an official from a United States delegation called the voting "generally smooth, with sporadic violence and a robust turnout."

An exit poll from the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, headed by Khalil Shikaki, showed Fatah winning 42 percent of the national vote and Hamas 35 percent, with a margin of sampling error of 2 percentage points.

Another such survey from Birzeit University indicated that Fatah would get 46 percent of the vote to Hamas's 39 percent. That would mean Fatah would be short of a majority of the legislature's 132 seats. The leftist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine could get several seats, Mr. Fayyad's list would get a couple, as would another independent one and the leftist Badil list. The director, Nader Said, cautioned that the poll should be treated as indicative, not final.

Palestinian voters, candidates and analysts said they expected Hamas to take some cabinet positions in service or welfare ministries, thus joining the government, but in jobs that would not necessarily require contact with Israel. But Hamas could stay out of the government and remain a parliamentary opposition, telling its voters that its job is to keep Fatah honest and to protect those who fight against Israeli occupation.

Ahmed Mubarak, a Hamas candidate in Ramallah and an Islamic jurist, said that "I personally see no problem with being in the government if we were confident it will be for the sake of the people."

The Palestinian Authority is committed, under the internationally backed peace plan known as the road map, to dismantling armed militias and "terrorist capabilities and infrastructure."

Inside the government or out, then, Hamas is considered likely to keep the Palestinian president, Mr. Abbas — known as Abu Mazen — and the new government from pursuing serious negotiations with Israel on any basis that Israel is likely to accept.

In a meeting with Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Democrat of Delaware, Israel's acting prime minister, Mr. Olmert, said: "I will not negotiate with a government that does not meet its most basic obligations — to fight terrorism. We are prepared to assist the Palestinians and Abu Mazen very much but they must meet their commitments."

Israel, the United States and Europe all label Hamas a terrorist organization, and while American and European officials say they will not meet or deal with any Hamas officials, they will continue to have close relations with Mr. Abbas and a new Palestinian prime minister, much as they do in Lebanon, where Hezbollah, a radical Islamic party, has cabinet representation.

Mr. Abbas pressed for these elections against considerable opposition from inside Fatah, convinced that the only way to tame Hamas and turn it from an armed militia to a political party was through representative democracy. A normally stiff and shy man, Mr. Abbas looked positively happy on Wednesday morning as he voted with his wife and then posed for the television cameras.

"We are so happy with this election festival," he said. Palestinians were festive, too, coming out in large numbers to vote in an election they understood to be a vital moment for their own history. Turnout was estimated by officials at nearly 78 percent of the 1.3 million eligible voters.

DOJ_NMG_0012269

Mr. Abbas also had words of calm for Israel. "The Israelis should have no reason to be fearful but rather pleased as we are building a democracy which can serve as a base for peace between us," he said. "I am always ready for negotiations with the Israelis although they must want them on their side."

Israel is engaged in its own election campaign and with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon still comatose after a massive stroke, it is not likely any time soon to talk to any government containing Hamas representatives. The Hamas showing and what should now be done will be a major issue in the Israeli campaign, which ends March 28.

Although Mr. Abbas has promised Washington that he will move to disarm Hamas after these elections, there is considerable skepticism that he will be able to do so.

Voting himself on Wednesday, the head of Hamas's candidate list, Ismail Haniya, said: "The Americans and the Europeans say to Hamas: either you have weapons or you enter the legislative council. We say weapons and the legislative council. There is no contradiction between the two."

The comments point up the awkwardness of any Fatah-Hamas coalition. Fatah, a secular, nationalist movement, wants to restart negotiations with Israel based on the road map, the dormant peace plan that was introduced in 2003, and Mr. Abbas has often suggested parallel secret talks with Israel on a final agreement.

Hamas has waged a suicide bombing campaign and always rejected negotiations with Israel. During the campaign, some Hamas leaders toned down their rhetoric, and the group has largely abided by a truce announced early last year, and is expected to continue to do so, focusing on an internal agenda and keeping its promise to voters of "change and reform." Still, Hamas leaders say the group will not lay down its weapons.

The polling stations here in Ramallah were vivid with the yellow flags of Fatah and the green of Hamas and the colorful posters of individual candidates and others of the 11 party lists running, as candidates and party workers handed out election material and lobbied voters up until the entrance of the stations.

Voters were anxious but talkative, pleased with the process of democracy but worried about the results.

Mai Alami, a mother of three girls and one boy, said the election was vital and would bring some needed "fresh faces" to a stagnant politics in the wake of the death of Yasir Arafat more than a year ago. "But we're afraid of the Islamic party," she said, "not because we are against them, but because of their prejudice and their policies."

Fatah was being punished by voters for the misrule and corruption of the last 12 years, Ms. Alami said outside the busy polling station at the elegant stone Friends Boys School.

Her husband, Ali Khashen, a constitutional lawyer, said the election also gave legitimacy to independent candidates like Mr. Fayyad and Mustafa Barghouti. "But now with Hamas we may have more obstacles for the peace process just as Israel was becoming more receptive," he said. "We all formed our agenda around Fatah, and now we need a new strategy."

In East Jerusalem, Fida Abdellatif, an architect, said: "This election is different because there is a full spectrum of parties, which wasn't the case before. We hope this will produce a strong leadership that everyone can support."

Mr. Abbas hopes so, too. He met on Wednesday with Senator Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and suggested that he was considering ways to press Hamas to disarm, the senator said. "He said they'd have to choose in the end, that they can't be part of a government and have a militia," Senator Biden said. Mr. Abbas also asked the United States not to react too quickly to the Hamas vote and to continue to help him improve, reform and equip the Palestinian security services.

But the election also marked a fundamental change in Palestinian politics and a political earthquake rare in Arab countries.

"Fatah has decided to share power, that's the point," said Nader Said of Birzeit University here. "It's not easy for them, but in no Arab country I can think of has any ruling party wittingly shared power in a democratic process."

Mr. Said says that the transition will be difficult, and Fatah's own divisions will resurface. "But things will never be the same," he said. "Hamas has accepted to be a part of the political game, and it will never be able to be as militant or hard-line as it used to be, no matter its rhetoric."

Fatah, though its campaign finally came to life in the last 10 days, suffered from "tremendous disappointment in Fatah and the Palestinian Authority and Abu Mazen," said the pollster Khalil Shikaki. "There was anger about corruption, chaos, lack of law and order and a lot of disillusionment." Despite Hamas's participation and support, he said, the election "was not really about the peace process — in fact three-quarters of Palestinians support the peace process and negotiations" and are more moderate on final-status issues like Jerusalem and refugees than ever before.

"Fatah will get more votes than Hamas today," Mr. Shikaki said. "But this is the last opportunity Fatah will have to get its act together." And if Mr. Abbas does not choose a candidate for prime minister that can get the support of Fatah's younger generation, Mr. Shikaki said, "you could see Fatah split."

Mr. Shikaki said he believed that Hamas wanted to join the cabinet in some role, and that Mr. Abbas also wanted it to do so, but would not predicate participation on disarmament.

DOJ_NMG_0012270

"Abu Mazen wants to disarm Hamas, but through consensus, not confrontation," he said. "Hamas won't agree to disarm as a precondition, but could agree to hand over weapons voluntarily."

Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 -- Iran's leading negotiator on nuclear issues said here Wednesday that his country was open to a compromise proposal from Russia that it enrich uranium for Iran on Russian soil to guarantee it would be used only for peaceful purposes, not to create nuclear weapons. But he said the idea needed fine-tuning in advance of further talks scheduled for the middle of next month.

"Our attitude to the proposal is positive," said Ali Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, after talks here with the secretary of the Russian Security Council, Igor Ivanov. "The project won't have the full potential to resolve all problems. It should be fine-tuned, together with other measures."

The foreign ministers of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the United States, China, Russia, France and Britain -- plus Germany plan to meet Monday in London in advance of a Feb. 2 emergency session of the board of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency.

The United States, France and Britain are pushing for a vote at the IAEA to refer Iran to the Security Council, which can impose sanctions. They fear that Iran is attempting to develop nuclear weapons, and enrichment is a key step in that process. Iranian officials say their nuclear program is solely for the purpose of generating electricity but that Iran has the right to control of the entire nuclear fuel cycle.

The positions of Russia and China on referring Iran to the Security Council remain unclear. Russia, which has expressed doubts about the idea, is helping Iran build a nuclear power plant. Iran is a major supplier of energy to China, which needs power for its rapid industrialization.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said Wednesday in Beijing that he told Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao that it would be "extremely dangerous" to allow the proliferation of nuclear weapons in the Middle East and that it would damage China's interest in energy security. Larijani is scheduled to arrive in China for talks Thursday.

Larijani said Wednesday that if the Feb. 2 meeting referred Iran to the Security Council, the country would begin enrichment. "In this case," he said, "our activities will not be limited to research and we'll begin industrial enrichment of uranium."

Some Western officials fear that the Iranians are appearing to consider the Russian offer in order to buy time and prevent any Russian vote to send the matter to the council.

Iran Open To Nuclear Venture With Russia (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 — Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said here today that he welcomed a Russian proposal to defuse the confrontation between Iran and the West over its nuclear programs by establishing a joint venture to enrich uranium in Russia. But he indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated.

"Our attitude to the proposal is positive," Mr. Larijani, the secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, said after meeting with his Russian counterpart, Igor S. Ivanov, Russian news agencies reported. "We tried to bring the positions of the two sides closer."

At the same time, he warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if Iran's nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council. His remarks came a day after he and Mr. Ivanov said the confrontation should be resolved at the International Atomic Energy Agency, whose governors are to meet next week.

Although the Russian proposal has been seen as a possible compromise, Mr. Larijani's remarks made it clear that further discussions on it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna.

Russia has publicized few details of the proposal, including whether Iran's involvement in a joint venture would simply be financial or whether it would be scientific as well. Russia had previously offered to produce uranium for a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran on condition that the spent fuel be returned to Russia for reprocessing.

"The big issue for the Russians will be how much the Iranians demand technical access to the processes," said Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Moscow Carnegie Center and a former nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration.

DOJ_NMG_0012271

President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia expanded on the idea of a joint enrichment facility today by expressing support for establishing an international center for providing nuclear fuel to nations that seek to develop civilian nuclear power plants. He said that Russia "was prepared to set up an international center of this kind on its territory."

The idea of international enrichment centers, which has been endorsed by the atomic energy agency's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei, and others, would be to provide fuel under strict international supervision, negating the need for countries to develop their own enrichment capabilities and lowering the risk that civilian work could be used to support weapons programs.

Mr. Putin said that he would make the proposal a part of negotiations with leaders of the Group of Eight industrial nations later this year.

"Further development of peaceful uses of nuclear energy ranks among our priorities," he said, Interfax reported, at a meeting in St. Petersburg with leaders of former Soviet republics.

Iran Wants More Work On Nuke Deal (AJC/AP)

By Steve Gutterman, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW — Iran's top nuclear negotiator said Wednesday that a Russian proposal to enrich uranium for the Islamic republic needs more work, and renewed a threat that, if the issue is referred to the U.N. Security Council, Tehran will forge ahead with technology that can make nuclear arms.

Ali Larijani's comments came amid quickening diplomatic negotiations ahead of a crucial Feb. 2 meeting of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, which could refer the issue to the Security Council. The 15-member council has the power to impose sanctions on Iran.

Larijani suggested it would take time to work out details of Russia's proposal — a Western-backed compromise that could provide more oversight and ease fears that Tehran is using its pursuit of atomic power as a front for a nuclear weapons program.

In Washington, President Bush said Russia's proposal offered the best chance for resolving the impasse, adding "it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy" in dealing with Iran.

If such efforts do not work, Bush said, "clearly, there's a set of different options available through the Security Council, and now we're working with our friends to review those options." He made his remarks in an interview with The Wall Street Journal.

Iran, which insists its program is peaceful, has welcomed Moscow's suggestion that uranium could be enriched in Russia, then returned to Iran for use in the country's reactors. But haggling has continued over the specifics.

Uranium enrichment can produce fuel for nuclear reactors to generate electricity or, if sufficiently processed, the material for nuclear warheads.

"Our view of this offer is positive, and we tried to bring the positions of the sides closer," Larijani told reporters Wednesday, a day after talks with Russian security council chief Igor Ivanov. "This plan can be perfected in the future, during further talks that will be held in February."

"There are lots of details surrounding this offer that must be must be decided — the location of the plant, the form of participation, technical cooperation," Larijani said.

Speaking to Iranian state television after returning to Tehran, Larijani said the "minds of Iran and Russia are getting closer" but more effort was needed.

Russian officials have said further talks on the proposal would be held in Russia around Feb. 16 — two weeks after the emergency IAEA board meeting in Vienna, Austria.

Larijani also said Tehran would welcome talks with European countries — though an Iranian proposal to renew talks with the European Union was recently rejected.

State television quoted Larijani as saying Iran was ready to negotiate with all countries except Israel. Iranian officials normally reject negotiations with both Israel and the United States and it was not clear whether his comments signaled a shift in position.

Larijani reiterated that any attempt to refer Iran to the Security Council would lead the country to move forward with a full-scale uranium enrichment program.

"If they use political pressure, if our dossier is handed over or opened in an unofficial way by the Security Council, then according to a parliament decision we are obligated to revoke the fulfillment of all moratoriums," he said. "In this situation, our actions will not be limited to research. Then we will begin industrial enrichment."

He said Tehran also would be obliged to forsake a 2003 agreement with the IAEA that gave the agency more power to inspect Iranian nuclear sites and warned of unspecified additional actions to be revealed "in due time."

Iran removed IAEA seals from equipment Jan. 10, ending a 15-month moratorium, and announced it would restart research on nuclear fuel including what it described as small-scale enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0012272

European countries believe they will have enough votes at the emergency IAEA board session next week to haul Iran before the Security Council — a move also favored by the United States — but they want broad support, especially from Russia and China. Moscow and Beijing, which have close commercial ties with Iran and wield veto power in the Security Council, are not eager to see the issue come before the powerful U.N. body.

The issue also was expected to come up Monday on the sidelines of a donors conference on Afghanistan in London, with the State Department saying Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would use the forum to discuss Iran's nuclear program with key nations.

In Vienna, a diplomat accredited to the IAEA — who demanded anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the planned meeting with the media — said Washington and the Europeans would use the meeting to try to persuade reluctant Russia and China to support referral.

Larijani, meanwhile, was expected to meet with top Chinese officials in Beijing Thursday.

On Wednesday, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said he had warned Chinese officials that allowing Iran to develop nuclear weapons could threaten Beijing's crucial supplies of Middle Eastern oil.

The Russian enrichment plan presents President Vladimir Putin with an opportunity to please the West without sacrificing ties with Iran. Russia is building a reactor for Iran's first nuclear power plant.

Putin called for the creation of an international system of facilities to provide enrichment and other nuclear-cycle services to nations that want nuclear power. In televised comments Wednesday, he said Russia could establish the prototype facility on its territory.

Iran, Russia Fail To Reach Deal On Uranium Enrichment (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- Iran's top nuclear negotiator said Wednesday that Tehran saw Moscow's offer to have Iran's uranium enriched in Russia as a positive development but no agreement has been reached.

Chief negotiator Ali Larijani also reiterated Iran's threat to renew enrichment activities if it is referred to the United Nations Security Council.

After talks with Russian Security Council Chief Igor Ivanov, which included discussion of the plan to enrich uranium in Russia, Mr. Larijani told a news conference: "Our view of this offer is positive, and we tried to bring the positions of the sides closer." He added, "This plan can be perfected in the future, during further talks that will be held in February," speaking through a translator.

Mr. Larijani suggested that it would take some time to work out details of Russia's proposal. Some critics allege that the Iranians are using the proposal to stall for time as diplomatic pressure on Tehran mounts over its alleged nuclear-weapons program. "There are lots of details surrounding this offer that must be examined," Mr. Larijani said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Larijani and Mr. Ivanov said in a joint statement that Tehran's nuclear standoff must be resolved through the U.N. atomic watchdog agency's diplomatic efforts. The statement reflected Russia's efforts to delay Iran's referral to the U.N. Security Council and Moscow's opposition to international sanctions against Tehran.

"Both sides expressed their desire to solve the issue in a diplomatic way within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency," Russia's Security Council said after the two met.

Iran has warned that IAEA referral to the U.N. Security Council over its nuclear ambitions would lead it to move forward with a full-scale uranium-enrichment program, a possible precursor to making atomic weapons.

High-level diplomacy has intensified with little more than a week to go until the Feb. 2 meeting of the IAEA's 35-nation board.

Prior to that session, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will attend an international conference in London on Jan. 31 focusing on Afghanistan, but department spokesman Sean McCormack said Ms. Rice is expected to use the meeting to have discussions with key nations on Iran's nuclear program.

The New York Times reported the foreign ministers of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- Britain, France, Russia and China, in addition to the U.S. -- as well as Germany would attend the meeting.

Moscow has proposed having Iran's uranium enriched in Russia, then returned to Iran for use in the country's reactors -- a compromise that could provide more oversight and ease tensions. Haggling has continued over the specifics of the proposal, including Tehran's proposal to have China involved in the Russian enrichment process.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw urged Tehran on Tuesday to seriously consider Russia's offer to enrich Iran's uranium in an effort to end the standoff. Mr. Straw also said in an interview with the Associated Press that he hoped the IAEA would refer the matter to the Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0012273

The West fears Iran wants to develop a nuclear bomb, but Tehran says its intentions are peaceful and that it wants only civilian nuclear energy. Iran removed IAEA seals from equipment Jan. 10, ending a 15-month moratorium, and announced it would restart experiments including what it described as small-scale enrichment. The move led lead negotiators Germany, Britain and France to call for the Feb. 2 emergency board session.

European countries believe they have enough votes to haul Iran before the Security Council, but they want broad support including Russia, China and key developing nations.

In Washington, Ms. Rice said that "referral absolutely has to be made" on Feb. 2, while remaining vague on what action she thought the Security Council should take, and when.

Tehran Holds Up Russian Nuke Deal (WT/AP)

By Steve Gutterman

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW -- Iran's top nuclear negotiator said yesterday that a Russian proposal to enrich uranium for the Islamic republic needs more work and renewed a threat that Tehran will forge ahead with the technology that can make nuclear arms if the issue is referred to the U.N. Security Council.

Ali Larijani's comments came amid quickening diplomatic negotiations ahead of a crucial meeting next Thursday of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the U.N. nuclear watchdog that could refer the issue to the 15-nation council, which could impose sanctions.

Mr. Larijani suggested that it would take time to work out details of Russia's proposal -- a Western-backed compromise that could provide more oversight and ease fears that Tehran is pursuing a nuclear weapons program.

Iran has welcomed Moscow's proposal that uranium could be enriched in Russia, then returned to Iran for use in the country's reactors. But haggling has continued over the specifics.

"Our view of this offer is positive, and we tried to bring the positions of the sides closer," Mr. Larijani told reporters yesterday, a day after talks with Russian security council chief Igor Ivanov. "This plan can be perfected in the future, during further talks that will be held in February."

Russian officials have said further talks on the proposal would be held in Russia around Feb. 16 -- two weeks after the emergency IAEA board meeting in Vienna, Austria.

Hans Blix, a former IAEA director and chief U.N. weapons inspector in Iraq, said yesterday that Tehran could be offered a package of incentives to wean it away from a nuclear program.

Mr. Blix, chairman of the Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission in Sweden, said the package could be similar to that offered to North Korea, with a focus on security.

"We promised not to attack North Korea, and we opened diplomatic relations," Mr. Blix said in an address to the Arms Control Association in Washington. "If it's done for North Korea, I don't see why it couldn't be done for Iran."

Mr. Larijani said Tehran would welcome talks with European countries. But he reiterated that any attempt to refer Iran to the Security Council would lead the country to move forward with a full-scale uranium-enrichment program.

"If they use political pressure, if our dossier is handed over or opened in an unofficial way by the Security Council, then according to a parliament decision, we are obligated to revoke the fulfillment of all moratoriums," he said. "In this situation, our actions will not be limited to research. Then we will begin industrial enrichment."

European countries think they will have enough votes at the IAEA board session next week to haul Iran before the Security Council, but Russia and China, which have close commercial ties with Iran.

Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 — Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said here on Wednesday that he welcomed a Russian proposal to defuse the confrontation between Iran and the West over its nuclear programs by establishing a joint venture to enrich uranium in Russia. But he indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated.

"Our attitude to the proposal is positive," Mr. Larijani, the secretary of the Supreme National Security Council, said after meeting with his Russian counterpart, Igor S. Ivanov, Russian news agencies reported. "We tried to bring the positions of the two sides closer."

DOJ_NMG_0012274

At the same time, he warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if its nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council. His remarks came a day after Mr. Larijani and Mr. Ivanov said the confrontation should be resolved at the International Atomic Energy Agency, whose governors are scheduled to meet next week.

Although the Russian proposal has been seen as a possible compromise, Mr. Larijani's remarks made it clear that further discussions of it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna.

Russia has publicized few details of the proposal. It has not addressed, for example, whether Iran's involvement in a joint venture would simply be financial or whether it would be scientific as well. Russia had previously offered to produce uranium for a nuclear power plant it is building in Iran on condition that the spent fuel be returned to Russia for reprocessing.

"The big issue for the Russians will be how much the Iranians demand technical access to the processes," said Rose Gottemoeller, director of the Moscow Carnegie Center and a former nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration.

Iran's Stonewalling At Heart Of Crisis (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors were anxious to learn if the military-run physics research center on the edge of Tehran was part of the uranium enrichment program that Iran had admitted hiding for 18 years.

But wrecking crews got in first.

Even as the inspectors waited in late 2003 for permission to enter, the top-secret Lavizan-Shian Technical Research Center was bulldozed flat and the tons of rubble and earth trucked into the desert and scattered, obliterating evidence that the IAEA had hoped to gather.

Iran's failure since then to fully explain activities at the site and its obfuscation, conflicting answers and stonewalling on other aspects of the enrichment program are at the heart of the crisis over its nuclear program.

The IAEA has been trying to determine whether Iran is developing nuclear arms behind the facade of a civilian nuclear project. Iran claims it has no weapons program.

Only by reconstructing the complete history and extent of Iran's nuclear work can the IAEA determine the truth. So far, that's been impossible.

"Even after three years (of investigation), I am not yet in a position to make a judgment on the peaceful nature of the program," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei lamented earlier this month to Newsweek magazine.

The dispute became a full-blown crisis on Jan. 10 when Iran ended a 26-month freeze on work on uranium enrichment, a method that produces fuel for both civilian power plants and warheads, depending on the duration of the process.

Iran claims the right to enrichment for peaceful purposes as a signer of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the key international safeguard against the spread of nuclear arms.

But the IAEA board of governors in September declared Tehran in breach of its treaty obligations to disclose all aspects of its program to the IAEA. This includes complete information on Iran's deals with the Pakistani-led smuggling ring that also supplied the know-how and technology to develop nuclear weapons to Libya.

The United States, Britain, France and Germany are pushing to have the IAEA board ask the U.N. Security Council to step up pressure on Iran to answer the IAEA's questions.

In October 2003, Iran gave the IAEA what it declared was a full accounting of its nuclear program. Agency experts quickly began finding holes.

Iran has filled some gaps and is promising to fill the rest. But in a Nov. 18 report to the IAEA board, ElBaradei complained that "there still remain issues to be resolved" and Iran's "full transparency is ... long overdue."

The agency's most pressing questions concern Iran's work on the equipment used to enrich uranium, whether it got blueprints for a Chinese nuclear weapon, and more about what was going on at the razed Lavizan-Shian research center.

Here's what Iran has done in each of these areas and why the IAEA is concerned:

CENTRIFUGES: These are devices that are linked together in the thousands to separate uranium 235, the isotope used to fuel power plants and weapons, from uranium hexafluoride gas.

Tehran asserts that it's working only on the P1, an older centrifuge whose design it admitted buying as part of a 1987 deal with the smuggling network led by A.Q. Khan, the father of Pakistan's nuclear arsenal.

But IAEA experts who studied materials and documents that the Khan ring supplied to Libya concluded that, like Libya, Iran also received the design of the P2, a device twice as efficient as the P1.

Confronted by the IAEA, Iran admitted omitting from its 2003 declaration a 1995 purchase of P2 blueprints from the Khan network.

DOJ_NMG_0012275

Iranian officials insisted that they did nothing with the blueprints until they were given to an engineering firm for limited research in 2002.

When IAEA inspectors visited the firm, they discovered that it had fabricated a P2 component from a specialized metal, maraging steel. They later determined that the firm had ties to the Iranian military.

Iran has dragged its feet on providing additional data on its P2 work.

"We have a deep and wide body of intelligence that Iran has a parallel clandestine centrifuge program, but we have never been able to get coordinates," said a U.S. official, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "We assume it is a P2 capacity they are focusing on."

Those suspicions grew after Iran told the IAEA that it broke the seals on a stock of maraging steel when it resumed enrichment work at Natanz, a key research facility, he said.

While the metal has limited applications in the P1 program centered at Natanz, "it is basically a necessity in the P2," said the U.S. official.

U.S. experts, he said, believe that Iranian officials may have resumed work at Natanz so they could use P1 machines to investigate and resolve technical hurdles in the suspected P2 program.

"It doesn't seem credible that they got P2 design information and it sat on a shelf," said Corey Hinderstein of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private research group that monitors the Iranian program.

Another unanswered question related to the P2 work "is the level of the involvement of military or military organs," she said.

OTHER KHAN RING DOCUMENTS: The IAEA has outstanding questions about the 1987 deal in which Iran admitted purchasing P1 blueprints and components and related documents from the Khan ring.

ElBaradei revealed in November that one document Iran provided contained specifications for casting and milling enriched uranium metal into hemispheres - which have no application in civilian power plants, but form the explosive core of nuclear warheads.

Iran said it didn't ask for the document and did nothing with it.

But an official close to the IAEA, who asked not to be identified further, said the issue is a serious one and agency investigators are interviewing former members of the Khan network to assess Iran's claim.

Another pressing question is whether Iran bought blueprints for a Chinese-designed nuclear warhead in 1987 from the Khan ring.

Documents provided to Iran by the Khan network were identical to papers that Khan sold to Libya, which received a Chinese nuclear warhead design.

"This is a fairly new concern that opens up a new avenue of investigation ... that Iran is blocking," said the U.S. official. "This to us is one of the key indicators of weapons intent by Iran."

WARHEAD RESEARCH: The IAEA opened an inquiry earlier this month into whether Iran has been secretly developing a nuclear warhead for its medium-range missiles.

The official close to the agency said that the Bush administration has turned over to the agency thousands of pages of computer simulations and studies that appeared to indicate that Iranian missile experts have been working on such a program.

The data came from a laptop computer obtained by U.S. intelligence officials in 2004 reportedly from a source in Iran, the official said.

Iranian officials deny that such materials exist.

THE BULLDOZED PLANT: The IAEA also is still investigating activities that took place at the Lavizan-Shian site.

Iran told the agency that research there involved the treatment of casualties of a nuclear attack and that the Tehran municipal government razed the facility after it prevailed over the military in an ownership dispute.

Environmental samples taken by IAEA inspectors when they were finally allowed into the site last summer found no traces of radioactivity.

Iran has been refusing to allow agency experts to interview senior officers who ran the center or to inspect equipment removed from it that had both civilian purposes and applications for centrifuge development.

"The IAEA has hard evidence of dual-use equipment ordered for Lavizan that almost certainly was used in a centrifuge research and development program," said the U.S. official.

US Moves To Delink Indian Nuclear Deal With Iran Vote (AFP)

AFP, January 26, 2006

Washington moved to unlink a landmark US-India civilian nuclear deal with how New Delhi votes on the Iranian nuclear question at a key meeting of the UN atomic watchdog agency.

DOJ_NMG_0012276

"Well, we deal with the Indian Government on these two issues as separate issues," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters on Wednesday. "Certainly, they come up in the same conversations, I'll tell you that," he said.

US Ambassador to India David Mulford had warned Wednesday that a historic deal giving American nuclear technology to India might fall through if New Delhi did not vote against Iran at the February 2-3 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

The West wants to refer Iran to the UN Security Council amid concerns over its nuclear program heightened earlier this month when Tehran announced it was suspending a voluntary moratorium and resuming sensitive nuclear research work.

Western countries suspect Iran wants to build nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear power program, a charge Tehran denies.

Mulford had said that a prospective deal for the United States to transfer civilian nuclear technology to India would "die" in the US Congress if India voted against a resolution on Iran.

If India decides not to back the resolution, "the effect on members of the US Congress with regard to (India-US) civil nuclear initiative will be devastating," Mulford told the Press Trust of India (PTI) news agency.

India, which carried out a string of nuclear tests in 1998 and declared itself to be a nuclear-armed state, bristled at Mulford's comments, saying New Delhi would be guided by its own national interest.

McCormack said Washington encouraged the Indian Government to vote for Iran's referral to the UN Security Council but "ultimately, that is going to be their decision."

But he recalled that last September, India voted along with the United States when Iran came up before the global atomic agency, a part of the United Nations.

Under the Indo-US nuclear deal, signed by US President George W. Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh last July, India would get advanced nuclear technology which it has been denied for 30 years for conducting nuclear tests and refusing to sign on to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

For the deal to be approved, the United States wants India to separate its civilian and military nuclear programs under a plan that would place its civilian nuclear reactors under IAEA inspection.

Mulford said Washington felt the ideas put forth by India on nuclear programme separation had not met the "test of credibility".

US Says India Nuclear Deal May Depend On Iran Vote (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

NEW DELHI (Reuters) - The United States said on Wednesday a nuclear cooperation deal with India may stall unless New Delhi votes against Iran next month at the U.N. nuclear energy watchdog.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) meets on February 2 to discuss whether to refer Iran to the U.N. Security Council over a nuclear program the West says is aimed at developing weapons, which Tehran denies.

The U.S. ambassador to India, David Mulford, told the Press Trust of India news agency that if India decided not to vote against Iran, "the effect on members of the U.S. Congress with regard to the civil nuclear initiative will be devastating."

The agency quoted Mulford as saying the deal would "die," but the government said it would vote based on its "own independent judgment."

U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday the IAEA was unlikely to decide at that meeting what to do about Iran.

U.S. President George Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed in July an accord on civil nuclear energy that would reverse a nearly 30-year-old ban on atomic cooperation with New Delhi, which has tested nuclear arms.

The deal has yet to be fully worked out, especially the key requirement of a separation plan for India's civil and military nuclear facilities, and must then pass a final test in the U.S. Congress and be agreed by the 44-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group.

India surprised its historic ally Iran in September by siding with the West when the IAEA declared Iran had failed to comply with its international obligations.

Its role at next week's IAEA meeting is being keenly watched.

"The position India will take on this issue at the IAEA will be based on India's own independent judgment," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

"We categorically reject any attempt to link this to the proposed India-U.S. agreement on civil nuclear energy cooperation."

The first sign of trouble with the deal came last week when after talks with Indian officials U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said there were "difficulties" in finalizing it but that he remained hopeful.

The two sides were hoping to finish the pact before Bush visits the subcontinent in March.

DOJ_NMG_0012277

U.S. Envoy Says India Nuke Deal Could Die (AP)

By Matthew Rosenberg

AP, January 26, 2006

The U.S. ambassador to India said Wednesday that a nuclear deal between India and the United States could "die" if New Delhi supports Iran during a U.N. atomic watchdog agency meeting. The State Department said the envoy was speaking for himself.

A week before the International Atomic Energy Agency meets to discuss Iran's nuclear program, Ambassador David Mulford said that if India does not vote to refer Tehran to the U.N. Security Council, it would be "devastating" to the deal currently before the U.S. Congress.

"I think the Congress will simply stop considering the matter," Mulford told the Press Trust of India news agency.

The deal, seen as a cornerstone of the emerging alliance between India and the United States, "will die in the Congress," he said.

The U.S. Embassy confirmed that Mulford was accurately quoted. The State Department in Washington said later that Mulford wasn't speaking for the U.S. government.

"The Ambassador was expressing his personal opinions about what the potential political outcome might be. He was giving his personal assessment of how the Congress might react to such an action by India," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Mulford's frank comments were the first time a senior U.S. official has made a direct link between India's stance on the Iran issue and the nuclear deal.

After Mulford's comments, India reiterated that the two issues should remain separate.

"We categorically reject any attempt to link (Iran) to the proposed Indo-U.S. agreement on civil nuclear energy cooperation, which stands on its own merits," Indian Foreign Ministry spokesman Navtej Sarna said in a statement.

"The position that India will take on this issue at the IAEA will be based on India's own independent judgment."

Under the deal, Washington is to share civilian nuclear technology and supply nuclear fuel to India in return for New Delhi separating its civilian and military nuclear programs and allowing international inspections of its atomic facilities.

The separation is necessary because the United States has only agreed to recognize India as having a civilian nuclear program — not as a legitimate nuclear weapons state.

The deal was signed in July when Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh visited Washington, and marked a major policy shift for the United States, which imposed sanctions on India in 1998 after it conducted nuclear tests. The restrictions have been lifted.

IAEA referral of Iran to the Security Council could lead to economic and political sanctions against Tehran, which the United States and European powers fear could use its nuclear program to develop weapons. Tehran insists its program is for generating electricity.

European countries believe they have enough votes at the IAEA, which will hold an emergency board session on Feb. 2, to haul Iran before the Security Council. But they are seeking support from Russia, China and key developing nations, such as India.

New Delhi voted in September with the U.S. and European powers on an earlier IAEA resolution that could have led to Iran's referral to the council.

But the Indian government faced fierce domestic criticism over the move from its left-wing political allies, who accused it of selling out a longtime ally to curry favor with Washington. New Delhi has, in recent weeks, appeared hesitant to repeat the vote, instead urging negotiations with Tehran.

India, which has few domestic sources of fuel, also plans to build a 1,750-mile gas pipeline from Iran through Pakistan, a project that has raised concerns in Washington.

"We have made it known to (India) that we would very much like India's support because India has arrived on the world stage and is a very important player in the world," Mulford said.

Iran, Russia Closer To Uranium Deal (REU)

By Parisa Hafezi

Reuters, January 26, 2006

TEHRAN (Reuters) - Iran again threatened on Wednesday to start full-scale uranium enrichment if reported to the U.N. Security Council, while signalling interest in a Russian proposal aimed at calming its nuclear row with the West.

DOJ_NMG_0012278

The council's five veto-wielding permanent members plus Germany plan to meet in London on Monday to try to resolve differences over whether to send Iran to the council at a crisis meeting of the U.N. nuclear watchdog on February 2, diplomats said.

They said foreign ministers of Britain, China, France, Russia, the United States and Germany would seek a consensus before the 35-nation board of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) gathers in Vienna to weigh what to do about Iran.

The United States and its European Union allies say it is time for the IAEA to turn Iran's nuclear dossier over to the Security Council. China and Russia have urged caution.

U.S. ambassador to India, David Mulford, suggested to the Press Trust of India news agency that a nuclear cooperation deal with India could collapse unless New Delhi voted against Iran next month at the IAEA. So far India has been non-committal.

But U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said how India voted was solely a decision for the Indian government.

"We deal with the Indian government on these two issues as separate issues," he said of the Iran vote and the U.S.-Indian nuclear agreement sealed last July.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said he doubted any decision on referral could be reached at the February 2 meeting.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said his country would immediately halt voluntary dealings with the IAEA, which include snap checks on its atomic sites, if sent to the council.

Iran, going beyond its Non-Proliferation Treaty obligations, allows impromptu inspections by the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Mottaki urged the Britain, France and Germany to renew talks they halted this month when Iran removed U.N. seals on uranium enrichment equipment and resumed nuclear fuel research.

RUSSIAN PROPOSAL

Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said after talks in Moscow he was positive about the idea of setting up a joint venture with Russia to purify uranium on Russian soil.

He said the plan could be "perfected" at talks in Moscow set for February 16 -- two weeks after the IAEA board meeting.

The proposal aims to prevent Iran gaining technology that could be used for military purposes. Iran says it does not want atomic bombs, but has the right to enrich uranium at home.

Foreign Secretary Jack Straw reiterated that the Russian proposal was welcome if it enabled Iran to receive nuclear fuel that was processed safely outside its borders.

"That may provide a solution," he told a news conference in Cyprus. "But what the world is also looking for is for Iran to stop the beginnings of running its centrifuges. That's essential if it is to avoid reference to the Security Council."

Annan said it was encouraging to hear the Iranians say they were considering the Russian offer seriously. "It is a solution that the international community is ready to accept," he told Reuters on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum in Davos.

He said he was not sure any decision on referring Iran to the council could be taken before the IAEA board gets a report that the agency's chief Mohamed ElBaradei aims to deliver at the end of February for a regular board meeting in March.

ElBaradei has already rejected Western pressure to provide a full report for the emergency meeting.

IAEA safeguards investigators led by deputy agency director general Olli Heinonen flew to Tehran on Tuesday to try to get Iran to reveal more about its past nuclear activities.

Larijani, who begins a visit to China on Thursday, warned that referral would prompt Iran to begin large-scale enrichment.

Mottaki said there was no way Iran would suspend its atomic fuel research programme, a step the EU trio has made a condition for any renewal of talks that began in 2003.

Russia and China are reluctant to see Iran hauled before the council, which has the power to impose sanctions, and do not back a draft EU resolution asking the IAEA for referral.

An EU diplomat said Moscow wanted the IAEA only to "inform" the council about Iran. He said China had told the EU it had its own proposal, but had not submitted it in writing.

(Additional reporting by Mark Heinrich in Vienna, Oliver Bullough in Moscow and Madeline Chambers in London)

Annan Doubts West Can Make Iran Decision In Feb (REU)

By Evelyn Leopold

Reuters, January 26, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan 25 (Reuters) - U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday he doubted that a U.N. nuclear watchdog would be able to come to a decision by early February on referring Iran to the Security Council over its nuclear programme.

Annan told Reuters that Mohamed ElBaradei, the director-general of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, did not expect to have a report on Iran ready until the end of February, for the IAEA's regular board meeting in March.

"I am not sure that they will be ready to refer (Iran) to the Security Council if the official report of the board has not been released and deliberated upon by the board and a decision taken," Annan said on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum.

The IAEA is scheduled to discuss the crisis on Feb. 2.

The United States and its European Union allies say it is time for the IAEA to turn Iran's nuclear dossier over to the Security Council. Russia and China are urging caution.

The United States, Britain, France, Russia and China, the five veto-wielding powers of the 15-member Security Council, plus Germany plan to meet in London on Monday to try to resolve differences over whether to send Iran to the council. Both Russia and China to date have opposed a formal referral.

Annan said he was encouraged by comments from Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani, who said after talks in Moscow, he was positive about the idea of setting up a joint venture with Russia to purify uranium on Russian soil.

Larijani said the plan could be "perfected" during talks in Moscow scheduled for Feb. 16 -- two weeks after the IAEA board meeting.

Annan previously appealed to Iran to scrap its decision to stop nuclear research and return to negotiations with France, Britain and Germany. He has said a Security Council referral, which could lead to sanctions, should be a last resort.

On Wednesday, he said: "As you know, I have appealed to the Iranians not to escalate, maintain the situation as it is today in order to create the right environment and confidence that negotiations are serious and lead to concrete results that would be mutually acceptable.

"It is also encouraging to hear the Iranians say they are considering the Russian offer very seriously. It is a solution that the international community is ready to accept."

Iranians Accuse British Military Of Aiding Bombers (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

TEHRAN, Jan. 25 -- Iran accused the British military on Wednesday of cooperating with bombers who killed eight people in southwest Iran, an allegation Britain described as ludicrous.

A little-known group campaigning for independence for Iran's Arab minority asserted responsibility in a Web statement for Tuesday's attacks on a bank and government building in the oil city of Ahvaz.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said that London's involvement was clear and that Tehran would make strong protests. He said the attackers "enjoy the cooperation of British army commanders and use their facilities in Basra," the oil city in southern Iraq.

A spokesman in British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office said Iran's allegation "deserves to be treated with scorn by the whole international community."

U.N. Council Backs Monitors In Lebanon (REU)

By Reuters

Reuters, January 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 25 — (Reuters) — The members of the United Nations Security Council have agreed that United Nations peacekeepers should keep monitoring the Israeli-Lebanese border for six more months, the current Council president said on Wednesday.

Lebanon had asked for a renewal of the mandate of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission for the border area for a year, until Jan. 31, 2007.

But the 15 Security Council members instead reached a consensus on an extension until July 31, said Augustine Mahiga, the United Nations ambassador from Tanzania, which holds the Council presidency for January.

The mandate of the 2,000-member United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon will expire on Jan. 31 unless renewed by the Council. A vote on a resolution prolonging the mission is expected on Monday or Tuesday, Council diplomats said.

While the mission has been in place since March 1978, a draft resolution circulated by France on Wednesday would emphasize "the interim nature" of the mission and emphasize that the Council was "looking forward to the early fulfillment of its mandate."

The draft would also urge Israel and Lebanon to put an end to violations of their shared border and would renew appeals to Lebanon's government to extend its authority across the south, to prevent attacks on Israel from its side of the border.

The Security Council and the United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, have regularly pressed the Lebanese government to assert control over the south since Israel pulled out of the region in May 2000, ending 22 years of occupation.

DOJ_NMG_0012280

The militant group Hezbollah dominates the southern part of the country, profiting from a power vacuum there. Hezbollah guerrillas have sporadically clashed with Israeli forces.

The Council and Mr. Annan have been urging the Lebanese government to disarm Hezbollah, in line with a September 2004 Council resolution demanding that all foreign militias on Lebanese soil be disbanded.

But Hezbollah has refused to disarm, and last year it joined the Lebanese government after its candidates did well in June parliamentary elections.

White House Slams Mexico For Aid Maps (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev And Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday accused the Mexican government of facilitating illegal entry into the United States after Mexican officials said they would distribute maps of dangerous border areas and posters with safety instructions and other tips.

Mexico's National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) said the maps, which would provide details of the terrain, cell-phone coverage and water stations set up by the U.S. charity Humane Borders, would help to save lives.

"We oppose in the strongest terms the publication of maps to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. "It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort.

"This effort will entice more people to cross, leading to more migrant deaths and the further enrichment of the criminal human trafficking rings that prey on the suffering of others," he said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States would "take whatever steps it deems necessary to protect its own borders."

"No government, including the government of Mexico, should facilitate or encourage its citizens to try to enter the United States outside established legal procedures," he said.

Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the NHRC is an independent body and receives no government funds. He said the commission is working with Humane Borders in distributing the maps.

Hundreds of Mexicans die every year while crossing the southern U.S. border illegally in search of a better life in the United States. They sometimes walk in temperatures that exceed 110 degrees.

The NHRC said it would distribute about 70,000 posters beginning in March, mostly in border towns and villages, as well as bars and restaurants frequented by emigrants.

The commission also said the posters show the estimated time it takes to walk or drive to nearby cities, note with red dots where migrants have died in the past and mark the location of water stations and emergency beacons set up by U.S. authorities.

"This is going to give people a false sense of security," said Shannon Stevens, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Border Patrol in Tucson, Ariz. "This is going to give them the idea that they are better educated so they can cross the border easier."

But Mexican officials disagreed, saying that illegal border crossing by thousands of people each year is a fact of life and that they are simply trying to prevent tragedies.

"Without a doubt, these maps will enable many lives to be saved," Mauricio Farah, an inspector with the NHRC said in Mexico City. "We are not trying in any way to encourage or promote migration. The only thing we are trying to do is warn them of the risks they face and where to get water, so they don't die."

Mexican officials also said that the posters would warn potential emigrants not to believe promises of an easy journey from smugglers. "Don't Do It," the posters say. "It's Hard. There's Not Enough Water."

At the same time, they advise migrants to travel with someone they trust and bring enough water and food, phone numbers of relatives, identification, and shoes adequate for a long and difficult journey.

Last year, the Mexican government issued a comic-style book as a guide to migrants on how to cross the border and avoid detection. It included "practical advice" on when and where to enter and what to wear and other instructions, including a tip to avoid sending children with strangers.

Illegal migration has become a thorny issue in the U.S.-Mexico relationship.

Mexican President Vicente Fox has called for a "status of regularization" for Mexicans illegally in the United States, which would allow them to remain as long as they were employed. He also has criticized recently approved legislation in the House authorizing the construction of 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border and the designation of illegal entry as a felony.

"What is not resolved by intelligent policies and by leaders is resolved by citizens. That is how the Berlin Wall fell and that is how this wall will fall," he told Reuters news agency Tuesday. "I hope it isn't even built because, if it is, it will fall."

Migrants working in the United States are a huge source of revenue for Mexico, sending home an estimated $16 billion a year -- Mexico's second largest source of foreign currency after oil exports.

DOJ_NMG_0012281

The Mexican government has vigorously lobbied U.S. lawmakers and civic leaders for a guest-worker status for millions of illegal aliens in the United States, working through a coalition of U.S.-based immigration rights groups.

Part of the Fox administration's effort to assist Mexican nationals in this country has included a move to adopt the consular or "matricula" identification cards issued to its citizens in the United States. The cards assist Mexican nationals in sending money home.

·This article is based in part on wire service reports.

Sheriff Demands Probe Of Incursions (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

A Texas border sheriff yesterday demanded that the U.S. and Mexican governments investigate incursions into the United States by heavily armed drug escorts dressed in Mexican military uniforms "before someone gets killed."

Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., who heads the Texas Sheriff's Border Coalition, said a growing number of suspected incursions and violence aimed at the area's law-enforcement officers is making the border "a pretty dangerous place."

"We have tried everything we know to make the federal government aware of the problems at the border and how they have affected us," said Sheriff Gonzalez, who has fewer than two dozen deputies to patrol 1,000 square miles, including 60 miles of Texas-Mexico border.

"It appears our government is covering this thing up because it just doesn't want to admit there is a problem," he said. "Trade between the United States and Mexico may be more important to Washington than human lives."

His comments come in the wake of an incident Monday in which U.S. law-enforcement authorities in Hudspeth County, Texas, confronted several men in Mexican military uniforms who were accompanying drug smugglers. The "soldiers" were in a camouflaged Humvee with a mounted .50-caliber machine gun, said Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West.

Yesterday, Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, said she was "deeply concerned" about the possible incursions and asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to "fully investigate this matter and report to Congress the details and confirm whether or not Mexican military officials were involved.

"But make no mistake -- this is only a symptom of a much larger problem," she said. "Even after September 11, our nation's borders remain porous. We must take bold action in securing our borders."

The Mexican government has denied that the men in any of the incidents were soldiers, saying that some drug smugglers dress in military-style uniforms, carry automatic weapons and drive military-style vehicles.

Sheriff Gonzalez said he could not confirm that the men were soldiers, but said he was skeptical of the denials by the Mexican government. He described the suspected soldiers as "very military looking, clean cut and in good physical condition -- not your average drug smuggler."

"When you spot a Humvee with military paint on it and a .50 caliber machine gun, this leads you to suspect that it's not a vehicle being used by drug lords," Sheriff Gonzalez said.

In Monday's incident, Hudspeth sheriff's deputies pursued three SUVs back to Mexico after spotting them driving north from the Rio Grande. Sheriff West said the pursuit ended on the U.S. side of the border when the deputies -- joined by Texas state troopers -- encountered at least 10 heavily armed men in what he described as battle dress uniforms.

Sheriff West said deputies found 1,400 pounds of marijuana in one of the vehicles abandoned after it blew a tire early in the pursuit. Another made it into Mexico and a third got stuck in the Rio Grande and was burned by the "soldiers" after it was unloaded, said Sheriff West, who is a Border Coalition member.

No shots were fired and no injuries were reported.

U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman Kristi M. Clemens said the Hudspeth County incident is under investigation and CBP is "coordinating closely" with the federal, state and local authorities. She said the government also has discussed the matter with Mexico and is asking for a thorough investigation and response.

California Republican Reps. David Dreier and Duncan Hunter have asked three House committees and the Department of Homeland Security to investigate suspected incursions by the Mexican military. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, also asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to "initiate an official investigation" and "open a dialogue with Mexico to prevent any future incursions."

In November, Sheriff Gonzalez said Hudspeth deputies chased a dump truck, which also fled and got stuck in the Rio Grande. He said men dressed in uniforms showed up and threatened the deputies with machine guns. He said the men then bulldozed the truck back into Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0012282

On the border in Zapata County in September, he said, three of his deputies spotted 25 men dressed in military uniforms in the U.S. during a late-night patrol. He said that the men marched two abreast and carried duffel bags and automatic weapons, and that his outmanned and outgunned deputies retreated.

"The only thing you can do in that kind of situation is seek cover," Sheriff Gonzalez said. "I'm not going to lose someone in an unfair fight."

Reports Cite Incursions On U.S. Border (LAT)

By Richard Marosi, Robert J. Lopez And Rich Connell, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

Armed Mexican government personnel made unauthorized incursions into the United States five times in the last three months of 2005, including one incident last month in Southern California, according to confidential Department of Homeland Security records.

The crossings involved police officers or soldiers in military vehicles and were among 231 such incidents recorded by the U.S. Border Patrol in the last 10 years.

The records obtained by The Times provide new details on more than a dozen incursions into the U.S., including the five most recent ones.

Details of the incidents emerged as authorities on both sides of the border scrambled to investigate a dangerous confrontation Monday in Texas.

Heavily armed personnel in a military-style Humvee from Mexico helped drug smugglers fleeing police to escape back across the border, according to authorities. An internal Border Patrol summary of the incident said the Humvee was equipped with a .50-caliber machine gun.

It was the second such incident in three months in the same rural county southeast of El Paso.

"It's clear you're dealing with a large number of incursions by bona-fide Mexican military units, based on the tactics and the equipment being used," said T.J. Bonner, a Border Patrol veteran and president of the agents union.

Reports of incursions into the U.S. by gun-toting groups of men dressed in what appeared to be military or police uniforms along the Mexican frontier have become a powerful rallying point for advocates of illegal immigration crackdowns and tighter border security.

The incursions have also intensified a long-running debate over the merits of fencing the 2,000-mile Mexican border, now a patchwork of metal barriers, rusted and broken barbed wire and expanses of rugged terrain where the divide is difficult to identify. In Texas, the Rio Grande separates the two nations.

U.S. Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar said that incursions by Mexican government personnel were nothing new, and that U.S. agents on occasion have crossed accidentally into Mexico. He noted that incursions have declined by more than 50% since 2002. Still, with assault rates against agents at record highs, any incursion is taken "very seriously."

"These are not taken lightly at any level within the Border Patrol … and it is an ongoing concern," Aguilar said.

U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that this week's incident in Texas was "about as serious as it gets" and noted that dozens of reported incursions have occurred in his state.

The encounters seriously undermine efforts to stop the flow of drugs coming across the U.S. border and suggest possible cooperation among Mexican authorities and traffickers, he said.

"You do not want to get into a fight with guys carrying machine guns," said Kyl, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Terrorism, Technology and Homeland Security.

He has asked the State Department to investigate the incursions and said that he plans to hold a hearing on the issue in March. Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a leading anti-illegal immigration lawmaker, called this week for U.S. troops to be deployed along the border to counter armed incursions.

Mexican officials on Wednesday denied that their police and military have been involved in illicit crossings but said they are investigating Monday's incident.

In recent interviews, local and federal law enforcement officials in south Texas and the San Diego area said a long pattern of encounters with Mexican government units along the border have bolstered suspicions that their counterparts work with smugglers. In Laredo, Texas, authorities said they have repeatedly seen Mexican military units clearing people from brushy areas along the south banks of the Rio Grande shortly before loads of migrants and drugs are brought across.

Several of the incidents described in the Department of Homeland Security reports appeared to involve Mexican officials getting lost or pursuing suspects. For example, five Tijuana police officers pursued two men across the border in 2004. Some of the officers fired at the suspects while on U.S. soil, according to a Border Patrol report. The police returned to Mexico after arresting the men.

DOJ_NMG_0012283

Other encounters were more suspicious and add to concerns among many U.S. law enforcement officials that corruption in Mexico is eroding efforts to gain control of the border and combat trafficking in humans and drugs.

In October, Border Patrol agents in the El Cajon area east of San Diego reported seeing Humvees on the south side of the border fence. Minutes later, they saw two men in Mexican military uniforms carrying rifles in a creek bed north of the border, according to the records. When an agent approached, the two men ran south and drove off in the Humvees. Agents found footprints indicating three or four individuals had come north of the border and then returned.

Other incidents included Mexican helicopters flying north into U.S. airspace near El Paso for about 15 minutes, five Mexican officials armed with assault rifles entering the country near El Centro and returning without incident, and two Mexican police officers observed wandering along the U.S. side of the border near Yuma, Ariz.

Witnesses in El Paso reported in 2004 that a Mexican military-style helicopter landed just south of the border and armed men in federal police uniforms crossed into the U.S. and questioned them about vehicles before returning to Mexico, according to a Border Patrol report.

A spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, Rafael Laveaga, said Wednesday that he had not seen the report and declined to comment.

He said there have been accidental entries across the border in recent years by both U.S. and Mexican law enforcement personnel. As a result of those incidents, Mexican military units are prohibited from coming within a mile of the U.S. border unless they receive authorization from commanders to pursue criminals, Laveaga said.

Many U.S. law enforcement authorities paint a different picture.

"Every time traffickers come across, the military is close by," said Sheriff Arvin West of Hudspeth County, Texas, where Monday's standoff occurred. He said military crossings occur weekly in his county and are so common that "people don't even report it anymore."

Monday's incident is being investigated by U.S., Texas and Mexican authorities. But initial accounts appear to make it one of the clearest examples yet of either private militia or government troops aiding traffickers.

A confidential Border Patrol summary of the incident said it began when county sheriff's deputies and state troopers tried to stop three vehicles on an interstate highway southeast of El Paso. All three vehicles made a run for the border, the report said.

One vehicle, a black 2006 Cadillac Escalade loaded with nearly 1,500 pounds of marijuana in plastic-wrapped bales, was abandoned near the border, West said.

As deputies approached the river they saw a Mexican military Humvee on the U.S. side, West said. A second vehicle bogged down in ankle-deep water in the Rio Grande, while the other made it back to Mexico.

"The Humvee attempted to push and pull [the stuck vehicle] toward Mexico to no avail," the Border Patrol summary said.

At that point, West said, Mexican soldiers and civilians began unloading marijuana from the stranded vehicle. About 20 Mexican personnel in military uniforms, with insignias on their caps, took up positions on the south side of the river and pointed automatic rifles at about half a dozen sheriff's deputies and state troopers.

"They were daring my guys to make a move," West said.

As deputies took photos, the uniformed men burned the vehicle after it had been unloaded, then retreated into Mexico.

Laveaga, the Mexican embassy spokesman, said his country's military units in the area do not use Humvees or the types of weapons described by U.S. authorities. He noted that Mexican drug-smuggling rings have been known to use military uniforms and weapons.

Bonner, of the border agents union, questioned how anyone "can move around in a Humvee with a 50-cal on it unless they have the permission of the government."

West said the confrontation was similar to an incident in mid-November in the same area. In that incident, sheriff's deputies and Border Patrol agents who intercepted a disabled dump truck filled with several tons of marijuana were backed off by heavily armed, uniformed men described by West as military personnel.

A bulldozer appeared on the Mexican side, West said, and towed the truck back across the border.

Texas has launched its own investigation of this week's incident, said Rachael Novier, a spokeswoman for Gov. Rick Perry. Regardless of who was involved on the Mexican side, she said, "it was unacceptable."

Why Mexico Helps US Fight Terror (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

TUCSON, ARIZ. - A top priority of the United States government is to prevent a determined terrorist from crossing the US-Mexico border. It is also becoming a primary mission for Mexico - and the first place it's focusing on is the 375-mile, desolate stretch of land that abuts Arizona.

In addition to sharing intelligence and cooperating on investigations with its US counterparts in Arizona, Mexico last year set up three checkpoints along known human-smuggling routes on its side of the border and plans to add two more.

Between August, when the checkpoints became operational, and December, Mexican officials stopped 1,277 non-Mexicans (OTMs, for "other than Mexicans") from crossing into Arizona, according to a Mexican government report obtained by the Monitor. The report shows that most of the OTMs came from Central and South America, but seven are listed as Iraqis.

FBI officials decline to say if they know what became of the Iraqis detained in Mexico. The seven - believed to have been apprehended simultaneously at one checkpoint - could be members of a single family or unrelated individuals simply trying to find a better life in the US. But they also could have been trying to illegally cross the southern border for nefarious purposes.

That's where the additional checkpoints could prove crucial.

The Mexican government has "an immense interest in making sure terrorists don't cross from Mexico into the US," says Ben Peres of the FBI office in Tucson, the bureau's liaison here with Mexico on cross-border issues. "If something were to harm the US, it would harm them, too."

Government officials and terror experts have long fretted about the porous border between the US and Mexico. With the onset of the Iraq war in 2003, they worried that teams of Iraqis might cross the border to set off terror attacks inside the US, and they say they know that people tied to Al Qaeda have entered the US through Mexico using false identities. One they cite is Mahmoud Youssef Kourani, who paid to be smuggled across the US-Mexico border in 2001 and later was convicted and imprisoned for providing material support to Hizbullah, which is on the US list of terror groups.

Last March, US officials intercepted a letter purportedly written by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Al Qaeda leader in Iraq, who suggested to his acolytes that it would be easy to infiltrate the US through the southern border.

For its part, the US government is apprehending record numbers of illegal immigrants on the Arizona side of the border. In 2005, Border Patrol officials nabbed 577,418 illegals. Of those, 14,323 were non-Mexicans - up from 9,974 in 2004. Most OTMs came from Central and South America. But 407 came from elsewhere, some from nations designated as "countries of interest," meaning those that are known to harbor terrorists.

US Customs and Border Patrol officials say the number of OTMs from "countries of interest" is small. But they don't divulge these because of "national security and law-enforcement sensitivity issues," says Michael Gramley, Border Patrol spokesman in Yuma, Ariz.

"Borders inherently are dangerous places where the state has the least amount of control and supervision," says Adrian Pantoja, a political scientist at Arizona State University in Tempe. Measures that have been put into place to secure the border so far, he says, are largely symbolic.

"If the US wanted to seal the border with Mexico it could. Look at the demilitarized zone between South Korea and North Korea," Dr. Pantoja says. "The dilemma is really between political will and economic necessity. How do you protect the nation's security while ensuring its economic well-being?"

Still, cooperation between Mexico and the US is steadily improving on the issue of illegal entry of OTMs, FBI officials say. Although they cannot discuss the Iraqis' case specifically, the officials explain how the current system works.

OTMs detained on the Mexican side of the border are screened by Mexican officials for possible criminal or potential terror activities. If evidence of wrongdoing surfaces, Mexican intelligence officials, in turn, share that information with US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

ICE officials then pass that information to the Joint Terrorism Task Force, in a weekly meeting. In Tucson, the JTTF is made up of an FBI official, who leads the effort, and representatives from Border Patrol, ICE, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Arizona state police, and two county sheriff's departments.

"It would be our job to corroborate that information and act appropriately, or debunk it," says the FBI's director of the JTTF in Tucson.

FBI agents in Tucson describe a successful operation in which they have worked with their Mexican counterparts to stop a cross-border people-smuggling ring, one with potential terrorism risks. A joint sting operation led to the arrest last May of Iranian-born Zeayadali Malhamdary, a legal permanent resident of the US. Mr. Malhamdary is now in Arizona awaiting trial on charges of smuggling illegal immigrants into the US. Officials say he smuggled in about 60 Iranians via Mexico - and provided high-quality fraudulent documents for entry into the US. The FBI says it is tracking down the 60 Iranians.

States Weigh Immigration Controls Congress Moving Too Slow For Some (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Frustrated by slow action in Congress, state legislatures are debating whether to increase border enforcement at their own expense, fine employers who use undocumented workers and get local police involved in deporting them.

It's unclear how far the proposals would go because, like Congress, legislatures are divided on what to do about the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants who provide a low-wage workforce in the USA. Federal law may limit state power on actions such as penalizing employers, says Ann Morse, an analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Immigration policy is one of the hottest issues as 37 legislatures convene this month. Last year, states considered 300 immigration laws and approved 40. That number is expected to rise this year, Morse says.

The immigration proposals are part of a larger trend of states getting involved in traditionally federal issues ranging from pollution control to prescription drug prices. Congress is considering changes to immigration policies — a border fence, a guest worker program — but it's uncertain whether action will be taken this year.

Among the state proposals:

·Arizona is debating installing a radar system and video cameras along the state's 340-mile border with Mexico. The proposed $50 million system would alert law enforcement when crossings occur.

·About a dozen states are considering employer sanctions, Morse says. Kentucky's proposal, for example, would fine employers up to $5,000 for knowingly hiring undocumented workers.

·Border states and a few others are ready to spend their own money on immigration enforcement. State and local police would be asked to check the residency status of people arrested or given traffic tickets under some proposals.

Away from the Mexican border, Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty wants to create a team of 10 state agents to police undocumented immigrants, charging them with state crimes such as identity theft or turning them over to federal authorities. “The federal government hasn't been doing a good job, so states have to play a role,” says Pawlenty, a Republican.

Flavia Jimenez, a policy analyst at the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights group, says the legislative activity “reflects real concern about the failure of Congress to pass real immigration reform.” She says the job is best left to the federal government, and states will face a costly task if police get involved in determining people's immigration status.

'Keep America, America' (WSJ)

By Andrew S. Grove

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Recently the House of Representatives passed an immigration bill -- the Sensenbrenner-King bill -- by a vote of 233 to 189. It is now on its way to the Senate.

This bill scares me.

It's not likely to affect me directly. I'm no longer in day-to-day business, nor do I have regular contact with immigrants. But it scares me because it has the potential of turning neighbor against neighbor -- and of changing our country into a place of fear and mistrust.

Let me illustrate. The bill contains a provision punishing anyone who "assists, [or] encourages . . . a person who . . . lacks lawful authority to remain in the United States" to remain here. Punishment: three to 20 years in prison, the same punishment meted out to professional smugglers who profit from transporting illegal aliens across the border.

This could change the nature of our society in a way that I have seen firsthand. As a Jewish child hiding from the Nazis in Hungary, I saw how the persecution of non-Jewish Hungarians who hid their Jewish friends or neighbors cast a wide blanket of fear over everyone. This fear led to mistrust, and mistrust led to hostility, until neighbors turned upon neighbors in order to protect themselves. Is this what we want?

Consider the potential effect of this bill. Victims of the hurricane that devastated New Orleans more often than not did not have proof of their immigration status. Relief workers who helped them -- for example, by providing schooling to their children -- could have been charged under this bill with assisting undocumented aliens. Volunteers who save the lives of individuals who are left to die by smugglers -- by providing water or food, or by taking them to a hospital -- could face arrest and prosecution. An immigration worker who encourages a refugee from political persecution to seek asylum in the United States could be charged with a felony; so could a manager who forgets to check the papers of a job applicant.

Prosecution of these well-intentioned people will lead to a growing schism. We will be forced to become a nation of identity-checkers; anyone who looked "foreign" would likely have to endure a lifetime of proving their status even if they were native-born American citizens. People will be deterred from helping anyone suspected of foreign origin. The events of World War II, the civil wars in Africa, the strife in the Middle East, ethnic cleansing in the Balkans, the decades-long civil disturbances in Ireland and the recent riots in France, all provide wrenching examples of fractured societies.

This bill forces us to answer the question: What kind of country do we want? Our country has promoted tolerance and diversity through most of its history, providing an outstanding and attractive example to others. Coming to this country and enjoying its openness has taught me how wonderful it is.

DOJ_NMG_0012286

Church groups, relief organizations and legal scholars have spoken out against this bill. Business groups have not. Perhaps they consider this bill of little concern to them. I disagree. This is a time when we face increasing competition from well-educated and highly motivated workers from many corners of the world. The stability and diversity of our society are two key competitive differentiators we enjoy. We must hang on to them.

Let's keep America, America.

Mr. Grove, former chairman of the Intel Corporation, is a member of the board of overseers of the International Rescue Committee.

Mexican Candidate Tries To Emerge From Fox's Shadow (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 25 — Francisco Rendón twirled a blue and white party flag in his weathered hands on a recent evening in a square in Querétaro, more than 100 miles northwest of the capital, waiting patiently for the man his party had nominated for the unenviable job of trying to succeed President Vicente Fox and keep the National Action Party in power.

"Fox promised a lot, and we want to see those things completed," Mr. Rendón said, echoing a widespread feeling. "About Felipe Calderón we don't really know anything except that he's a politician."

Mr. Rendón is not alone. During a bitter primary fight last year, Mr. Calderón transformed himself from a little-known former energy commissioner into the best hope for the president's right-of-center party. He is running a strong second in most opinion polls to the leftist former mayor of Mexico City, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, and many political strategists say he has a chance to win the election on July 2.

But outside the capital's opinion-makers and party insiders, surveys show that one in five Mexican voters still do not know who Mr. Calderón is, and as the presidential campaign officially kicked off last week, he made his first tour to try to change that.

Mr. Calderón, 43, opened a sunny, optimistic campaign, presenting himself as a principled, honest and incorruptible man, the only candidate "with clean hands," a young candidate of the future.

He portrays his adversaries as old-fashioned politicians stuck in the past. He depicts Roberto Madrazo of the Institutional Revolutionary Party as a political boss from the old ruling party, the sort who used to buy votes with everything from cash to free roofing and then, once in office, enrich themselves and their friends.

Mr. López Obrador, candidate of the Party of the Democratic Revolution, he says, is a throwback to the ruinous economic policies of the 1970's, a closed economy with enormous public spending financed by foreign debt.

"In 2006 we have to have an election about the course of the country," Mr. Calderón said Saturday evening at a rally in Aguascalientes, in north central Mexico. "We have to choose between the past and the future."

But perhaps his biggest challenge is President Fox himself. The president remains popular for breaking more than 70 years of one-party rule in 2000 but is seen as having promised much more than he could ever deliver without a majority in Congress. Mr. Fox's image as a reformer has also been tarnished by allegations that his wife's sons have become rich businessmen through influence-peddling.

So every day on the campaign trail Mr. Calderón walks a fine line, praising Mr. Fox for creating economic stability and trying at the same time to distance himself from the many failures of a president who is seen as an ineffectual leader.

"Fox has been a transition president," he said in an interview, speaking slowly and choosing his words with care. "He has the indubitable merit of having been the leader of the transition and the peaceful change of power in Mexico."

But in the same breath Mr. Calderón said he did not plan to suffer from the same congressional deadlock that stymied most of Mr. Fox's reform proposals. "If you don't have a majority, you have to construct it," he said.

For the United States, a Calderón presidency would promise continuity. Like Mr. Fox and most other Mexican politicians, he has railed against a bill in Washington that would build a longer border fence and make illegal migration a felony. Also like Mr. Fox, he wants a guest worker program.

In another north central city, San Luis Potosí, he said: "I'm going to act as president not only with the government of the United States but with the legislators from both parties, Republicans and Democrats, to persuade them that Mexicans are not criminals and that it would be good for the economy of the United States to legally regularize migratory labor. The economy of America cannot advance, would not have been able to advance, at the same rate as it has without Mexican labor."

With such statements Mr. Calderón has tried to tap a wellspring of national pride and feelings of inferiority in Mexico, pledging to make it competitive in everything from industry to sports and to shed its history of corruption and backwardness.

Again and again he says he wants to make Mexico "a winning country," one that "not only competes with the world but beats it."

DOJ_NMG_0012287

"My whole life I have dreamed of this country," he told a crowd in Querétaro. "I don't accept that our country will be condemned forever to be behind in development."

To get there he favors a flat tax on businesses and personal income to encourage foreign investment. He wants to continue the free-trade policies of Mr. Fox, arguing that the only way to create jobs and curb migration is to attract investment. He even favors a limited amount of private investment and competition with the state-owned energy companies, a proposal that has long been politically taboo in this country.

Mr. Calderón has also zeroed in on the main preoccupation of middle-class and upper-class Mexicans: organized crime and kidnappings. Calling the current law enforcement agencies "a cancer," he has proposed setting up a single federal police force to replace the myriad, sometimes corrupt, forces that now exist. He also wants to give the local police the power to investigate crimes, something they now lack.

"It's clear to me the potential Mexico has lost because it is not completely law-abiding," he said in an interview. "The potential of Mexico is enormous if we can manage to be a country of judicial certainty. I want to be a president who complies with the law and makes everyone comply with the law."

A short man with a paunch and gray, receding hair, Mr. Calderón lacks the stage presence of President Fox, a barrel-chested man with a baritone voice. When Mr. Calderón arrived at a campaign event for truckers driving a tractor-trailer on Friday in San Juan del Río, not far from Querétaro, the effect was almost comical. He was barely visible behind the wheel.

He is also one of those speakers who seem to confuse shouting with passion, giving speeches that have all the dynamics of a Nascar race, starting loud and getting louder. In private, though, he is serious and analytical, a soft-spoken intellectual who often sounds like the Harvard-trained economist that he is.

The son of one of his party's founders from Morelia, capital of the west central state of Michoacán, Mr. Calderón received advanced degrees in law and economics and spent only a short time in the private sector before running for office at 26 and gaining a seat in Mexico City's assembly. He went on to a seat in Congress in the early 1990's, but lost a race for governor in his home state in 1995.

After that he became national president of his party and engineered gubernatorial victories in three states, as well as victories in more than a dozen mayoral races. In 2000 he supported Mr. Fox but was not close to him. Then the president reached out for him in 2003 to head an agency that builds toll roads and later made him energy secretary.

Mr. Fox asked him to step down in May 2004 when Mr. Calderón made it plain that he would run for president.

Now it remains to be seen whether he can generate the passion for his campaign that he says he feels for Mexico. First he must somehow erase the disappointment and apathy that many in his party feel after Mr. Fox's tenure. And he acknowledges that he needs to pull votes from the two other major parties and from independent voters to put together enough of the popular vote to win.

Asked why he is running, his answer is simple: "I don't want Mexico to go backward."

OPEC Is Expected To Maintain Output Levels (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is widely expected to refrain from trimming output levels when its oil ministers meet in Vienna next week, but Iran remains a wild card.

With the price of oil nearing records recently, an OPEC decision to continue pumping oil at close to capacity should reassure markets of plentiful supply, something Saudi Arabia appears to favor and the U.S. seems to be counting on. In short, there is no economic incentive for OPEC to trim output when market forces have sent billions of extra dollars pouring into the coffers of oil-rich countries anyway.

ENERGY DIARY

See a graphic1 on the rising cost of shipping oil. Plus, world production and consumption data.

Still, Iran -- an OPEC founding member and the No. 4 oil producer in the world -- is feuding with the West over its nuclear ambitions, and it could use the OPEC meeting to send a warning to Western Europe and the U.S., both big oil importers.

"Iran is going to make a political point" at the meeting, predicts Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy, a Washington consulting company. The nuclear dispute has helped push up oil prices recently, and no early resolution is seen, at least for now. "This Iran thing has legs," he said.

Iran appears poised to propose a reduction in OPEC quotas, with Iranian officials citing a buildup of excess supply ahead of a seasonal dip in demand in spring. Venezuela has said it would back such a cut. Still, these two countries are unlikely to carry the day at OPEC, if Saudi Arabia and its allies in the cartel hold firm against reducing the group's quotas totaling 28 million barrels a day for 10 members, excluding Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0012288

Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali Naimi, the de facto leader of OPEC, and Nigerian Oil Minister Edmund Daukoru, who is OPEC's president, already have said they see no reason to cut production at next week's meeting. Oil prices are on the "high side," Mr. Naimi told an Indian TV network this week. He added: "Unless the market changes significantly between now and the meeting, there is probably no real reason to do anything different."

Yesterday, the benchmark light, sweet crude-oil futures for March delivery fell $1.21, to settle at $65.85 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Based on that price, this year the U.S. benchmark price is up $4.81 from the settlement price of $61.04 recorded Dec. 30, the last trading day of 2005.

Many in the industry, including the U.S. Energy Department, see prices rising this year. Some see them skyrocketing.

"We'll see a price well above $100 a barrel before the end of the year," predicts Philip Verleger Jr., an oil analyst and senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics in Washington. Mr. Verleger cites international uncertainties, strong world economic growth, lack of interest by central banks in the price of oil and changes in oil-product specifications. He also cited investor interest. "Oil is a tremendous investment and $3 billion have already gone into the [U.S. benchmark] contract" on the Nymex this year, Mr. Verleger said.

Many other analysts are far less bullish on oil prices. But, by all accounts, demand for oil continues to rise as the world economy flourishes. The International Energy Agency in Paris expects world oil demand to increase by 1.8 million barrels a day this year to 85.1 million barrels a day.

U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says he has been in regular contact with oil producers. "By and large, they seem to be understanding that we have a situation where there needs to be more oil rather than less oil in the world," Mr. Bodman said this week.

The question is if Iran shares in that understanding. The OPEC meeting is scheduled to take place two days before the International Atomic Energy Agency meets, also in Vienna, to consider what to do to dissuade Iran from moving toward enriching uranium.

Iran has drawn a link between any move by the West to seek United Nations approval for sanctions and the price of oil. Iran produces nearly four million barrels of oil a day, exporting 2.5 million. The spare oil-pumping capacity of the rest of the world is currently estimated at less than two million barrels a day.

Sanctions against Iran aren't considered imminent, and Iran isn't seen as being close to halting oil exports. Still, the dispute could provoke Iran into using the OPEC meeting to grandstand ahead of the nuclear meeting. "They don't have many big venues to bluster," says Yasser Elguindi, a managing director at Medley Global Advisors.

Roh Opposes U.S. On Regime Change Plans For NorthWarns Of 'Difference Of Opinion' (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

SEOUL -- A day after the United States urged South Korea to take an active stance against what it contends are North Korea's illicit financial activities, Seoul refused to say whether it would take action and made clear it opposed any attempt at regime change in Pyongyang.

"When it comes to the North Korean regime, raising issues about it or pressuring it or sometimes wishing for its collapse, on that position of some Americans, we do not agree," South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said in a press conference yesterday.

"If the U.S. government tried to solve the situation through that process, there might be a rift or a difference of opinion between the two governments."

He added that whereas both governments had officially agreed to resolve the North Korean nuclear issue through dialogue, there was, however, no dispute.

Mr. Roh's comments came one day after the U.S. Embassy released a statement in which U.S. officials requested Seoul join action against what it says are illicit financial activities by the North Korean government.

Some here think the U.S. move is part of a strategy to squeeze Pyongyang by cutting off its funding sources.

By "some Americans," Mr. Roh appeared to be referring to hard-liners in the Bush administration who favor toppling North Korean strongman Kim Jong-il.

Mr. Roh refused to respond to the U.S. accusations on North Korea.

"A detailed review needs to take place ... fact-finding and consultation between the two governments is necessary," he said. "I don't think it is now time for the Korean president to express an opinion on this issue. It is quite risky for the [Korean] president to get into this directly and draw a conclusion."

Also yesterday, the South Korean Foreign Ministry released a statement in which it said that the U.S. Embassy's press release on Tuesday was "inappropriate," and did not accurately represent the results of talks between U.S. and Korean officials.

DOJ_NMG_0012289

In its release, the U.S. Embassy said it had "urged" South Korea to take action against the North Korean transactions. The ministry denied being asked to take any concrete steps.

Analysts think that the reason for a U.S. Treasury team's 10-day Asian tour was to present Asian capitals with evidence of North Korea's financial crimes, pressuring them to act.

But given that there has been evidence of Pyongyang's activities for years, the chances of Beijing or Seoul exerting pressure at the insistence of a frustrated Washington appears minimal at present.

"South Koreans feel that quiet diplomacy is the way to go with North Korea," said Michael Breen, the Seoul-based author of a biography of Mr. Kim. "The Americans believe that if you are nice to the North Koreans, they will abuse you, but if you are tough, you might make progress. It's a classic carrot-and-stick dispute."

There have been cracks in the Seoul-Washington "blood-forged alliance" since President Bush was inaugurated in 2000: His administration's North Korean policies have contravened the engagement policies promoted by South Korean President Kim Dae-jung from 1997-2002, and by Mr. Roh currently.

U.S., South Korea Near Free-Trade Talks (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The United States and South Korea are very close to launching negotiations for a free-trade agreement, which would be the most economically significant free-trade pact for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement, according to people familiar with the matter.

Officials in Washington and Seoul have been discussing the idea of a trade accord for more than a year, fueled by a mutual desire to deepen an already extensive commercial relationship. Two-way trade was $72 billion in 2004, making South Korea the United States' seventh-largest trading partner. The United States is the second-largest market for Korean exports.

But both sides have been reluctant to start formal talks until they are reasonably confident that the negotiations would end in agreement. South Korea's farmers are bitterly opposed to opening their country's agricultural markets, and their political clout could scuttle a deal.

Most of the other countries the United States has free-trade pacts with have much smaller economies than South Korea and are thus much less important markets for U.S. products. They include Chile, Singapore, Jordan, Israel, Australia, Morocco, Bahrain, and the six countries in the Central America-Dominican Republic Free Trade Agreement, which squeaked through Congress in July. For example, combined U.S. exports to the six CAFTA-DR countries were $15 billion in 2004, whereas exports to South Korea reached $26 billion.

Only the NAFTA countries -- Canada and Mexico -- surpass South Korea among current and likely free-trade partners as a market for U.S. exports. Canada bought $190 billion in U.S. products in 2004, and Mexico bought $110 billion.

Free-trade agreements have proliferated in recent years and involve a variety of provisions. The United States has generally insisted on eliminating or phasing out all tariffs and other impediments to bilateral trade, including agriculture, though it has sometimes allowed exceptions or long phase-out periods for a handful of products. Korea would certainly insist on maintaining some protections for its rice market, said Jeffrey J. Schott, a scholar at the Institute for International Economics who has written a book about the benefits of a U.S.-Korea deal.

A 2001 study by the U.S. International Trade Commission estimated that a U.S.-Korea free-trade agreement could increase U.S. exports to Korea by $19 billion and U.S. imports from Korea by $10 billion. As large as those numbers are, they would not have an appreciable impact on U.S. gross domestic product, which is in the $11 trillion range.

Although plans to launch the U.S.-Korea talks could still founder, officials and other sources who have spoken recently with negotiators said an announcement is likely to materialize before long. Asked about the prospects, one administration official replied, "How do you say 'soon' in Korean?" The source spoke on condition of anonymity because the final decision has not yet been made.

Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, heightened the speculation Friday when he told reporters, "We'll be announcing some additional [free-trade agreement] partners soon. As I think you will notice, they will not be with small economies because I do think we need to move on to some larger economies."

Yesterday, Neena Moorjani, a spokeswoman for Portman, said it was "premature" to say whether the formal talks with Korea would be launched.

Moscow-Kiev Gas Spat Heats Up As Supplies, Temperatures Drop (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012290

Bickering over natural-gas shipments intensified between Moscow and Kiev as reduced supplies of Russian gas to Europe led to shortages in several countries and fueled energy-security anxieties across a continent gripped by an arctic cold snap.

Russia, which provides a quarter of Europe's gas, blamed Ukraine for taking too much of the fuel from pipelines carrying Moscow's exports to Europe. Kiev insisted it was entitled to the extra volume amid the winter freeze, though officials pledged drastic measures to rein in record gas consumption.

Alexei Miller, chief executive of Russian gas monopoly OAO Gazprom, said Ukraine's consumption has been rising in the past few days, swamping Gazprom's efforts to increase supplies to its frost-stricken European customers. "We boosted supply again today," he said.

Few analysts expect a repeat of Russia's New Year's gas cutoff to Ukraine, which led to sharp drops in supplies to European customers and triggered harsh criticism of Moscow for using energy as a political weapon. But as details of the Jan. 4 deal have emerged, doubts have grown about whether it sets the stable foundation for supplies and exports to Europe that its backers claim.

"It's not at all a compromise. It's more of a time bomb that could lead to future conflicts," said Vladimir Milov, president of the Institute for Energy Policy in Moscow and a former deputy energy minister.

Facing steady shortfalls in supplies, Italian officials called on the public to lower thermostats and take other steps to reduce energy use. Italy's industry minister will meet today in Moscow with Russian officials to seek assurances that supply contracts would be observed. Romania, facing temperatures as low as 22 degrees below zero Fahrenheit, appealed to Russia to boost supplies as shortages developed and led to school and other closings.

"For most of the last 15 years, there really haven't been any concerns about security of supply," said Ben Hollins, a gas specialist at consultants Wood Mackenzie. "The reality is that Europe is dependent on Russia and will remain so."

The gas troubles have fueled debate about alternatives. "We want Europe to take common responsibility for energy security -- all for one and one for all. This is a brand new initiative: joint reaction to any individual country's problems, joint investments in energy security," Polish Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz announced in Warsaw.

Russia has sought to reassure its customers of its reliability, and Ukrainian officials have vowed to ensure that shipments to Europe are delivered. Still, the two sides yesterday failed to reach agreement on the details of implementing the Jan. 4 compromise, intended to halt what is known as the "gas war" in the region.

Officials said the agreements, which would finalize the terms for shipments to Ukraine as well as transit of Russian gas to Europe, will be signed in the next few days. Opposition politicians in Ukraine have attacked the deal, which calls for gas prices to jump to $95 a thousand cubic meters from about $50 last year. That price is for gas from Turkmenistan and other Central Asian producers.

"The gas conflict isn't over," said Vladimir Saprykin of the Ukrainian Center for Political and Economic Studies in Kiev.

A key element of the pact, the $95 price for Ukraine, is fixed only through the first half of this year, and analysts warn that the rate could rise sharply after that, dealing a brutal blow to Ukraine's fuel-guzzling economy.

Rosukrenergo AG, the Swiss-registered trading company at the heart of the Russian-Ukrainian deal, has drawn increased scrutiny. Half-owned by a unit of Gazprom, the identities of the owners of the rest, held by a unit of Austria's Raiffeisen Bank, remain secret.

"My clients say their names can't be released at this time for political reasons," said Wolfgang Putschek, the Raiffeisen official representing the unidentified shareholders. He said they have been instrumental in mediating compromises between Moscow, Kiev and the Central Asian suppliers.

In an interview, he said Rosukrenergo could earn as much as $1.3 billion in profit this year thanks to the agreement, which substantially increases the volumes it handles and opens the way for more sales of gas to high-paying customers in Europe. The group earned about $500 million last year supplying Turkmen gas to Ukraine through Russia. Details of its financials remain secret.

Yesterday, Ukrainian Prime Minister Yuri Yekhanurov rejected calls for his government to buy the 50% stake in Rosukrenergo not owned by Gazprom. Gazprom officials have defended Rosukrenergo's role in the Ukrainian trade as critical to reaching the compromise deal with Kiev. Antitrust regulators in Kiev are investigating its ownership structure.

Write to Gregory L. White at greg.white@wsj.com1 and David Crawford at david.crawford@wsj.com2

Putin Links Espionage To NGO Funding (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012291

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 -- In his first comments on the discovery of alleged British spies in Moscow, Russian President Vladimir Putin on Wednesday linked the scandal to foreign financing of nongovernmental organizations in Russia, a connection that grass-roots activists say is tangential and being used to smear their work.

"The situation is regrettable, as we have seen, when attempts are made to use secret services to work with nongovernmental organizations and when financing is carried out through secret services' channels," Putin told journalists in St. Petersburg. "No one can then say the money does not smell. Beneficial aims cannot be attained with unsuitable means."

The FSB, Russia's domestic security service, announced Monday that it had found British electronic equipment hidden in a fake rock in a Moscow park and that a Russian, allegedly recruited by the British, was using it to upload information and receive instructions. Four people said to be British diplomats were videotaped downloading data from the device.

One of the accused spies, Marc Doe, a second secretary in the British Embassy, has been involved in the British government's dispersal of grants to Russian human rights organizations. The British government has refused to comment on the espionage charges, but has denied it was doing anything illegal with nongovernmental organizations.

The Russian authorities have so far presented no evidence that the alleged spy ring recruited human rights activists. An unidentified Russian citizen has been arrested, but what kind of information the British may have been attempting to obtain or who the Russian is remain unknown.

Still, Doe's work with nongovernmental organizations has been seized on by many Russian politicians. The lower house of parliament, by a vote of 401 to 6, passed a resolution Wednesday condemning the involvement of foreign intelligence services with the private groups. "Such actions undermine trust in NGOs as a universally recognized institution of civil society," the resolution said.

The Moscow Bureau for Human Rights, a private group, said in a statement Wednesday that "the idea is being imposed on society that public organizations are involved with espionage activity. This injures their reputation and defames the name of NGOs in public opinion."

Privately, a number of activists expressed dismay that Doe, if he was indeed a spy, would have used his work with the groups as public cover, particularly given the current climate in which grass-roots organizations believe they are under attack from the state.

Putin this month signed into law a controversial bill regulating nongovernmental groups. Some of its authors argued that it was necessary to prevent foreign money from corrupting Russia's political process. On Wednesday, Putin again defended the law.

"It is aimed at preventing the intrusion of foreign states into Russia's interior political life and to create favorable and transparent conditions for the financing of nongovernmental organizations," he said.

Putin went on to say that he was still supportive of the work of the groups. "Society needs activity of this kind so that close control over the state's activity is put in place," he said.

Putin said it was up to the Russian Foreign Ministry, in conjunction with the FSB, to decide whether to expel the four diplomats. It is unclear if they're still in Moscow.

"My opinion is that if these intelligence agents are expelled, they will send new ones," Putin said. "These people may prove to be smart. In this case, we will have to go to a lot of trouble spotting them. Think about it."

Putin Says Foreigners Use Private Groups To Meddle In Russia (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

MOSCOW, Jan. 25 — President Vladimir V. Putin accused foreign intelligence operatives on Wednesday of using private groups to interfere in Russia's internal affairs, saying that accusations that four British diplomats were spies justified new government curbs on the groups.

Mr. Putin has previously criticized foreign support for groups involved in politics here, but on Wednesday he linked the groups to intelligence agencies more explicitly than before.

His remarks intensified a furor that erupted after the disclosure of what officials said was a British espionage operation that used a device concealed in a fake rock to exchange information with a Russian agent.

"We see that there are attempts to work with nongovernmental organizations with the help of special services and that there is financing of nongovernmental organizations through the channels of foreign secret services," Mr. Putin said in televised remarks from St. Petersburg, where he was meeting with leaders of other former Soviet republics.

"I think that nobody has the right, in the given situation, to claim that money has no smell," he added.

One of the accused British diplomats, identified as Marc Doe, oversaw British grants to private organizations, including some prominent groups that promote democracy and human rights. While intelligence officials acknowledged there was no direct connection between those grants and the espionage that has been alleged, the distinction has largely evaporated in the fury of Russian reaction to the spy scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0012292

Parliament's lower house adopted a statement Wednesday denouncing support for private groups by foreign spies. "Such actions undermine trust in noncommercial nongovernmental organizations," it read.

British officials have declined to discuss Russia's accusations, though the Foreign Office denied that any of its grants to Russian groups were improper. The groups Russia has linked to the affair — without specifying illegalities — include the Moscow Helsinki Group and the Center for Democracy and Human Rights. The scandal could worsen relations with Britain and other countries as Russia presses its assault on European and American financial support of groups that criticize the Kremlin.

This month Mr. Putin signed into law new controls over private groups, requiring them to reregister and prohibiting foreign financing of activities deemed political. Foreign leaders and Russian representatives of the groups called the curbs a bid to stifle political discourse.

Ulrich Fischer, the president of the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights called the accusations against its Moscow branch and other groups slanderous and "part of an official Russian policy to silence criticism and strengthen ever further a centralized state power."

Mr. Putin, in his remarks, said Russia was still considering whether to expel the four diplomats, all mid-ranking secretaries in the British Embassy, indicating for the first time that they had not yet been expelled or withdrawn, though the espionage that was alleged was reported to have been uncovered last fall.

Kyrgyzstan to Investigate Groups

By The New York Times

BISHKEK, Kyrgyzstan, Jan. 25 — Following the lead of Russia, Uzbekistan and Belarus, Kyrgyzstan on Wednesday ordered investigations into private groups that get foreign money, including from the United States, which has continued to support pro-democracy groups since the popular uprising here last year.

US Congressman Takes Google To Task On China (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, January 26, 2006

Google will be called to task in Washington next month following a controversial decision by the internet search engine to launch a China-based version of its website that will censor results to avoid angering the country's Communist government.

The decision by Chris Smith, a Republican congressman from New Jersey who chairs a House subcommittee on Human Rights, to call for a February 16 hearing to examine the operating procedures of US internet companies in China, represents the first signs of what could become a serious backlash against Google and other internet companies in Washington that are perceived as capitulating to the Chinese government.

Mr Smith on Wednesday accused Google of "collaborating .. with persecutors" who imprison and torture Chinese citizens "in the service of truth".

"It is astounding that Google, whose corporate philosophy is 'don't be evil' would enable evil by cooperating with China's censorship policies just to make a buck," he said.

The hearing will also include testimony from Yahoo, Microsoft, Cisco and senior State Department officials who advise on China.

Mr Smith on Wednesday in a statement drew comparisons between Google and Radio Free Europe and Asia, reflecting on the capacity the radio stations had on empowering the "voices of freedom throughout Communist countries".

News about the congressional hearing came just hours after another lawmaker, Democratic senator Patrick Leahy, spoke out on another issue that has enveloped Google in recent days: the company's refusal to comply with a subpeona by the Justice Department that would require it to hand over toe the government extensive records about the way people use the company's search engine.

In a letter to attorney general Alberto Gonzales, Mr Leahy demanded more information about four subpoenas to major internet companies, including how the DOJ intended to use the information while protecting privacy rights, and whether the DOJ planned to request further information from the companies.

Mr Leahy, the leading Democrat on the judiciary committee, said the collection of data on law-abiding Americans posed "unique concers".

U.S. Envoy Engages In Panda Diplomacy (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012293

CHENGDU, China, Jan. 25 -- Diplomacy is in large part symbolism, and the symbol was unmistakable. There was Robert B. Zoellick, the deputy secretary of state assigned to manage U.S. relations with China, hugging a baby panda.

Zoellick, who was formerly a member of the advisory council of the World Wildlife Fund, had a natural interest in visiting the Giant Panda Breeding Research Base here in Chengdu, capital of Sichuan province in central China. The appealing creatures, he pointed out during a two-hour tour Wednesday, have long been a symbol of joint U.S.-Chinese efforts to preserve the environment and protect wild animals.

But ever since President Richard M. Nixon opened contacts with the Communist government in 1972, pandas also have been a symbol of political cooperation between Beijing and Washington. The Chinese program of sending pandas as gifts, but more frequently on lease and loan, to zoos in Washington, Atlanta, San Diego and Memphis, has played a large role in de-icing diplomatic, commercial and public relations over the past 30 years.

In that context, Zoellick's pose with Jing Jing, a female cub born at the Chengdu facility in August, was seen at least in part as a signal to China about where he wants to steer U.S.-Chinese relations. The official New China News Agency received his message 10-4. It immediately transmitted a happy photo of Zoellick and Jing Jing around the country, illustrating the government's view that good U.S.-China relations are essential and, in fact, getting better and better.

Zoellick's gesture, in another reading, could also be seen as a signal of where he stands in the Washington debate about China. Interpreted that way, becoming a public panda-hugger was an eloquent endorsement of the view that engagement with Beijing is the best path for the United States and that China's emergence as an Asian power does not have to mean conflict in the Pacific.

"You want to know how the panda felt?" he asked. "Very soft."

Zoellick, in a meeting with reporters, joked that he had discussed the various readings of his panda poses with his staff before agreeing to take Jing Jing on his lap. Some aides had questioned whether the image was the right one to convey, he acknowledged, but he decided to go ahead because his wife wanted a photo of him with a panda. "At my age, I listen to my wife," he said.

Zoellick, who left Chengdu for a panel discussion on China at the annual economic forum in Davos, Switzerland, was named point man for U.S.-China policy by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at the start of the second Bush administration. In particular, he has become the main U.S. interlocutor in a strategic dialogue set up last year in response to Chinese requests for sustained discussions on long-term issues between Washington and Beijing.

This visit to China, which came in addition to that twice-yearly schedule, was partly to maintain contacts with Chinese leaders and show interest in keeping up a close relationship, Zoellick said. He met Tuesday with Premier Wen Jiabao, Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and his own counterpart in the Chinese Foreign Ministry, Dai Bingguo.

But the two-day stay here, after stops in Japan and at U.S. Pacific Command headquarters in Hawaii, also included specific talks on issues that could be seen as a test of the U.S.-Chinese engagement his panda photo was meant to symbolize. These, he said, included China's stand on the effort to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, China's role in diplomacy to persuade North Korea to eliminate its nuclear weapons program and China's currency policies at a time of soaring U.S. trade deficits.

Chinese officials made clear they shared the U.S. and European goal of demonstrating to Iran's rulers that they should not proceed with a program that could lead to nuclear weapons production, Zoellick said.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman, Kong Quan, said Tuesday, however, that China believed more time should be allowed for diplomacy before resorting to sanctions or other pressures from the U.N. Security Council.

Reporting on his talks, Zoellick said he emphasized to Chinese officials that their own oft-repeated goal of energy security argued for joining in the effort. A government such as Iran's armed with nuclear missiles would be a destabilizing force in the Middle East, China's main source of imported oil, even though China has signed a long-term oil and gas deal with Tehran, he said.

The argument, Zoellick explained, flowed from the idea of making China more of a "responsible stakeholder," a major state with worldwide interests to preserve through cooperation with other governments. The approach was laid out in a speech in September outlining the administration's underlying policy toward China.

Zoellick also received a report from Chinese officials on last week's tour by the North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il. In addition to meetings with President Hu Jintao, Wen and other senior Chinese Communist Party officials, Kim visited ports and factories in the booming Pearl River Delta, just north of Hong Kong and a showcase for China's economic reforms.

The question was whether what Kim saw would inspire him to enact similar changes in his own country, which some officials believe would open North Korea to the world and help with a long-term solution to the nuclear standoff. Zoellick suggested the response from Chinese officials who hosted Kim was: "We'll see."

DOJ_NMG_0012294

Too Fast In China? (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

SHANGHAI, Jan. 25 Led by surging exports, China's economy grew by 9.9 percent last year, the government announced Wednesday, underscoring the swiftness by which this once insular communist country has remade itself into a global trading power.

The rapid expansion appears to move China's economy ahead of those of Great Britain, France and Italy to become the world's fourth-largest, although many countries have yet to report their final 2005 economic data. Over the past decade, China's output has more than doubled in size as the country's transition toward capitalism has progressed, turning farmers into factory workers and linking the fortunes of its people to the appetites of shoppers in the United States, Europe and Japan.

Yet the news also increased concern that China could be growing too fast, despite measures aimed at cooling the hottest parts of the economy. Aggressive investment has produced too many factories, heightening trade tensions with the United States as China exports surplus wares such as steel, depressing prices globally. Chinese officials worry that unneeded plants could deliver a crippling era of deflation -- falling prices -- which hurts profits and reduces incentives for companies to invest. Such a syndrome kept Japan mired in recession and unemployment for much of the past 16 years.

"Overcapacity is dangerous," said China's leading statistician, Li DeShui, speaking at a media briefing in Beijing, according to a transcript on the Web site of the official New China News Agency. "It will cause huge waste, and will especially generate huge bad loans for banks. For some businesses, it will cause losses and even closures, which will lead to rising unemployment."

Li emphasized that China is not yet facing this problem, with inflation still at a healthy 1 percent. He pronounced himself "cautiously optimistic" about China's economic prospects this year.

State data paint a troubling picture. Steel capacity already outstrips domestic demand by 120 million tons a year, and new mills that would add an additional 70 million tons are under construction, according to the National Development and Reform Commission, a unit of China's governing State Council. Chinese automakers saw profit margins plummet last year as ultra-low-priced vehicles came on the market, and as dramatic expansion brought production capacity to 2 million more than China's annual sales.

Still, some say fears of overcapacity are overblown: Even as the supply of everything from aluminum to motorcycles swells, the underlying demand for the trappings of modern life within this land of 1.3 billion people should not be underestimated. China's appetite for new housing, roads and vehicles will eventually put the extra plants to work, some economists say.

"There's no question that there's demand," said Jonathan Anderson, chief economist for Asia at UBS Investment Research in Hong Kong. "Local governments want to build science parks and subways, and people want to build houses. And now [Chinese authorities] are actually letting stuff get built again."

Anderson argues that the growth of manufacturing capacity is slowing -- a sign that it will eventually disappear.

He cites the Chinese steel industry, which saw capacity grow by nearly 40 percent in 2004 and 2005. This year, he said, capacity will continue to grow, but by only 10 percent. At the same time, growth in demand for steel will bounce back to about 18 percent this year, after decelerating to about 7 percent last year as the government clamped down on development.

"You've got spending going on," Anderson said. "Overcapacity is actually going to be going away."

China's economic data is notoriously unreliable, and many say the data fail to capture the true magnitude of the economy. Last year, the government restated several years' worth of economic data when a nationwide census discovered that millions of mostly private service companies had previously been left out of the calculation. In one shot, the government declared that China's economy was 17 percent bigger than it had previously realized -- the statistical equivalent of finding an Austria lying around uncounted.

On Wednesday, speaking at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, Zhu Min, an executive at one of China's largest state banks, said the economy remains underestimated.

"There's another 15 percent to 20 percent space for China to grow," Zhu said, according to Bloomberg.

Whatever the real rate of growth, the ceaseless clatter of machinery that has become the national soundtrack and the construction cranes hovering over every urban skyline attest to the dramatic expansion, one that has refashioned China and its relationship with the rest of the world.

Last year's growth was propelled largely by exports, which leapt 28 percent, leaving China with a $102 billion global trade surplus. Manufacturing trade groups in the United States, Europe and developing countries argue that much of this success is a result of China's maintaining its currency, the yuan, at an artificially low value, making its goods unfairly cheap on world markets. Congress is considering a bill that would slap across-the-board punitive tariffs on Chinese goods if Beijing does not significantly raise the value of the yuan. China counters that it is being made the scapegoat for the loss of factory jobs elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0012295

China's growth has prompted Beijing to dispatch state oil firms around the globe in search of new energy supplies. This has stoked a historic rivalry with Japan for access to Russia's Siberian oil fields. It has sent Chinese investment into Africa, Latin America and Indonesia, and has provoked accusations in Washington that China's thirst for energy threatens U.S. interests. Chinese demand is a key factor behind the recent spike in world oil prices.

Within China, years of rapid growth have sown concern that new wealth is not being shared equally, with much being stolen from the poor via corrupt land acquisitions by Communist Party officials. Recent years have seen sometimes-violent protests around the country as farmers complain they are being pushed off land without just compensation. Last week, Premier Wen Jiabao pledged that more investment had to be directed into poor, rural areas to address the growing income gap.

Growth last year brought China's overall economic output to $2.26 trillion, according to state data. But its rapid growth still leaves China's economy at less than one-fifth the size of the world's largest -- that of the United States, whose output reached $11.7 trillion in 2004.

New Estimate In China Finds Fewer AIDS Cases (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 25 — China countered the long-held suspicion that it has undercounted the number of people with H.I.V. and AIDS by releasing a new, more extensive estimate on Wednesday that found the opposite: that the country had actually overestimated its number of cases.

The new estimate, conducted with the World Health Organization and the United Nations AIDS program, lowered the country's estimated number of H.I.V. and AIDS cases to 650,000 from the official figure of 840,000 released by the government in 2003. Many experts and AIDS workers have long believed that China has at least 1.5 million cases, possibly far more, and some expressed skepticism that the new figure was any more reliable than past estimates.

At a news conference on Wednesday morning, Chinese and international health officials endorsed the new findings but also warned that while the overall number of cases is less than previously believed, the rate of infection is still rising, with 70,000 new cases in 2005. Drug users and prostitutes are transmitting H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS, in most of the new cases, but the report also found that the disease is now spreading from such high-risk groups into the general population, raising the risk of broader infection.

"Almost 200 people are infected every day in China," said Wang Longde, a vice minister of health. "The situation is grave."

With AIDS and H.I.V. having already devastated large swaths of Africa, experts have feared that China and India, the world's two most populous countries, may become the next epicenters of major outbreaks.

The lower estimate in China, if accurate, would place it in a far more enviable position than India, which is estimated to have more than five million people living with H.I.V. The Indian government has been criticized for failing to respond swiftly and effectively to the disease.

China is still trying to regain its credibility on AIDS. Not too many years ago, top leaders denied that the country had an AIDS problem and tried to cover up an outbreak in central China caused by a tainted, government-sponsored blood selling program. Since late 2003, China has mounted an aggressive nationwide campaign against AIDS and introduced pilot programs that provide free condoms, free methadone and even free antiretroviral drugs.

The joint effort by China, the World Health Organization and the United Nations AIDS program, Unaids, in drafting the new study reflected the improved openness of Chinese health officials on AIDS. But that collaboration also underscores the fact that the outside world would most likely be skeptical of any study conducted solely by China. Some Chinese health officials had privately fretted that the study would be regarded as a whitewash.

Henk Bekedam, head of the W.H.O.'s office in Beijing, warned that China still faced a major AIDS problem and needed to raise public awareness about H.I.V. while expanding prevention and treatment programs. But he endorsed the new estimate "as a more accurate portrait of the epidemic" and described China's H.I.V. status as "low prevalence."

Ray Yip, the Beijing representative of the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, did not attend the news conference on Wednesday but said his office had provided technical assistance for the new study. He said the new figure represented a far broader sampling from across China. "It's a more robust and more complete number," Mr. Yip said in a telephone interview. "But by all means, it is an estimate."

Some AIDS experts in China expressed doubts about the lowered estimate. Chung To, chairman of the Chi Heng Foundation, which helps AIDS orphans in central China, questioned the reliability of the raw data used in the estimate. He noted that local officials often hid the true prevalence of the disease, while many H.I.V.-positive people lied about their condition to avoid social stigma.

DOJ_NMG_0012296

"To me it is hard to believe they are revising downward," he said. "It is certainly not what I see as a front-line, grass-roots AIDS worker."

Another advocate, Odilon Couzin, also was skeptical about how accurately officials were able to count infected people among groups like prostitutes, drug users and gay men, all of whom are loath to reveal their H.I.V. status in China.

"Frankly, in all of my experience, the quality of the data and the accuracy of the information here is not high enough to have confidence in this new estimate," said Mr. Couzin, who runs China AIDS Info, an AIDS information and advocacy group based in Hong Kong.

Officials involved in the study say improved methodology and a bigger sampling of data have made it more accurate than the earlier one. The 2003 study estimated 840,000 cases, based on samples drawn from 194 "surveillance" sites around the country. By comparison, the new study used 329 national sites and several hundred other sites operated by provincial governments.

A key difference between the two studies is the revised estimate of the number of people infected by the tainted blood selling operation in the 1990's. Some doctors in Henan Province, a center of the blood selling operation, estimated that more than a million people had been infected in that province alone. The 2003 study estimated that the blood program had infected 199,000 people. By comparison, the new study estimates that only 55,000 former blood donors are infected with H.I.V.

To some degree the lower number of infected blood donors may be partly because many of them have died. The study found that nationally, 25,000 people died of AIDS last year. Of that figure, 10,000 were former blood and plasma donors, the estimate found. Over all, Chinese health officials estimate that fewer than 100,000 people have died of AIDS in the country.

The study found infection rates varied greatly in different regions of the country and could be broken down into six major groups: drug users, prostitutes and their clients, former blood and plasma donors, gay men, partners of H.I.V.-positive people, and infants infected in the womb by H.I.V.-positive mothers.

Drug users living with H.I.V. or AIDS accounted for 288,000 people, or 44.3 percent of the estimated total. Nearly all of them live in seven southern provinces. Prostitutes and their clients accounted for 127,000 cases, or 19.5 percent.

A large majority of those infected in China still do not know it. The estimate found that only 141,000 of the estimated 650,000 cases have been detected through testing.

China still faces enormous challenges on AIDS. Efforts to distribute anti-retroviral drugs have created a host of problems, while local officials in some regions still try to deny the presence of H.I.V. Some public security bureaus continue to arrest infected drug users rather than steer them to treatment.

Joel Rehnstrom, the coordinator in China for Unaids, said the new figures provide "a better picture" of the problem in China but should not be interpreted as meaning the situation is improving.

"This is good news, but there is still a long way to go," he said.

European Economic Plan Seeks Nordic-style Approach (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission presented a new plan to reinvigorate Europe's economies, calling for a Nordic-style, seemingly social-democratic approach rather than an Anglo-Saxon free-market model.

European leaders are scheduled to discuss the plan at their spring summit.

In the 247-page report, Commission President José Manuel Barroso gave the most praise to northern European countries that are increasing spending on research and development universities and pursuing interventionist jobs policies. He also called for the creation of a competitive, continent-wide energy program, and support for small and medium-size businesses.

He also singled out previously Communist Eastern European countries that joined the bloc in 2004 "for doing some amazing things" in turning around their formerly state-run economies.

The announcement represents Mr. Barroso's attempt to recover the initiative after a tough first year in office. Many of his previous plans for jump-starting Europe's economies have faltered. Both European governments and the European Parliament, for example, rejected his plan to free up the services market, allowing plumbers, hairdressers and other small-business people to work more easily outside their homelands.

The report includes evaluations of the 25 national reform programs drawn up by EU members. While commission officials insist the process doesn't amount to naming and shaming, it does go out of its way to praise many Nordic initiatives. The Nordics are saluted for setting up "an integrating market for buying and selling electricity," for putting their public finances in order and improving the financial health of their pension systems.

DOJ_NMG_0012297

Some countries come in for gentle criticism. Italy, for example, is chided for not setting "targets, timetables and details" in its program. Rome is urged to control its public finances, take action to increase the competitiveness of traditional industries that face stiff Asian competition, and raise its employment level.

Warring Factions In Sri Lanka Agree To Resume Peace Talks (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Jan. 25 — In a measure of how intractable this country's ethnic conflict is, the warring parties agreed Wednesday to begin talking to each other again, after more than 18 months of deadlock over a site for peace talks and with scores of killings in the meantime.

The talks would focus on strengthening an all-but-ineffectual four-year-old cease-fire agreement. They are scheduled to take place in Geneva, starting as early as February.

The agreement, though modest in scope, represents a major breakthrough in the decade-long war between the ethnic-Sinhalese-dominated government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the separatist guerrilla outfit that effectively runs a swath of the country's north and east. It is better known as the L.T.T.E.

The cease-fire, brokered by Norway in February 2002, remains in place, but has frayed so much recently that the country appears to be at war in all but name.

There were 100 killings in December alone. Sailors and soldiers have repeatedly been the targets of bombs and land mines. A pro-rebel politician was gunned down during Christmas Eve Mass. Even the compound of the Nordic peace monitors, in the eastern town of Batticaloa, was bombed, on Jan. 13.

"Both sides have agreed on the need to meet and decide how the cease-fire can be implemented better," Erik Solheim, the chief Norwegian mediator, said after talks with the leader of the Tamil Tigers, Velupillai Prabhakaran, in the rebel capital, Kilinochchi. Talks would focus on "strengthening the 2002 cease-fire," he said.

Mr. Solheim said it was imperative to halt the tide of violence for the talks to be productive. "There is a need to create a climate that is conducive to peace," he added. "The violence has to stop."

The choice of Geneva marks a significant concession for the government, which had long insisted that negotiations take place only inside Sri Lanka, or at best, in another Asian country.

The European Union has barred Tamil Tiger delegations from traveling to its territory. But the restriction does not apply to Switzerland, which is not part of the European Union.

The government of President Mahinda Rajapakse, a Sinhalese hard-liner, has also made a concession on the subject of the talks. Mr. Rajapakse had insisted that the cease-fire agreement be renegotiated. The Tamil Tigers had insisted that the terms of the agreement could not be tampered with.

Even so, the talks are not going to be easy. The Tamil Tigers are particularly exercised about a breakaway faction operating in government-held territory, led by a prominent former Tiger leader called Karuna. The rebels will press the government to enforce an existing clause in the agreement: to disarm paramilitary forces operating in its area.

The government, meanwhile, will point to numerous cease-fire violations for which it blames the Tigers.

"On our part we have given our assurance there will be no act of violence by the L.T.T.E. against government forces," said Anton Balasingham, the chief negotiator for the Tigers, according to Tamilnet, a Web-based news service.

Then there is the bigger gulf that fuels the war in the first place. Mr. Rajapakse insists that he wants a unified state, while the rebels demand greater autonomy for the Tamil-majority areas.

In Africa, Islam And Christianity Are Growing - And Blending (CSM)

By Abraham McLaughlin

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

LAGOS, NIGERIA - At first, it seems a surprising sight: inside a two-story mosque in sub-Saharan Africa's largest metropolis hangs a life-size portrait of Jesus Christ.

Yet worshipers at "The True Message of God Mission" say it's entirely natural for Christianity and Islam to cexist, even overlap. They begin their worship by praying at the Jesus alcove and then "running their deliverance" - sprinting laps around the mosque's mosaic-tiled courtyard, praying to the one God for forgiveness and help. They say it's akin to Israelites circling the walls of Jericho - and Muslims swirling around the Ka'ba shrine in Mecca.

This group - originally called "Chris-lam-herb" for its mix-and-match approach to Christianity, Islam, and traditional medicine - is a window on an ongoing religious ferment in Africa. It's still up for debate whether this group, and others like it, could become models for Muslim-Christian unity worldwide or whether they're uniquely African. But either way, they are "part of a trend," says Dana Robert, a Boston University religion professor.

DOJ_NMG_0012298

Amid intense sectarian violence in this half- Muslim, half-Christian country, these groups serve as tolerant peacemakers. Also, with widespread poverty and health concerns here, people are seeking practical, profitable religion more than rigid doctrine.

Before Islam and Christianity arrived in Africa, people here "believed in deities being close" - in gods who resided in trees or rivers and helped or hurt locals daily, explains Kamaldeen Balogun, an Islamic studies professor at Olabisi Onabanjo University in southeastern Nigeria.

"You in the West are satisfied with one hour of church on Sunday," says Mr. Balogun. But for people in Africa, who he says need so many solutions, "This is about a practical way of life," about a willingness to combine Christianity or Islam with their own traditions to "see if they can make something new" - something that will help.

Worshipers at the "True Message" mission say unifying the two theologies has made a major difference in their lives.

A slight woman with a quick smile, Kuburat Hamzat says she came here in 1998 with a severe menstruation problem. She was embraced by the mission's "man of God," a soft-spoken, bald man named Samusideen Saka. He told her, "Dancing will not kill you" and prescribed 91 laps of "running deliverance" each day. He also explained the commonalities of the great faiths to Ms. Hamzat who had grown up in Islam. That understanding, she says, changed her. "Because I understood that in my mind, I got healed," she says. Her problem hasn't recurred, she says. Others say they've been cured of barrenness, mental illness, and other troubles.

Pastor Saka explains that his father was an herbalist and that both Muslims and Christians would come to him for healing. Although he grew up Muslim, and has been to Mecca on pilgrimage several times, he couldn't comprehend Nigeria's sectarian strife. He now considers himself a Christian, "but that doesn't mean Islam is bad."

Quite the opposite. Next to his mosque is a televangelist's dream - an auditorium with 1,500 seats, banks of speakers, a live band, and klieg lights. On Sundays the choir switches easily between Muslim and Christian songs, and Pastor Saka preaches from both the Bible and the Koran. His sermons are often broadcast on local TV.

The broader context here is Africa's dramatic shift in recent decades to Christianity and Islam. During the 20th century, fully 40 percent of Africa's population moved from traditional religions to "different shades of Christianity," says Philip Jenkins, a history and religion professor at the University of Pennsylvania. It is, he adds, "the largest religious change that has ever occurred in history." There are debates about whether Christianity or Islam is spreading faster in Africa, but clearly they're both on the rise - and sometimes are the source of tension.

In Nigeria's religious city of Jos (short for "Jesus Our Savior") the government says 50,000 people died between 1999 and 2004 in sectarian clashes. Until a peace deal last year, Sudan's northern Muslims and southern Christians were at war for two decades.

Clearly, the religious revolution is still shaking out. "People are converting rapidly, but they don't necessarily have instruction" in the details of their faiths, says Boston University's Professor Robert. Nor have they had "time for their belief system to solidify." It is, she says, "still shifting." She argues that eventually the faithful will choose one religion or another, and the hybrids will fade away.

But the ferment is quite evident on the chaotic streets of Lagos, which is home to some 10 million people. Hundreds of church-sponsored banners scream out, "It's your day of RECOVERY @ LAST where life's pains are healed" or "Jesus Christ: A friend indeed! Even in times of need!!"

Healing is a regularly promised feature of churches across Africa. It's symbolic of a key element of the continent's religious explorations - fusing faith and rationality, Professor Balogun says. According to Western thought, with its emphasis on rationality, "Everything that goes up must come down," he says. But a more African approach is that, "By divine intervention it may not come down." In fact, his university is initiating a degree focusing on the religion-science nexus.

Meanwhile, it's not just Saka who's exploring the common ground between Christianity and Islam. Sitting in a wrought-iron throne, swathed in silky white fabric, the founder of "Chrislam" has these words for followers of the two great faiths: "The same sun that dries the clothes of Muslims also dries the clothes of Christians." Stroking his beard, the man named Tela Tella says, "I don't believe God loves Christians any more than Muslims."

His followers calls him His Royal Holiness, The Messenger, Ifeoluwa or "The Will of God." Since the religion's founding two decades ago, this small band has been gathering almost daily to hear his message of inclusiveness - that Christians and Muslims, "who are sons of Abraham, can be one."

Delta Villages Fear Troops In Nigeria (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012299

WARRI, Nigeria, Jan. 25 (Reuters) — Villagers fled Nigeria's lawless delta on Wednesday amid fears of military reprisals after a wave of attacks on foreign oil companies by ethnic Ijaw militiamen.

The army deployed more troops to major installations, and oil companies tightened security around offices a day after heavily armed men stormed the headquarters of the Italian oil firm Agip, robbing a bank on the premises and killing eight policemen and a civilian.

"There are soldiers everywhere, and I don't want my three girls in the firing line," said Return Powei, who lives in the remote village of Ogbotobo. "Our youths run into the forest when they hear the soldiers are coming. Everyone is moving out of Ogbotobo."

It was not clear if the attack on Agip, a unit of ENI of Italy, was the work of the Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta, whose five-week campaign of sabotage and kidnapping has contributed to an increase in oil prices.

The group said it would make Royal Dutch Shell suffer unless it paid $1.5 billion to delta villages in compensation for decades of oil pollution, which is one of its demands for releasing four foreign hostages.

The government has set up a committee to negotiate the release of four oil workers kidnapped Jan. 11.

U.N. Chief's Son Agrees To Pay Duties On SUV (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The son of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan has announced that he intends to pay Ghana's government $14,301 in import duties on a Mercedes SUV that he had avoided paying by misusing his father's name.

Kojo Annan had obtained diplomatic discounts and tax exemptions on the luxury vehicle when he bought it in his father's name seven years ago. He does not intend to reimburse a German Mercedes dealership that gave him a $6,541 diplomatic discount, his lawyer said this week.

"The automobile was not for the secretary-general's own personal use and therefore the [import duties] exemption was not justified," William Taylor III, Kojo Annan's lawyer, said in a letter to Ghanaian officials last Thursday. "I write to inform you that Mr. Kojo Annan wishes to make full payment of the amount due to the government of Ghana."

A probe of the United Nations oil-for-food program revealed in September the false statements involving the car. Investigators initially suspected that the Mercedes was a payoff to Kofi Annan for awarding a U.N. contract to his son's employer, Cotecna Inspection. The investigators found a memo on the computer of an assistant to Annan that relayed Kojo Annan's request to approve the use of his name to obtain a diplomatic discount.

The secretary-general said that he gave his son $15,000 toward the purchase but that he did not realize that his name had been used to receive diplomatic discounts and tax exemptions.

On Wednesday, he welcomed news of his son's move. "It was the right thing to do," Annan told Reuters at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. "He knew I wanted him to sort it out, clean it up. It was between him, his lawyer and the government."

Asked whether he, as secretary-general, secured the tax break for his son, Annan said, "Absolutely not. It was done behind my back."

The investigative panel, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Paul A. Volcker, found no evidence of wrongdoing by the secretary-general. But journalists' persistent requests to the secretary-general's office for more information about the car roiled the elder Annan, who considered the matter closed and refused to address it.

At a news conference last month, Annan called a Times of London reporter "an embarrassment to his profession."

On Tuesday, Taylor announced that Kojo Annan would reimburse Ghana's government. The lawyer also said that the car was no longer in the secretary-general's name and that it had been totaled in a crash.

Ghanaian customs officials told the Times of London on Wednesday that they had received Kojo Annan's offer but that the attorney general had not decided whether to press charges.

Pinochet Daughter Detained At Dulles (WP)

By Monte Reel And Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Jan. 25 -- The oldest daughter of the former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was detained Wednesday at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, where she requested political asylum, a Chilean official said.

Lucia Pinochet, 60, arrived at about 7 a.m. on a United Airlines flight from Buenos Aires, and customs officials stopped her for questioning. She had been served with a subpoena over the weekend in Chile, along with her mother and three siblings.

DOJ_NMG_0012300

They had been ordered to appear in court on Monday in Santiago, the Chilean capital, on tax fraud charges connected to a probe of her father's illegal bank accounts.

A spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security said she was in U.S. custody at the airport in Virginia "pending resolution of her immigration status."

Chile's Interior Minister, Francisco Vidal, said U.S. Ambassador Craig Kelly informed his government that Pinochet, sought on an international arrest warrant, had requested asylum. U.S. officials said they could not comment on that issue.

Vidal said the Chilean government, as a democracy, rejects the basis for such a claim.

"Political asylum . . . is when there is no system of law, when there is no due process," he said.

Pinochet's father, 90, faces charges for financial crimes and human rights abuses committed during his 17-year rule, from 1973 to 1990. His wife, Lucia Hiriart, and three of their other children obeyed the summons, but Lucia was not present in court, according to Chilean news reports.

Lucia Pinochet's son, Rodrigo Garcia, told Chile's Radio Agricultura that he had traveled by car with his mother Sunday across the Chilean border into Argentina.

Diplomatic sources said she then took a domestic flight from the city of Mendoza to Buenos Aires, where she boarded a U.S.-bound flight. Garcia stayed behind.

"I want to make it clear that the journey we made to Argentina had been planned beforehand and she was never running away from anything," Garcia said in the radio interview.

He also sent a statement by his mother to a Santiago newspaper, in which she rejected the charges against her family.

"I am sorry that the instruments of the state are being used with the purpose of defaming and discrediting the honor of the people," the statement said. "They don't seek to clarify the source of my father's funds, but instead some seek the total defamation of each and every member of my family."

Lucia Pinochet is accused of evading almost $1 million in taxes. A Chilean prosecutor said Wednesday that the minimum punishment for a conviction of the charges would be three years in prison.

A U.S. customs service spokeswoman, Suzanne Trevino, said she did not know why Pinochet had been stopped at the airport. In general, she said, travelers would be referred by airport inspectors for additional interviews "if there were a problem with the documents or something suspicious."

Along with her mother and three siblings, Pinochet was charged with filing false tax declarations and helping her father hide nearly $27 million in more than 125 bank accounts outside Chile, including an account at the now-defunct Riggs National Bank in Washington, where he kept about $8 million.

Court officials in Santiago said the family members had been charged with filing "maliciously incomplete" and false tax declarations.

Chilean Foreign Minister Ignacio Walker told reporters that Pinochet could be sent back to Argentina by U.S. authorities, could voluntarily return to Argentina where Chile would submit an extradition request, or could decide to return to Chile and appear in court.

In Santiago, President Ricardo Lagos told reporters that talks were underway to arrange for her voluntary return.

"All of this has an effect on the country -- it's sad," said Lagos, a moderate socialist and longtime critic of the former dictator.

Augusto Pinochet has been charged with financial fraud, and faces prosecution related to the murder and torture of thousands of people after the 1973 military coup that brought him to power. He has avoided standing trial on the human rights charges by claiming health problems, including dementia.

A U.S. Senate report last year revealed that nine banks had allowed Pinochet to use false account names and offshore companies to hide millions of dollars from tax authorities and international prosecutors seeking to seize assets stolen from Chile. Riggs pleaded guilty last year to a criminal felony charge for failing to report suspicious transactions, and agreed to pay $41 million in civil and criminal fines to the U.S. government.

On Tuesday, a Santiago court approved bail for Pinochet's wife and their other children; Marco Antonio, Jacqueline and Veronica. Pinochet's eldest son, Augusto, was not arrested. He has been charged with falsifying passports but not with tax evasion.

Constable reported from Washington. Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu in Washington and special correspondent Jonathan Franklin in Santiago contributed to this report.

An Act Of Political Hygiene (WSJ)

By Mark Steyn

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012301

QUEBEC CITY -- Remember the conventional wisdom of 2004? Back then, you'll recall, it was the many members of George Bush's "unilateral" coalition who were supposed to be in trouble, not least the three doughty warriors of the Anglosphere -- the president, Tony Blair and John Howard -- who would all be paying a terrible electoral price for lying their way into war in Iraq. The Democrats' position was that Mr. Bush's rinky-dink nickel-&-dime allies didn't count: The president has "alienated almost everyone," said Jimmy Carter, "and now we have just a handful of little tiny countries supposedly helping us in Iraq." (That would be Britain, Australia, Poland, Japan . . .) Instead of those nobodies, John Kerry pledged that, under his leadership, "America will rejoin the community of nations" -- by which he meant Jacques Chirac, Gerhard Schröder, the Belgian guy . . .

Two years on, Messrs. Bush, Blair, Howard and Koizumi are all re-elected, while Mr. Chirac is the lamest of lame ducks, and his ingrate citizenry have tossed out his big legacy, the European Constitution; Mr. Schröder's government was defeated and he's now shilling for Russia's state-owned Gazprom ("It's all about Gaz!"); and the latest member of the coalition of the unwilling to hit the skids is Canada's Liberal Party, which fell from office on Monday. John Kerry may have wanted to "rejoin the community of nations." Instead, "the community of nations" has joined John Kerry, windsurfing off Nantucket in electric-yellow buttock-hugging Lycra, or whatever he's doing these days. * * *

It would be a stretch to argue that Mr. Chirac, Mr. Schröder and now Paul Martin in Ottawa ran into trouble because of their anti-Americanism. Au contraire, cheap demonization of the Great Satan is almost as popular in the streets of Toronto as in the streets of Islamabad. But these days anti-Americanism is the first refuge of the scoundrel, and it's usually a reliable indicator that you're not up to the challenges of the modern world or of your own country. In the final two weeks of the Canadian election, Mr. Martin's Liberals unleashed a barrage of anti-Conservative attack ads whose ferocity was matched only by their stupidity: They warned that Stephen Harper, the Conservatives' leader, would be "George Bush's new best friend"! They dug up damaging quotes from a shocking 1997 speech in which he'd praised America as "a light and inspiration"! Another week and they'd have had pictures from that summer in the late '80s he spent as Dick Cheney's pool boy.

Mr. Harper, the incoming prime minister, will not be "George Bush's new best friend" -- that's a more competitive field than John Kerry and Jimmy Carter think. But at the very least a Harper government won't rely on reflexive anti-Americanism as the defining element of Canadian identity. No cheery right-wingers south of the border should exaggerate what happened on Monday. It was an act of political hygiene: The Liberal Party was mired in a swamp of scandals, the most surreal of which was a racket to shore up the anti-separatist cause in Quebec by handing out millions of free Canadian flags, a project which so overburdened the domestic flag industry the project had to be outsourced to overseas companies, who at a cost of $45 each sent back a gazillion flags that can't fly. That's to say, they had no eyelets, no sleeve, no halyard line for your rope and toggle and whatnot. You have to lean a ladder up against the pole and nail it into position, which on a January morning at Lac St-Jean hardly seems likely to endear nationalist Quebecers to the virtues of the Canadian state. Millions of dollars were transferred to "advertising agencies" and "consultancies" run by the party's pals and in return they came up with a quintessentially Liberal wheeze: Even if you wanted to salute it, you can't run it up the flagpole. As a forlorn emblem of Trudeaupian nationalism, that's hard to beat.

And yet and yet . . . in throwing the bums out, Canadian voters declined to subject them to full-scale humiliation. Even with viable alternatives for all tastes -- conservative, socialist and Quebec separatist -- it seems one can never underestimate the appeal of a party of floundering discredited kleptocrat incompetents led by a vindictive empty suit who fought one of the most inept campaigns in modern political history. They clung on to over 100 seats and the votes of Canada's three biggest cities. Truly, the Liberals are one of the most amazingly resilient parties this side of Kim Jong-Il's.

Stephen Harper has to live with that political reality, but, as he's done with his party, he'll move the country incrementally. On the environment, his views are compatible with Mr. Bush, John Howard and now Tony Blair: That's to say, if "climate change" is a problem, Kyoto's not the answer to it. On missile defense, the Conservatives will string along with Washington because it's the easy option and we'll be covered by it anyway: Even Canadians aren't prepared to argue that, if there's something headed toward Winnipeg or Montreal, we'd rather the Americans minded their own bloody business and didn't tell us about it. But it's a good gauge of the deterioration in U.S.-Canadian relations that a quintessential piece of postmodern, humbug multilateralism -- an issue that required Canada to be minimally supportive without being helpful, at no political cost and in return for some lucrative contracts for northern defense contractors -- was whooped up by the Liberals into a big scare about Washington's plans for the "weaponization of space." On missile defense, Mr. Harper will be more down to earth in every sense.

But will there be Canadian troops in Iraq or wherever's next? No, not in any meaningful sense. The sad fact is, even if we'd wanted to liberate Baghdad, we have an emaciated military worn to the bone. But it goes beyond the lack of equipment and lack of transport that now afflict what was, 60 years ago, the world's fourth largest military. In April 2002, the Pentagon wished to confer the Bronze Star on five snipers from the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry in Afghanistan for their service in . . . killing the enemy. Ottawa put the request on hold, relenting grudgingly only after the matter was made public. It seems the Canadian government's main objection was a reluctance to let it be known that our military still, er, shoots people, and extremely accurately. The backs of our five-dollar bills celebrate the armed forces, but they're all unarmed -- peacekeepers, elderly veterans, etc.

DOJ_NMG_0012302

Like much of the European Union, we're so heavily invested in the idea that we've found a kinder gentler way we can scarce bear to contemplate the reality. At the Washington state/British Columbia border this week, two guys on the lam were hightailing it through Blaine heading for the 49th parallel with the cops in hot pursuit. Alerted to what was coming their way, Canada's (unarmed) border guards walked off the job. For a country whose national anthem lyrics are mostly endless reprises of the line "we stand on guard for thee," we could at least stand on guard. A few years back, I was chatting with a border guard at the Derby Line, Vt./Rock Island, Quebec crossing. A beat-up sedan came hurtling northward and we jumped out of the way. She sounded a klaxon. By then the driver was halfway up the Trans-Quebecoise autoroute and, if he ever heard her stern warning, he declined to brake and reverse back to the post to show his papers. "Oh, well," she said to me, "it's probably nothing."

Canadians have been reluctant in the last four years to accept that we no longer live in an "it's probably nothing" world. Many Continentals feel the same way. Unlike his hollow predecessor, Stephen Harper is a thoughtful man who understands the gulf between self-mythologizing and the harder realities. You can't change a free country unless you persuade free people to change their minds, and he will at least start that tough job. He doesn't have to be George Bush's best friend, and he may even be more effective at opposing him on trade and agriculture disputes. But he could try being Tony Blair's and John Howard's best friend and reconnecting us with other traditional pals from whom Canada's become increasingly estranged. He could honor our small but brave contribution to Afghanistan by flying out and meeting them on the ground. But, even if he does nothing else, he'll bring to an end a decade of self-defeating sneering. The ayatollahs at least flatter America as a seducer -- the Great Satan -- which is a more accurate and sophisticated construct than deriding her as the Great Moron. The difference between sniping at the Taliban and sniping at Washington is that in the latter case we're firing blanks.

Mr. Steyn is a columnist for Canada's Western Standard and Maclean's magazine, as well as for National Review and the Atlantic Monthly.

Freedom's Unsung Hero (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Hong Kong's prosperity since World War II is sometimes referred to as a "miracle." But miracles require the intervention of a deity, whereas Hong Kong's remarkable economic growth between 1945 and its handover to China in 1997 owes a great deal to the nonintervention of a mortal man, John James Cowperthwaite, who died over the weekend at the age of 90.

Cowperthwaite arrived in Hong Kong in 1945 and served as Financial Secretary of the then-British colony from 1961-1971. Perhaps more than any other single figure, he was the architect and guardian of the greatest natural experiment in free-market capitalism in the postwar world. It is all the more remarkable that he kept the colonial government small and out of the business of business at a time when socialism was ascendant in Britain.

In 1997, Milton Friedman noted that since 1945 Hong Kong's GDP per capita had gone from a fraction to substantially more than that of Israel and Britain, and had caught up with that of the U.S., even as the colony's population increased tenfold. That astonishing performance became a policy beacon first to the nearby small nations of Asia (the "tigers") and eventually to Mainland China itself.

One of the better known stories about the undeservedly obscure Cowperthwaite was his refusal to collect economic statistics about Hong Kong during his tenure as Financial Secretary, lest they produce an impulse toward central planning among the bureaucrats. "I did very little," Sir John once said. "All I did was to try to prevent some of the things that might undo it." Other would-be central planners could learn a lot from what John Cowperthwaite didn't do.

The African Union Gets It Half-Right (NYT)

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

The African Union did the right thing in rejecting Sudan's bid for the rotating presidency of the organization. Allowing President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan to become Africa's face to the world would have sent just about every wrong message imaginable. Mr. Bashir has presided over the genocide perpetrated by Sudanese solders and allied militias in Darfur since 2003. He's not exactly the person anyone would want in nominal command of the 7,000-strong African Union force that is trying to protect civilians in Darfur. His ascension would have mocked the group's declared goal of promoting democracy, human rights and development.

The only question is why the African leaders in Khartoum for the sixth African Union summit meeting even wasted so much time on the issue, given the really pressing problems on their agenda. While the African Union usually passes the presidency on to the host of its regular summit meeting, the main purpose in founding the organization in 2002 was to avoid the pitfalls of its predecessor, the Organization of African Unity, which came to be derisively known as a dictators' club because of its consistent failure to sanction any member. The African Union, loosely modeled on the European Union, was meant to confront the continent's failings and problems head-on, and to find African solutions for them. So accepting Mr. Bashir's bid for the presidency would have been a serious blow to the union's credibility.

DOJ_NMG_0012303

Unfortunately, that credibility is still on probation. Though rebuffed for now, Mr. Bashir was promised the group's presidency in 2007, and for now the chair will go to the Congo Republic, hardly a model of human rights. Giving Sudan the African Union presidency next year will be just as unacceptable as it was this year.

DOJ_NMG_0012304

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Thursday, January 26, 2006 11:09 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fadely, Kathlynn (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 1/26/06 Civil Division News

ACLU says government using Patriot Act to censor, exclude Muslim scholar from U.S.

In Case About Google's Secrets, Yours Are Safe

Commentary: Swimmer still not telling the truth on trust

Patent ruling on BlackBerrys expected soon

Lawyer Indicted for Alleged Role in Illegal Internet Pharmacy Case

Doctor in botox case gets 3 year sentence

Court orders damages over Agent Orange

Are gas producers underpaying?

Op-Ed: BUSH'S EDUCATION GAP

AP

January 26, 2006

ACLU says government using Patriot Act to censor, exclude Muslim scholar from U.S.

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_A leading Muslim scholar who opposes the war in Iraq has sued\l "l" the U.S\l "l". government, claiming officials used anti-terrorism laws to stop him from accepting speaking invitations from organizations.

In a federal lawsuit filed Wednesday, Tariq Ramadan accuses the government of manipulating the Patriot Act to muzzle him. In a phone interview with The Associated Press, the Swiss intellectual and Muslim scholar denied that he supports terrorism.

"I have no connections to terrorism," Ramadan said from Oxford, England, where he is a visiting fellow. "This is all about my political thoughts. And my political thoughts are known to everyone."

Ramadan was blocked from accepting a tenured teaching position at the University of Notre Dame when his visa was revoked in August 2004 under a provision of the Patriot Act, said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU staff attorney.

Jaffer said the provision denies entry into the U.S. by any prominent foreigner who has used his status to endorse or espouse terrorism or to persuade others to do so.

Ramadan, 43, said he opposed the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and sympathizes with the resistance there and in Palestine. But he said he also opposes Islamic extremism, and promotes peaceful solutions.

"I want to build bridges," he said. "But I'm not blindly supportive of U.S. or European policies."

Ramadan's lawyer said his exclusion reflected an effort by the U.S. government to discourage academic debate about the war and other issues.

"The government should not be using the immigration laws as instruments of censorship," Jaffer said.

Named as defendants in the lawsuit are Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff.

The suit seeks a declaration that the Patriot Act provision at issue is unconstitutional. It also seeks a court order preventing the government from relying on the provision to exclude Ramadan or any other foreign national.

Besides Ramadan, plaintiffs in the lawsuit include the American Academy of Religion, the American Association of University Professors and the PEN American Center, organizations which had invited Ramadan to speak in the U.S.

"The exclusion of Professor Ramadan illustrates that the Patriot Act and other post 9/11 laws and policies may be serving to increase American isolation at a time when international dialogue is more critical than ever," Salman Rushdie, president of the PEN American Center, said in a statement. The center had invited Ramadan to speak in New York in April at its World Voices Festival.

The ACLU said Ramadan, a visiting fellow at St. Anthony's College at the University of Oxford, in August accepted British Prime Minister Tony Blair's invitation to join a government task force to examine the roots of extremism in Britain.

Megan Gaffney, a spokeswoman for government lawyers in Manhattan, said they had no immediate comment on the lawsuit.

END

New York Times (NY)

January 26, 2006

In Case About Google's Secrets, Yours Are Safe

ADAM LIPTAK

The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google\l "I", by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google\l "I" is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web.

But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure.

The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google\l "I" routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants.

But "this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues," said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. "These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words."

In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google\l "I" lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. "Google\l "I" objects," the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote, "because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets."

Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality.

"Google's\l "I" acceding to the request would suggest that it is willing to reveal information about those who use its services," he wrote. "This is not a perception that Google\l "I" can accept."

Even Google's\l "I" allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google\l "I". But not on privacy grounds. "We will probably not be making that argument," said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union.

The issues raised by the new subpoena, while substantial, are fairly technical, according to Professor Wu. "The legal point here is what is the relevancy standard for subpoenas?" he said. "That is interesting to procedure scholars but to no one else."

Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved.

A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. "We specifically stated in our requests," he said, "that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google\l "I"."

None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google\l

"I" maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not.

The problem with the subpoena, Mr. Fine said, is more general. "This is another instance of government overreaching," he said.

The government says it needs Google's\l "I" information to defend a challenge from the civil liberties union to a 1998 law, the Child Online Protection Act, which makes it a crime to make "material that is harmful to minors" commercially available on the Web. The law was enjoined by a federal court in Philadelphia before it became effective, and it has never been enforced.

In 2004, the United States Supreme Court affirmed the injunction, ruling that filtering devices may work as well or better than criminal prosecutions in achieving the law's aims of keeping some offensive materials away from children, and it sent the case back for a trial to explore that question.

At a trial scheduled to start in October, the government will try to prove that filters are ineffective. Philip B. Stark, an expert retained by the government and a statistics professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said in a court filing that the Web addresses and search terms sought from Google\l "I" and other Internet companies would help him "to measure the effectiveness of content filters."

The government apparently wants to show that real-world searches will pull up offensive materials that filters will not catch. Why it needs Google\l "I" to do that is unclear, and Professor Stark declined a request for an interview, citing the pending litigation.

Google\l "I" has not yet filed a response in court, and it has not discussed the case publicly beyond a brief statement citing government overreaching. Its fullest explanation of its position was in Mr. Ramani's letter in October.

Google\l "I" objected, Mr. Ramani said, because the fit between what the government seeks and what it seeks to prove is poor. He also said that collecting and providing the information was burdensome and that the government could find it elsewhere.

Mr. Ramani did say that "one could envision scenarios" where Internet searches alone could reveal private information, but he provided no examples. But Google's\l "I" main argument was that its "highly proprietary" trade secrets could be jeopardized.

Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a civil liberties group that has frequently been critical of Google\l "I", said the trade-secrets argument was a serious one.

In other contexts, Google\l "I" and other Internet companies say they are serious about protecting privacy. But their privacy policies acknowledge that they will comply with valid requests from the government and private litigants. Google's\l "I" policy, for instance, says it may share users' personal information if it has "a good faith belief" that disclosure "is reasonably necessary to satisfy any applicable law, regulation, legal process or enforceable government request." Nicole Wong, Google's\l "I" associate general counsel, said in an interview that the company "complies with valid legal process."

According to a 2004 decision of a federal court in Virginia, America Online alone responds to about 1,000 criminal warrants each month. AOL, Google\l "I" and other Internet companies also receive subpoenas in divorce, libel, fraud and other types of civil cases. With limited exceptions, they are required by law to comply.

Ms. Wong said Google\l "I" tried to notify users so they could object in court before the company turned over information about them. But the law forbids such notification in some criminal cases.

Even notification can be small comfort. It means a user must quickly and often at considerable expense find a lawyer and try to persuade a court to quash the subpoena. But the law often offers very limited protection for personal information held by third parties.

That approach no longer makes sense, said Daniel J. Solove, a law professor at George Washington University. "In the information age," he said, "so much of our information is in the hands of third parties."

Mr. Rotenberg said Internet search records, if collected and linked to individuals, could give rise to a particularly profound invasion of privacy. "It's kind of the shadow of the thoughts within your head -- your interests, your desires, your hobbies, your fears," he said.

The situation is more complicated outside the United States. Internet companies have complied with local laws, as they must to do business abroad. Yahoo, for instance, provided information that helped China send a journalist there to prison for 10 years on charges of leaking state secrets to a foreign Web site.

Still, the current subpoena to Google\l "l", legal experts said, has given rise to an important debate, whether the facts of the case are apt or not.

"It allows us to have a national dialogue about whether current privacy protections are adequate," said Susan P. Crawford, a specialist in Internet law at the Cardozo Law School. Even if the Justice Department is not seeking private information now, she said, "the next subpoena could ask for that kind of data."

END

Indianz.Com.

Thursday, January 26, 2006

Commentary: Swimmer still not telling the truth on trust

"Why should the Indian people, Congress and the public believe Interior now?

Interior deserves to have its point of view on Trust reform acknowledged by the media. The press has reported on it, but not to the exclusion of the positions of the Cobell plaintiffs

As Interior's spokesman on the Cobell v. Interior saga, Ross Swimmer surely knows that no press representatives are going to be as one-sided in their coverage as Interior may prefer. Still, Interior may be dismayed with editorial boards that have addressed the case, most of whom have called upon Interior to pay up and clean up.

The editorials have largely focused on the poverty in Indian Country. Although Mr. Swimmer has suggested elsewhere that poverty is the result of socio-economic factors beyond Interior's control, squandering valuable Indian land assets cannot be overlooked as a cause. From my perspective, even Indians in the top 1% deserve a full Trust Accounting, which is not what Interior is providing.

My earlier article, which Mr. Swimmer responded to, was aimed at giving the media more information than has been provided by Interior and the Cobell plaintiffs. Getting "underneath" the litigation is key to evaluating whether Interior's efforts are adequate or misdirected. It also aids evaluation of the judicial response and the effectiveness of the lawsuit as a means of providing full reparations for Interior's neglect.

A string of sound bites should be met with skepticism by journalists. Parsing requires putting them in fuller context. It means, in short, taking a trip down the rabbit hole to Blunderland."

END

Fort Worth Star-Telegram (Fort Worth) (KRT)

January 26, 2006

Patent ruling on BlackBerrys expected soon

Aman Batheja

Fort Worth Star-Telegram, Texas

Jan. 26--Fort Worth architect David Campbell has just one thing to say to U.S. District Judge James Spencer.

"Don't take my CrackBerry."

Campbell is one of the nearly 4 million Americans who owns a BlackBerry, those ubiquitous mobile communications devices that are so cherished by users that a nickname compares them to a highly addictive drug.

The closely watched duel between BlackBerry's maker -- Research In Motion -- and the patent-holding firm NTP is expected to come to a head next month. In the meantime, members from a wide group of industries are all wondering how they will function if Spencer forces RIM to shut down service to their BlackBerrys.

"It's my phone. It's my calendar. It's my e-mail. It's my everything I need," Campbell said.

BlackBerrys have been growing in popularity since they were introduced by RIM in 1999. First adopted primarily by Wall Street types who relished sending and receiving e-mails while on the go, the device has since found favor among other groups, including politicians, lawyers and emergency workers.

With more than 50 percent of the market share for wireless e-mail devices, RIM is expected to reach 5 million BlackBerry subscribers worldwide by the end of February, according to the technology research firm Gartner.

"Professionals who use the BlackBerry, while they bemoan the loss of being able to leave the office, they really embrace the convenience of having the office so close," said Hal Degenhardt, a lawyer in Dallas who received his first BlackBerry in the late 1990s while heading the Securities and Exchange Commission's Fort Worth office. He's been hooked ever since.

"Probably on a conservative estimate, I check it 20 times a day," Degenhardt said.

The grudge match at the heart of the dispute involves NTP's contention that RIM has infringed on its wireless e-mail patent. Many have debated whether NTP has a valid claim or is just a so-called patent troll, turning the exploitation of the patent system into a full-fledged profession. Courts have mostly sided with NTP since the company sued\l "l" RIM four years ago in U.S\l "l". District Court in Richmond, Va.

The U.S\l "l". Patent & Trademark Office is reviewing the patents involved in the case. How the re-examination process pans out could transform the case, but Spencer could rule before the patent review process is complete.

RIM "has been hoping the court case would drag out long enough that the patent office would invalidate all the patents," said Todd Kort, an Austin analyst for Gartner. "It looks like RIM is going to run out of time."

The lengthiness of the case makes it an abnormality in patent cases, the vast majority of which are settled out of court. Regardless of whether they're in the right, many have criticized RIM's decision to fight the suit.

"The cost of patent litigation is so expensive, you're putting large companies in a very difficult situation," said David Munck, a senior partner with Davis Munck Butrus, an intellectual-property firm in Dallas that focuses on technology patents. "I just think RIM miscalculated their position."

Attention in the case reached its zenith last week, when the Supreme Court refused to hear RIM's appeal. The case has now been tossed back to the District Court. Spencer on Wednesday called a Feb. 24 hearing on the case.

Although many BlackBerry users are scared by the possibility the judge will halt service to their BlackBerrys, what's more likely to happen will be far less dramatic.

"It's not like we're all going to wake up one morning and our BlackBerrys won't work anymore," said Kort, adding that the judge will likely give RIM at least 30 days to comply with the injunction or settle with NTP.

Few business analysts expect the nation's BlackBerrys to go dark.

"We think the chances of an actual shutdown are probably less than 10 percent," Kort said.

Assuming that a shutdown is avoided, two alternative scenarios loom large.

Recent reports from financial firms Canaccord Adams and Goldman Sachs say a settlement between the two companies is the most likely outcome. The thinking goes that even after a significant payment to NTP, the BlackBerry line still has enough potential to make money.

The other option is for RIM to release a software upgrade to the BlackBerry software, called a work-around solution, that keeps BlackBerry e-mail service functioning without violating NTP's patents. RIM has given few details about such a solution but has said it has one ready.

"My strong hunch is they will introduce a turnaround solution," said Randy Eisenman, president and founder of Handango, a Hurst-based company that handles online software sales for mobile devices including BlackBerry.

Last year, Handango dramatically increased the number of BlackBerry applications it offered, which helped sales of BlackBerry content to grow by about 320 percent from 2003, Eisenman said.

"We're seeing real great growth across all the major device types, but we're actually seeing the fastest growth in BlackBerry," he said.

Handango also has partnerships with most of BlackBerry's competitors, including Palm and HP, but Eisenman doesn't expect RIM to lose its leading position because of the patent dispute. "Without a doubt, this has presented an opportunity for RIM's competitors to make themselves more visible to customers," Eisenman said. "That being said, BlackBerry has such a stellar product and a loyal customer base, I don't see them losing momentum."

Despite the optimistic predictions, many remain worried about abruptly losing service. "Contingency plan" has become the buzzword among IT departments as various outfits decide how to handle a potential shutdown.

RIM competitor Intellisync has launched pilot programs with more than 40 financial services firms and government organizations interested in BlackBerry alternatives.

In the federal government, where BlackBerrys have become pervasive, there is less concern. Any injunction is not likely to include the federal government's 200,000 BlackBerry users, because of public-safety issues.

The city of Fort Worth began issuing BlackBerrys to a small number of employees in December 2004 through a contract with Sprint Nextel. James Burris, the city's BlackBerry administrator, now keeps track of 302 of the devices, which go mostly to department directors and upper management. Some emergency workers also use the devices, he said.

In recent months, the city's IT department has had meetings with Nextel representatives as well as with RIM to keep abreast of the lawsuit and its possible ramifications, Burris said.

RIM has "assured us that they will have some kind of work-around solution if an injunction were to be in place, and we were to be included," Burris said, adding that the city is likely to be exempt from any injunction.

And if a shutdown were to affect city employees?

"We would just go back to our cellphone solution we have now and would begin to review other devices," he said.

As for those defenseless BlackBerry addicts in the private sector, many are hesitant to switch to a competitor right now.

"You don't see many Mac users switching to IBM," Campbell said.

END

The Associated Press
01-26-2006

Lawyer Indicted for Alleged Role in Illegal Internet Pharmacy Case

A lawyer has been indicted on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets.

Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday.

Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May, and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August.

The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was "both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes."

Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud, unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Adkins, from St. Paul, Minn., refused to comment and referred calls to his own attorney, Earl Gray. Gray said Wednesday that the allegations "are simply not true."

Smith's bail was revoked for violating the terms of his release, and he remains in custody.

END

Cox News Service
Thursday, January 26, 2006

Doctor in botox case gets 3 year sentence

By LARRY KELLER

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — U.S. District Judge James Cohn said he had gotten more letters on behalf of Bach McComb, the South Florida doctor charged with injecting people with bogus Botox shots "than practically any defendant I've sentenced."

Nine of those supporters testified Wednesday to McComb's virtues as a doctor and a person.

But Cohn sentenced McComb to the maximum penalty sought by prosecutors — three years in federal prison. That will be followed by one year of supervised release.

McComb's attorney asked if his client could voluntarily surrender later. Cohn said no. And so, McComb, 48, took a final sip of water. He removed his necktie. Then he placed his wallet on the table. Next came his belt and his suit coat. Finally, he placed his hands behind him and a marshal placed them in cuffs.

"We love you, Bach," one supporter shouted as he was led away.

"We'll be praying for you," yelled another.

Thus ended 8 1/2-hours of testimony and legal arguments in federal court here. The hearing included riveting testimony from Palm Beach Gardens chiropractor Eric Kaplan and Alma "A.J." Hall, who had been McComb's girlfriend. Kaplan and Hall were left temporarily paralyzed after McComb injected them one day before Thanksgiving 2004 with fake Botox shots that were actually a far more potent botulinum concentration obtained from a California company.

Kaplan's wife, Bonnie, and McComb himself, also suffered debilitating reactions from the injections.

"He practiced medicine in a way that Dr. Frankenstein would have practiced medicine," Eric Kaplan, 53, testified. He sounded and walked normally, but said he has recurring health problems now. "I'm not the person I used to be," he said.

During the sentencing, a frequently sobbing Hall was seen in a videotaped statement she made Tuesday in Alabama, because she was physically unable to travel to Florida for the sentencing.

"All I know is what Dr. McComb did to me was deplorable. I had to suffer the humiliation of wearing diapers," Hall, 35, said. "By the time I left the hospital, my body had wasted away to almost nothing. I was unrecognizable, even to myself."

Hall's family and the Kaplans have civil lawsuits pending against McComb.

McComb also testified. "I wish I could turn back the clock and undo this nightmare, but I can't," he said, voice choking with emotion. "I clearly made an error," he said, adding that it was an accident. Like Kaplan, there were no outward signs that McComb had once been critically ill from the fake Botox.

McComb was charged nearly a year ago with 23 felony counts that included conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud. He pleaded guilty in November to a single count of deliberately mislabeling botulinum toxin type A that was injected into patients at Advanced Integrated Medical Center in Oakland Park, where he practiced medicine without a valid license. The other charges were dropped. McComb faced up to 28 years in prison before the plea deal. His attorney, Jose Hererra, said sentencing guidelines called for 10 to 18 months in prison. Assistant U.S. Attorney Robin Rosenbaum urged Judge Cohn to go above the guidelines, arguing that doing so would serve as a deterrent to other doctors tempted to buy and inject fake Botox.

A federal agent testified Wednesday that 217 doctors across the nation bought botulinum toxin from Toxin Research International Inc. in Tucson, Arizona. Some of those doctors admitted injecting the TRI product in their patients, and it was clear that others did, too, said Susan Leeds, a special agent with the Food and Drug Administration's criminal investigations unit.

TRI was run by husband and wife naturopaths Chad Livdahl and Zarah Karim. They pleaded guilty in November to one count of conspiracy to commit fraud through mail and wire transactions and one count each of fraud for selling two vials of "Mimic Botox" to a North Miami clinic, then illegally shipping the toxin by UPS. The government dropped 38 other charges against the couple. Livdahl faces a guidelines sentence of nine to 11 years; Karim, a six-year term. They are scheduled to be sentenced today.

Another defendant, Robert Baker, an ophthalmology professor in Kentucky, also is set for sentencing today. McComb's medical license was suspended in 2003 for overprescribing prescription drugs that led to five overdose deaths in the Sarasota area. Criminal charges against McComb there were dismissed.

At the Oakland Park clinic, he bought and injected patients with bona fide Botox, a name brand copyrighted by Allergan Inc. that is the only FDA-approved cosmetic to use botulinum neurotoxin for erasing facial wrinkles. It was a small part of his practice, McComb said.

Prosecutors said he also bought botulinum toxin from Tuscon-based TRI, and an even more potent concentration from TRI's source, List Biological Laboratories in Campbell, Calif. It was the latter product that caused severe reactions in some patients.

In her videotaped testimony, Hall — who worked with McComb at the Oakland Park clinic — said he refused to take her to a hospital when she became severely ill from the injections, choosing instead to fly with her to New Jersey, where his mother and sister lived. His sister called for an ambulance as Hall lay on a bathroom floor, she said.

What followed was seven months in a hospital, Hall said. For the first four months, she was completely incapacitated, unable even to close her eyes or speak. "I could not express this agony ... or ask for relief," Hall said. "I felt trapped in my own body."

As Hall's anguished words tumbled out, several of McComb's supporters in the courtroom grumbled and snickered, saying she was a liar trying to bolster her civil case.

After prompting from his attorney, McComb said he loved Hall and has been depressed because he was unable to help her.

In imposing what he called a severe sentence, Judge Cohn cited the fact that McComb continued practicing medicine without a valid license, coupled with the fact that he knew the botulinum toxin was not supposed to be used on humans. McComb had to be punished in order to "protect the public and to deter similar conduct," he said.

END

UPI

January 26, 2006

Court orders damages over Agent Orange

A Seoul court ruled Thursday that the U.S. maker of Agent Orange should compensate South Korean soldiers injured by the defoliant during the Vietnam War.

The High Court said that two companies, Dow Chemical and Monsanto, should pay $62 million in medical compensation to 6,800 people who were affected by excessive dioxin contained in Agent Orange, which U.S. forces used to clear forests and undergrowth, the BBC reported.

More than 300,000 South Korean troops fought in Vietnam during the 1965-73 conflict. They were the largest foreign contingent supporting the U.S\l "l". war effort.

The ruling overturned a lower court's decision in a long-running case, in which more than 20,000 South Korean veterans originally sued\l "l" for damages.

A U.S\l "l". court last year rejected a claim for damages from a group of Vietnamese who reported health problems they attributed to the defoliant.

In 1984, however, several chemical companies paid $180 million to settle a lawsuit brought by U.S. war veterans with a similar claim.

END

Star-Tribune

January 26, 2006

Are gas producers underpaying?

By DUSTIN BLEIZEFFER
Star-Tribune energy reporter

A New York Times report suggesting natural gas companies have underpaid the federal government billions of dollars in royalties is closely related to a case before U.S. District Judge William Downes in Casper.

The case originally included 75 gas-royalty lawsuits. It landed in the Casper court several years ago when a federal judiciary board assigned the lawsuits under administrative provisions meant to conserve judicial resources and streamline pretrial procedures.

Several Wyoming lawyers are involved in the voluminous case, including Wheatland attorney Ray Hunkins, a Republican who announced his candidacy for governor on Tuesday.

Hunkins wasn't available for comment Wednesday. His client, Jack Grynberg of Denver, said he initiated the case nearly 11 years ago when he filed a complaint under the False Claims Act, a Civil War-era whistleblower law. It allows private citizens to sue on behalf of the government and recover triple damages in cases where defendants underpaid or overcharged the United States.http://adsys.townnews.com/34633188314405/creative/casperstartribune.net/news+rtcontophorsize.

Grynberg told the Star-Tribune this week that the court may soon make a decision about whether the case will proceed to trial. Seventy-three individual lawsuits remain, and many of those involve federal oil and gas in Wyoming, according to Grynberg.

The general complaint is that natural gas reporting differs based on a mixed set of federal regulations. Companies report a particular sales price from the wellhead to their shareholders, but report a lower sales figure to the Department of Interior after deducting some processing and transportation costs.

The result, according to Grynberg, is that spiking prices for oil and gas in 2005 created huge earnings for producers, but Americans didn't see the same spike in royalties for their oil and natural gas.

The New York Times reported that its three-month investigation suggests this type of discrepancy might have short-changed Americans by $700 million during 2005, a year in which energy companies extracted some $60 billion in oil and gas on publicly owned lands.

But the U.S. Minerals Management Service disputes the basis of the argument made in the Times article.

"The problem with the article is it compared wholesale and retail. That's like comparing a shirt on the rack to the cotton bole as it's harvested in the field. That's a big difference," said Susan Weaver, spokeswoman for the Minerals Management Service.

Arguments center on the physical point of valuation of the minerals and which costs can be deducted to determine the value that mineral royalties are based upon.

Grynberg said he believes the federal government misinterprets the reporting rules and allows too many deductions.

"The rules are very clear: You pay royalties as based on the value at the wellhead, period," he said.

Weaver said the Minerals Management Service has conducted two reviews of its royalty and audit procedures in recent years, and both reviews found no problems with the system.

The New York Times article prompted the chairman of the House Resources Committee, Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., to ask the Interior Department to provide information to the committee so it can review the matter.

Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., spoke with Minerals Management Service Director Johnnie Burton this week about the mineral royalty underpayment allegations. Thomas' spokesman, Cameron Hardy, said the senator would like to review the royalty audit process in the Senate energy and finance committees.

"The key is making sure the laws we have in place are keeping current with the times," Hardy said.

NewsTracker

* Last we knew: The federal government received in excess of $10 billion in royalty payments in 2005 for minerals produced from federally owned lands.

* The latest: Debate about whether energy companies are paying the correct amount of federal mineral royalties centers on a whistleblower case before U.S. District Court in Casper.

* What's next: U.S. District Judge William Downes is expected to decide whether the case will go to trial.

END

Boston Globe (MA)

January 25, 2006

Op-Ed: BUSH'S EDUCATION GAP

DERRICK Z. JACKSON

OUR COMMANDER-in-certitude went Monday to Kansas State University. The publicized reason was to defend ultra-secret domestic spying. For much of his speech and question-and-answer period, President Bush served juicy red meat in a red state where he slammed John Kerry in the 2004 election, 62 to 37 percent. He said:

"This enemy cannot beat us. They cannot defeat us militarily. There's no chance."

"In the short term, we'll stay on the offense."

"Congress gave me the authority to use necessary force to protect the American people."

"We're using all assets at our disposal to protect you."

In the question-and-answer period, there was a moment when Bush was caught confused about his assets in another arena. Someone asked Bush, "Recently, $12.7 billion was cut from education . . . How is that supposed to help our futures?"

There was applause from the crowd.

Bush stumbled. "Education budget was cut? Say it again. What was cut?"

The person said, "$12.7 billion was cut from education. And I was just wanting to know: How is that supposed to help our futures?"

Bush said, "At the federal level?"

The person said, "Yes."

Bush said, "I don't think we've actually for higher education?"

The person said, "Student loans."

Bush said, "Student loans?"

The person said, "Yes, student loans."

Bush said, "Actually I think what we did was reform the student loan program. We are not cutting money out of it. In other words, people aren't going to be cut off the program. We're just making sure . . . it functions better. In other words, we are not taking people off student loans. We are saving money in the student loan program because it's inefficient."

Bush continued, "And secondly, . . . we're actually expanding the number of Pell grants through our budget."

Karl Rove should have told Bush that if you visit a university and offer a question-and-answer session, you might get asked about education. The question came two weeks after Bush gave an address at an elementary school in Glen Burnie, Md., to tout the fourth anniversary of No Child Left Behind. In that address, Bush said, "We have a moral obligation to make sure every child gets a good education . . . It's not right to have a system that quits on kids. I mean, some schools may not think they're quitting on kids, but when you shuffle kids through the schools without determining whether or not they can read and write and add and subtract, I view that as quitting on kids."

It is stunningly clear that Bush and the Republican Congress have quit on the kids. The questioner at Kansas State was correct. In December, the Senate passed a $12.7 billion cut in loan aid, which would force college students and their families to pay much higher interest rates on their loans. Pell grants would remain capped at $4,050 for the fourth straight year, further depressing a purchasing power which has declined, according to the American Council on Education, from covering 84 percent of the cost of a public four-year college in 1972 to 34 percent today.

On the K-12 front, despite the immense budgetary authority originally granted by Congress to make No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" work, Bush and the Republicans took the assets at their disposal and shuffled them over to what is becoming a needless, trillion-dollar war in Iraq. They shuffled them over to the needless, trillion-dollar tax cuts for the wealthy, cuts they still want to make permanent.

Because of those decisions, the gap between what Congress budgets for No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" and what states and localities have to pay to meet its rules have sparked nationwide complaints from both red and blue states. The White House and its Department of Education beat back one lawsuit last year brought by the National Education Association, but it faces another from the State of Connecticut\l "l", one endorsed by 109 of the state's 169 school boards, according to last week's Hartford Courant.

Connecticut\l "l" Attorney General Richard Blumenthal called the goals of No\l "l" Child\l "l" Left\l "l" Behind\l "l" "worthy," but said "the federal government must be held accountable for its education promises." Evasion of such accountability was abundantly evident in Bush's bumbling answer at Kansas State University. For all his certitude about tax cuts, war, and holding terrorists accountable, Bush never did say how the $12.7 billion cut in student loans was supposed to help our future.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, January 27, 2006 7:56 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, January 27, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060127.pdf; dojclips060127.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush Sees No Need For Law To Approve Eavesdropping (NYT) 4
Bush Reasserts Presidential Prerogatives (WP) 5
Bush Claims Authority On War, Eavesdropping (WT) 7
Bush Calls Warrantless Wiretaps Legal (AP-Y2) 8
Trying To Maintain Control Of The State, In A State Of Confusion (WP) 9
Bush To Resist Wiretap Legislation (WSJ) 10
Bush Resists Changing Law On Spying (REU-Y2) 11
Varied Rationales Muddle Issue Of NSA Eavesdropping (WP) 12
New Poll Finds Mixed Support For Wiretaps (NYT) 14
A Discredit To The GOP (WP) 15
Using Our Fear (WP) 16
Beware The Tipping Point (ERG) 17
Presidential Power: Without Warrant (SEAPI) 18
FBI Chief Cites Worldwide Intel (WP) 18
Terrorist Nuclear Bids Concern Leaders At Forum (AP) 19
In Davos, Part II (NRO) 20
FBI Chief Urges Sharing Of Information To Combat Hackers (FT) 22
Colombia Busts Fake Passport Ring; U.S. Disputes Terror Link (USAT/AP) 23
Judge To Remain In Terrorism Trial (NYT) 24
Rabbi, Priest Back Muslim Cleric In Court (REU) 24

Patriot Act:

Could Patriot Act Have Prevented 9/11? (SHNS) 25

Homeland Response:

Federal Appeals Court Upholds Airport IDs (AP) 26
News From The San Francisco Bay Area (MERCN) 26
Terror Bucks Blown (NYPOST) 26
No Power But Persuasion For The Rebuilding Of Ground Zero (NYT) 27
President Explains Baker Bill Rejection (BRA) 28
First Lady Visits Schools In Louisiana, Mississippi (AP) 29
Louisiana Tires Of Its Rogues (LAT) 30
Study Says 80% Of New Orleans Blacks May Not Return (NYT) 33

War News:

U.S. Military Releases Half Of Iraqi Women In Its Prisons (NYT) 34
U.S. Releases Five Iraqi Women (WP) 35
Five Iraqi Women Are Released From US Custody (CSM) 36
U.S. Rebuilding In Iraq Found To Fall Short (NYT) 36
Audit Finds Fund Shortage For U.S. Projects In Iraq (WT) 38
Five Female Detainees In Iraq Set Free (LAT) 38
Planted Articles May Be Violation (LAT) 39
U.S. Forces Strained But Will Finish Mission, General Says Military Releasing Hundreds Of Detainees From Custody (USAT/AP) 40
General Says Force Can Do Its Job (WT/AP) 41
Is The US Army Prepared To Fight Another Iraq-style War? (CSM) 42
Strategy Targets Terror WMDs (WT) 43
Most Reservists At War Saw Incomes Grow (WP) 44

Corporate Scandals:

Key Enron Trial Nears, But Climate Has Changed (CSM) 45
There's No E In Houston (NYT) 46
Baggage Check: Next Trial True Test For Enron Task Force (LAW) 48
Reps Oxley, Frank Ask Fannie Board For Rudman And His Report (DOWJONES) 51
A Misguided Exemption (WSJ) 52

Criminal Law:

'I Don't Know' Abramoff, Bush Says President Won't Release Photos Of Two Together (USAT) 54
Bush Refuses To Release Abramoff Pictures (REU-Y2) 54

Bush Opposes Release Of Photos With Abramoff (WP)..... 55
Bush Says He Doesn't Know Abramoff, Remember Photos Being Taken (MERCN)..... 56
Bush Says Photos With Abramoff 'Not Relevant' (LAT) 58
Photos With Lobbyist Are 'Not Relevant,' Bush Says (NYT) 59
Inside Politics (WT)..... 60
Sens. Want Independent Corruption Probe (AP)..... 62
Salazar: Abramoff Prosecutor Needed (DENP)..... 62
Ethics In Congress (NYT) 63
Prosecutor Will Step Down From Lobbyist Case (NYT) 63
Defense Lawyers Seek Prosecution Data On Reporters In Leak Case (NYT)..... 64
Libby Defense Demands News Media Materials (AP)..... 65
Libby Wants What Reporters Knew In CIA Leak Case (REU-Y2) 66
Reporters' Information Sought (WP) 67
Libby Defense Requests Media Data In Leak Case (WSJ)..... 68
Ex-Pakistan PM Shrugs Off Interpol Arrest Notices (AFP)..... 68
9th Circuit Panel: Overseas Sex With Minor Subject To Regulation (LAW) 69
Convicted Rapist, Cleared By DNA, Freed From Custody (FINDLAW/AP)..... 70
Ex-Prosecutors In Trenton Respond To U.S. Scolding (NYT)71
Barry Unable To Identify 2 As Robbers (WP) 72
Five Indicted In Investigation Of Scandal Over City Trucking Program (AP)..... 73
City Clerk, 4 Others Indicted For Corruption (CHIT) 74
John Daley In-law Indicted (CHIST) 75
Dentist In Court To Face Prostitution Charges (CBS2CHI) 76
Dentist Charged In Prostitution Case 'outstanding Person,' Lawyer Says (AP) 77
Ryan Trial On Hold As Witness Takes Personal Leave (CHIT/AP)..... 77
Defense Assails U.S. Witness Who Forgets Key Dates (AJC). 77
Campbell Lawyers Fight Witness (WXIA-TV)..... 78
Louisiana Tires Of Its Rogues (LAT)..... 79
Who Stole Jackson Pollock? Painting's Owner Gives FBI A Name (PHI)..... 81
Former Beef Plant Operator Indicted In Federal Investigation (AP)..... 82
Former Library Director Sentenced For Stealing Funds (MACT)..... 83
Newton Man Sentenced To Prison In Fraud Case (BOS)..... 83
Bloomington Man Gets 100 Years For Child Porn (INDYSTAR) 83
Getty Museum To Hold Talks In Rome On Disputed Art, Lawyer Says (BLOOM) 84
Getty Director, Italian Officials To Discuss Antiquities Dispute (MERCN)..... 85
2 Charges Tossed For 'Mafia Cops' (NYDN) 85
'Mafia Cops' Prosecutors Drop Two Murders (NYNSDY)..... 86
A Death Row Blogger's Advice For Life (WP) 86
Grandfather Grateful Carjackers Freed Girl (WP) 88
Scene Set In Day-Care Shooting (WP)..... 89
Abuse Sentence Raised (WT) 90
Inmate Wounds Guard In Hospital (WT/AP)..... 90

Civil Law:

ChoicePoint To Pay $15 Million To Settle Consumer-Privacy Case (WSJ)..... 91
ChoicePoint To Pay $15 Million To Settle Charges Fine Stems From Consumer Identification Data Breach (USAT)..... 92
Record Fine For Data Breach (WP) 93
U.S. Settles With Company On Leak Of Consumers' Data (NYT)..... 94

Civil Rights:

SIU Fellowships May Be Changed (CHIT)..... 95
SIU Shows Minority Fellowship Plan To Faculty (CHIST) 96
Men Accused Of Putting Mercury On Interracial Couple's Porch (FINDLAW/AP)..... 97
Male Student Sees Gender Bias In School (WT) 97
Inside The Ring (WT) 98
Democrats In 2 Southern States Push Bills On Bible Study (NYT)..... 99

Antitrust:

AMC Closes Acquisition Of Loews Cineplex (AP)..... 101
EU: Microsoft May Still Face Fine Threat (AP)..... 102

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Three Deny Charges Of Plotting Against Forest Service Lab (AP)..... 102
Eco-terrorist Suspects Plead Not Guilty (SACBEE) 103
BP Faces Charges In Texas Refinery Blast - Sources (REU)104
West Virginia Governor Signs Mine Safety Bill (NYT/AP)..... 104
New Rules Govern Use Of Data From Testing Pesticides On People (WP)..... 105
In A Nimby World, Alaskans Woo Project To Their Backyard (WSJ)..... 106
E-Waste@Large (NYT)..... 108

DOJ_NMG_0012321

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Tons Of Pot Found In Border Tunnel (NYT/AP) 109
Agents Studying Massive US - Mexico Tunnel (NYT/REU) .. 109
Two Tons Of Pot Found Inside Mexico-U.S. Border Tunnel (SDUT) 110
Officials Find Drug Tunnel With Surprising Amenities (NYT) 111
Probe Underway After Exit To Border Tunnel Is Found (LAT) 112
Massive Drugs Tunnel Found Under Mexico-US Border (AFP) 112
Feds Smoke Out Largest Drug Tunnel Yet (CNN) 113
Tunnel Found Under Mexican Border (UPI) 114
Tunnel Found On Mexican Border (WP) 114
Agents Find Pot-filled Mexico-U.S. Tunnel (WT) 115
Five More Soldiers, Three Others Admit To Drug Smuggling (AP) 116
More Guilty Pleas In "Lively Green" (KOLD-TV) 116
Mexico Suggests U.S. Military Could Be Behind Border Incident (AP) 116
Federal Officials Arrest 2 In Plot To Kill DEA Agent (WT) 117
Inmate Accused Of Seeking Hit Man (NOTP) 118
County May Join Medical Pot Suit (PR-ENT) 119
U.S. And Mexico Trade Complaints Over Border Security Issues (NYT) 120
Mexico Suggests GIs Aided Pot Smugglers (AJC) 121
Mexican Border Incursions Redux: In 1916, Wilson Sent In The Army (WT) 121
Cleveland Man Who Kept Machine Guns Buried Pleads Guilty (CHATT) 123
Federal Grand Jury Indicts Couple On Charges Of Defrauding Museum (AP) 123
Yuman, Mexican Cop Indicted In Gun Smuggling (YUMAS) 124
Gun-Toting Delegate Misfires In Richmond (WP) 125

Congress-Administration:

2 More Democrats Say They'll Back Alito (USAT) 126
Lieberman Against Alito Confirmation (HARTC) 127
Senate Showdown Vote On Alito Set For Next Week (REU) 127
Alito Supported By Two More Democrats (WT) 128
Kerry Urges Alito Filibuster, But His Reception Is Cool (NYT) 129
Senate GOP Seeks To Force Vote On Alito (KCS) 130
Democrats Split Over Filibuster On Alito (WP) 132
Bring It On (WSJ) 133
Bush To Embrace A 'competitiveness' Agenda (FT) 133
Tight Budget Limits Bush's Options (WSJ) 134
Speech Protesters Granted Spot (WP) 135
L.A. Mayor, Key Democrats Discuss Reply To Bush's Address (LAT) 136
State Of The Union (NYT) 136
How Bush Would Tame Healthcare Costs (CSM) 138
Savings Accounts For Health Costs Attract Wall St. (NYT) 139
Enrollment Triples In Plans Offering Health Savings Accounts (LAT) 142
Democrats: Bush Should Outline Medicare Fix (REU-Y2) ... 143
Drugmakers To Cut Off Some Free Prescriptions (WP) 143
Medicare Drug Plan Leaves Out Supplies (LAT) 144
Bush Plans $250M For Nuclear Waste Project (AP) 146
State Of The Union? Not So Good, Most Say (USAT) 147
Majority In U.S. Say Bush Presidency Is A Failure, Poll Finds (BLOOM) 148
Bush Vows To Be Tough On Spending, Using Veto (REU-Y2) 148
Report: Budget Deficit Will Turn To Surplus If Bush's Tax Cuts Expire (USAT) 149
CBO Sees Wider Deficit This Year And In 2016 If Tax Cuts Don't End (WSJ) 150
Congressional Panel Expects $337B Deficit (BRAH) 151
Congress Agency Sees $337 Bln 2006 Budget Gap (REU-Y2) 152
Bush Uses Humor To Deflect The Heat (AP-Y2) 153
Financial Aid Growing Role For Lobbyists: Raising Funds For Lawmakers (WSJ) 153
McCain, Coburn To Force Votes On Pork Spending (WT) .. 156
K Street's New Ways Spawn More Pork (WP) 157
Capital's New Four-Letter Word (WP) 159
Spend-and-Collect Beltway Party Really Knows Jack (WSJ) 160
For Blunt, Pressure Grows For Q&A With Rivals (WSJ) 161
House Whip Race Indicates Trend To Conservatism (WT) . 162
Senate Questioning Bush Policies, But Administration Fighting Back (KRT) 163
Air Traffic Controllers Make Alliance With Senators In Dispute With FAA (WP) 165
Justice And Junkets (NYT) 166

Other News:

Hamas Win Shatters Status Quo (CSM) 166
Leader Likely To Cut Ties To Israel (WT) 167
Bush Is Conciliatory In Accepting Victory Of Hamas (WP) 168
Bush Rules Out Contacts Unless Hamas Backs Peace (REU-Y2) 170
Hamas Routs Ruling Faction, Casting Pall On Peace Process (NYT) 171
Bush Defends His Goal Of Spreading Democracy To The Mideast (NYT) 173

DOJ_NMG_0012322

Hamas Voters Fed Up With Fatah Election More About Corruption Than Terrorism, Some Indicate (USAT) ...175
Bush Says Hamas Must Renounce Violence (LAT) 176
Europeans Insist Hamas Must Disavow Terrorism (NYT) 176
Is Democracy Empowering Islamists? (CSM) 177
Joyful Arabs Voice Concern At How Hamas Will Swim In The Mainstream (NYT) 178
U.S. Won't Deal With Hamas (WT) 179
Palestinians Choose Avowed Enemy Of Israel (USAT) 181
Hamas Victory Roils Middle East Peace Process (WSJ) 182
Hamas Victory Ushers In New Era (BSUN) 183
Hamas Sweeps Palestinian Elections, Complicating Peace Efforts In Mideast (WP) 185
Hamas Victory Met With Alarm In The West (FT) 187
Prime Minister Resigns After Hamas' Victory (WT) 187
Hamas Is Stunned By Its Success (LAT) 189
Outcome Likely To Alter Vote In Israel (WT) 190
Hamas Victory Now A Major Issue In Israeli Election Campaign (WP) 191
After Hamas Victory, Israel's Likely Course (NYT) 192
A Shift Of Biblical Proportion? (WSJ) 193
In The Mideast, A Giant Step Back (NYT) 194
Hamas Rules (WSJ) 195
Hamas's Choice (WP) 196
Mideast Uncertainty, Again (LAT) 197
Two Elections And A Lesson (WP) 197
Living With Hamas's Victory (WP) 199
Hamas At The Helm (NYT) 200
Growth Is Shown In Durable Goods; Jobs Look Positive (WSJ) 201
Rising Profit Forecasts Send Shares Sharply Higher (NYT) 201
Dow Surges 99.73 As Strong Reports Push Stock Investors To Think Positive (WSJ) 202
Chairman Moved A Nation (WP) 203
Democrats Ride Momentum Into Mid-term Election (WP/REU) 206
Mass. Gov. Mitt Romney Speaks About 2008 Election (LEXHL) 207
Romney Says Clinton Likely 2008 Nominee (AP-Y2) 208
Mitt Romney (CSM) 208
A Romney-Kerry Rivalry? Not The Stuff Dreams Are Made Of. (WP) 209
Republican Cox Won't Re-enter N.Y. Race (PHI) 210
Lawyer Says He Won't Run For Clinton's Seat (NYT) 211
Episcopalians Weigh Sainthood For Marshall (WP) 212
Bush And China Endorse Russia's Nuclear Plan For Iran (NYT) 213
Rice Says Iran Is 'feeling Heat' (REU) 215
China Backs Talks In Iranian Standoff (WP) 216
57% Back A Hit On Iran If Defiance Persists (LAT) 216
U.N. Official Hopeful For Iran Nuke Plan (AP) 218
Not Exactly 20/20 (WP) 219
Mexico Nixes Border Maps For Migrants (WT) 220
Piracy Fight Strains U.S.-China Ties (WSJ) 221
Bush Vows Crackdown On N.Korea On Fake Dollars (REU)222
Rice Says US Ready To Resume Six-party Talks (REU) 222
Tobacco Firms Trace Fakes To North Korea (WSJ) 223
India Has Hard Choices On US Nuclear Deal: Rice (REU-Y2) 225
Restructuring Of U.N. Agency 'Likely' This Year (WT) 225
Bhutto Dismisses Interpol Notices (WT) 226
Canada's Next Leader Clashes With U.S. Over Arctic Waterways (NYT) 227
Harper Tells U.S. To Drop Arctic Claim (WP) 228
Firms Beat Path To ... Libya (CSM) 228
Georgia, Short Of Gas, Is Hit With A Blackout (NYT) 229
EU's Hard Line Going Into Trade Talks Draws Fire (WSJ) ...230
US Signals New Approach To Doha Round Of Trade Talks (FT) 231
Merkel Can Help Advance Talks (AP) 232
Boycott Call Creates Fracas At Davos Forum (NYT) 233
Economics And The Inevitable (WP) 234
Win-Win? Tell It To The Losers (NYT) 235
Don't Look For Me At Davos . . . (WSJ) 236
French 'protectionism' Draws EU Ire (FT) 236
Kosovo Albanians Mourn Pro-Independence Leader (NYT) 237
Axis Of Evo (WSJ) 238

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Sees No Need For Law To Approve Eavesdropping (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

DOJ_NMG_0012323

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26 — President Bush declared again on Thursday that his administration's program for eavesdropping without warrants was well within existing law, and said that efforts in Congress to write legislation expressly giving him authority for such a program were unnecessary and dangerous.

"My concern has always been that in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," Mr. Bush said in a wide-ranging morning news conference in the White House press briefing room. The president added that if the effort to write a new law "is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Mr. Bush's 46-minute news conference, announced less than an hour and a half ahead of time, was an effort by the White House to frame the debate on an array of foreign and domestic issues only five days before his State of the Union address. The topics included the Hamas landslide in the Palestinian elections; photographs of Mr. Bush with Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist; and the Congressional investigation into the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Bush appeared relaxed in the briefing room, which his aides say he prefers for news conferences instead of the more formal East Room. He appeared apprehensive at first, but loosened up when he saw a camera dangling precariously from a cord in the ceiling, threatening to crash down on the heads of reporters. "Are you wearing your helmets?" Mr. Bush asked.

He said he welcomed traveling for the 2006 midterm elections in November. "I've got one more off-year campaign in me as a sitting president, and I'm looking forward to it," he said. "As you know, I like to get out and tell people what's on my mind."

The eavesdropping program dominated the domestic policy questions at the news conference, which Mr. Bush used as another volley in his weeklong campaign to push back against both Democrats and Republicans who question the program's legality. Senate Judiciary Committee hearings into the program are to begin next month.

"There's no doubt in my mind it is legal," Mr. Bush said.

He reiterated that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected by the government of having links to Al Qaeda, was crucial to national security, and declared that he had the constitutional authority in wartime to order it. He said that after the Sept. 11 attacks he had asked people like Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, then the director of the National Security Agency and now the principal deputy director of national intelligence, to come up with plans to protect against terrorist attacks.

"And so he came forward with this program," Mr. Bush said. "In other words, it wasn't designed in the White House; it was designed where you expect it to be designed, in the N.S.A."

Mr. Bush took issue with a questioner who asked why he felt the need to circumvent the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires court warrants for wiretaps.

"Wait a minute," Mr. Bush said. "That's a — there's something — it's like saying, you know, 'You're breaking the law.' I'm not." He said that the surveillance act "was written in 1978" and that now "it's a different world."

Mr. Bush sidestepped a question on whether the eavesdropping program was part of an effort by the White House to reassert executive power.

"I would say that there has been a historical debate between the executive branch and the legislative branch as to who's got what power," he said. "And I don't view it as a contest with the legislative branch. Maybe they view it as a contest with the executive. I just don't."

Bush Reasserts Presidential Prerogatives (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush set limits yesterday on White House cooperation in three political disputes, saying he is determined to assert presidential prerogatives on such matters as domestic eavesdropping and congressional inquiries into Hurricane Katrina.

In a mid-morning news conference, Bush told reporters he is skeptical of a proposed law imposing new oversights on his use of the National Security Agency to listen in on electronic communications. He also said that he will block White House aides from testifying about the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina, and that he will not release official White House photos of himself with former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Facing repeated questions, Bush distanced himself from Abramoff, who is at the center of the biggest political corruption and bribery scandal in a generation. Bush said he does not recall having his picture taken with Abramoff or ever meeting him. Abramoff was a member of the exclusive club of Bush's $100,000 fundraisers known as Pioneers.

"Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well," Bush told reporters.

According to three people who reviewed half a dozen photos of the men, Bush is pictured at official gatherings and fundraisers with Abramoff and his children. He also attended a White House meeting with some of Abramoff's clients, including tribal leaders and the then-speaker of the House for the Northern Mariana Islands, the sources said. Abramoff has pictures from the event, they said.

If prosecutors "believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look and they're welcome to do so," Bush said. The White House has also refused to detail meetings between Abramoff and top White House aides.

The president was similarly adamant about not allowing top aides to testify about Hurricane Katrina. Bush, who has moved on several fronts over the past five years to strengthen the power of the presidency, said it would be damaging to him and future presidents if aides feared providing candid advice.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), a staunch supporter of Bush on foreign policy, has accused the White House of undermining the probe by refusing to detail the role of White House officials. "If people give me advice and they're forced to disclose that advice, it means the next time an issue comes up I might not be able to get unvarnished advice from my advisers," Bush said. "And that's just the way it works."

On the issue of NSA eavesdropping on overseas communications to or from U.S. citizens, Bush said he is concerned about Congress writing a new spying law because it could force the government to provide details and clues about a top-secret program used to hunt down terrorists.

"There's no doubt in my mind it is legal," Bush said. Democrats have accused Bush of breaking the law by authorizing the spying program without approval from Congress or the courts. The debate is expected to dominate hearings, scheduled to begin Feb. 6, on the highly classified NSA program.

"But it's important for people to understand that this program is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy," he said. "Why tell the enemy what we're doing?"

In his 10th news conference since winning reelection, Bush talked at length about presidential power but also previewed next week's State of the Union speech and weighed in on several foreign policy issues, including the Hamas victory in the Palestinian elections.

The performance was quintessential Bush: He joked and sparred with reporters, and betrayed no sense of second-guessing his decisions. When pressed about the election victory of Hamas, which the United States and other countries have called a terrorist group, Bush initially portrayed the vote as a triumph of the democratic process and a wake-up call to the current Palestinian leadership. Later, he conceded the results could set back the Middle East peace process, a top Bush priority.

Bush was often blunt, at one point taking a reporter's challenge to declare with "Texas straight talk" that the United States will never torture prisoners. "No American will be allowed to torture another human being anywhere in the world," Bush shot back. He said that is why the White House supported the law sponsored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that outlawed cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of detainees. A statement released by the White House when Bush signed the law, however, left vague whether the administration is asserting that a loophole exists.

Bush endorsed a plan to allow Russia to help produce nuclear energy for Iran as a way to keep the anti-American regime from building nuclear weapons. But he mischaracterized Iran's public position by saying, "The Iranians have said, 'We want a weapon.' " Publicly, the Iranian government has insisted the opposite is true, though Tehran is widely believed to be actively seeking nuclear weapons.

Although he has not vetoed a spending bill since taking office, Bush warned he is "fully prepared to use the veto" if lawmakers overspend. The government is more than 25 percent larger today in total spending than it was the day Bush took office, and conservatives are calling on the president and Congress to reduce the size of the federal budget.

DOJ_NMG_0012325

Bush is expected to talk about new spending restraint during his State of the Union address Tuesday night. The speech will be the official start of a legislative year that will be confined by high budget deficits and a tight legislative schedule. As Bush was speaking, the Congressional Budget Office estimated the 2006 deficit at $337 billion, up from 2005.

Bush will forgo expensive new programs in his speech, aides said, though he will call for new tax breaks to mitigate the cost of health insurance, which has skyrocketed in recent years. With the House and Senate up for grabs in November, politics, not policy, will likely drive much of the congressional agenda.

Bush said he is excited to be campaigning for GOP candidates in the midterm elections, which he predicted will be about "peace and prosperity."

At hearings on the NSA spying, Democrats plan to press administration officials to explain why Bush did not consult Congress more broadly about the program, why he does not believe Congress should write a new law governing eavesdropping programs such as the NSA operation, and why he believes the super-secret Federal Intelligence Surveillance Act courts should not be consulted before eavesdropping on communications to and from the United States. In his news conference, Bush emphasized that FISA was enacted in 1978 -- "a different world," he said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Bush's explanation that the Constitution and the war resolution passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks provide the president with extraordinary wartime power is wrong. "Congress can't roll over in the face of these outrageous claims," Kennedy said. "No president is above the law."

Bush Claims Authority On War, Eavesdropping (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday said he has exclusive authority over a broad range of issues -- including forbidding White House officials to testify before Congress about the government's Hurricane Katrina response and ordering warrantless electronic surveillance within the United States.

"Conducting war is a responsibility in the executive branch, not the legislative branch," the president said at a 46-minute press conference. "Most presidents believe that during a time of war that we can use our authorities under the Constitution to make decisions necessary to protect us."

Democrats have accused the president of breaking the law by ordering the National Security Agency in 2002 to eavesdrop on international communications between suspected terrorists and people in the United States. Senate hearings on the once-secret program are scheduled for Feb. 6.

Mr. Bush acknowledged that "there will be a legal debate about whether or not I have the authority to do this," but added, "I'm absolutely convinced I do. And I'm going to continue using my authority."

In response to a question from The Washington Times, Mr. Bush said: "We're going to do what is necessary, within the Constitution and within the law, and at the same time guaranteeing people's civil liberties, to protect the people."

Asked whether he would support efforts in Congress to spell out his authority to continue the eavesdropping program, Mr. Bush cited what he said was the extreme secrecy of the operation, first revealed by the New York Times last month.

"It's important for people to understand that this program is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy," he said.

Asked why his administration has refused to allow senior staff, including his former FEMA director, Michael Brown, "to testify, to interview or talk with congressional leaders" about the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Bush cited his executive authority.

"If people give me advice and they're forced to disclose that advice, it means the next time an issue comes up I might not be able to get unvarnished advice from my advisers," he said. "It will have a chilling effect on future advisers if the precedent is such that when they give me advice that it's going to be subject to scrutiny."

The president opened with a preview of his State of the Union address, which he will deliver Tuesday to a joint session of Congress. He said he believes Democrats and Republicans can accomplish something together even though this is a congressional election year. Responding to a question later, he said he was eager to get out and help Republicans win in November.

DOJ_NMG_0012326

"I've got one more off-year campaign in me as a sitting president, and I'm looking forward to it," he said.

Bush Calls Warrantless Wiretaps Legal (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt

AP2, January 27, 2006

President Bush again defended his program of warrantless surveillance Thursday, saying "there's no doubt in my mind it is legal." He suggested that he might resist congressional efforts to change or expressly endorse it.

"The program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties, and it's necessary," Bush told a White House news conference.

Democrats have accused the president of breaking the law in allowing eavesdropping on overseas communications to and from U.S. residents, and even some members of his own party have questioned the practice.

It was the president's first full-scale news conference of the new year, and the 10th since he was re-elected in 2004. He previewed his upcoming State of the Union address and fielded questions on former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the stunning victory of the radical group Hamas in Palestinian elections and the administration's cooperation with Congress on its investigation of Hurricane Katrina.

Asked if he would support efforts in Congress to spell out his authority to continue the eavesdropping program, Bush cited what he said was the extreme delicacy of the operation.

"But it's important for people to understand that this program is so sensitive and so important that if information gets out to how we run it or how we operate it, it'll help the enemy," he said. "Why tell the enemy what we're doing?"

"We'll listen to ideas. But I want to make sure that people understand that if the attempt to write law makes this program -- is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it," he said.

On the Middle East, Bush expressed concern that Palestinian elections had given a majority to the radical party Hamas, which has called for the elimination of Israel, although he noted that democratic elections sometimes produce unwelcome results.

He made it clear that any organization that has an armed wing and which advocates violence against Israel "is a party with which we will not deal."

Bush called the election results a "wake-up call" to the old guard Palestinian leadership, many of whom are holdovers from the days of the late PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Questioned about a controversy swirling about disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Bush said he would cooperate with federal prosecutors investigating Abramoff and his alleged influence peddling activities, if necessary. Otherwise, the president said he saw no reason to release pictures that he acknowledged were taken of him and Abramoff.

"There is a serious investigation going on by federal prosecutors — that's their job," the president said. "If they believe something was done inappropriately in the White House, they'll come and look and they're welcome to do so."

Otherwise, Bush said, "I've had my picture taken with a lot of people. Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well. "

"I've had my picture taken with you," Bush said to the reporter who asked the question.

Pressed further on his relationship with Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal charges stemming from his lobbying practices and has pledged to cooperate with investigators, Bush said, "I frankly don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy. I don't know him."

He said that federal investigators should pursue all leads and "look into all aspects of his influence on Capitol Hill," and that if the path also leads to the White House, he was sure they would "come knock on the door."

He was asked if he meets with lobbyists. "I try not to," Bush replied.

Asked about assertions by some Democrats that they will take back control of Congress in this year's midterm elections, Bush said he wasn't surprised they were talking that way, but shrugged it off.

DOJ_NMG_0012327

He said he was ready to hit the campaign trail one more time, not for himself, but to stump for Republican congressional candidates this year. "We've got a record and a good one, and that's what I intend to campaign on," Bush said.

The president defended his administration's level of cooperation with congressional investigations into the government's slow response to the Hurricane Katrina devastation, citing the thousands of documents the White House has provided.

Questioned on congressional complaints that more could be done, Bush said that it would have a "chilling effect" on the ability of presidential advisers to speak freely.

Bush also said that his nominee for Supreme Court, Samuel Alito, deserves to be confirmed in the Senate, where he clearly has the votes but where minority-party Democrats were speaking out against him at length.

"The Senate needs to give him an up or down vote as soon as possible," Bush said in opening remarks that also previewed the themes of his State of the Union address next Tuesday.

Bush shrugged off a recent Pentagon-contracted report which concluded the Army was overextended and the United States cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to break the back of the insurgency there.

The president predicted victory in Iraq and said, "Our commanders will have the troops necessary to do that."

He said the military was focused on transforming itself to ensure the armed forces could meet its goals in the 21st century.

"After five years of war, there is a need to make sure that our troops are balanced properly, that threats are met with capability. And that's why we're transforming our military," Bush said.

Trying To Maintain Control Of The State, In A State Of Confusion (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

The best-laid plans for President Bush's news conference went awry just 30 seconds into the event. An Associated Press camera and tripod broke free from their bracket on the ceiling and, in view of the TV cameras, dangled menacingly over reporters from Bloomberg News and the New York Daily News.

"First, I recognize . . ." Bush said, looking up and noticing the twirling piece of metal. "We live in a momentous time . . ." he tried again, then looked back at the unmoored object, which was blocking the MSNBC camera's shot of him. "For those of you watching, we seem to have a mechanical flaw," he felt obliged to explain.

The most powerful man in the world spent the next couple of minutes laboring through his opening statement yesterday in the White House briefing room while a large, bald technician walked into the picture and attempted, in a series of acrobatic gestures, to unscrew the tripod.

For the president, it was a timely reminder that events are not always within his control -- as if he needed another reminder. Earlier in the morning, the world learned that Palestinian voters had just handed their government to the terrorist group Hamas. Bush, trying to explain this reversal, suggested the defeated (U.S.-backed) leadership was crooked.

"If there is corruption, I'm not surprised that people say, 'Let's get rid of corruption,' " he reasoned -- inviting an unwelcome comparison to Jack Abramoff and the 2006 elections.

In all, Bush uttered nearly 7,000 words in his 45-minute Q&A. But his message could be summed up with a brief phrase in his least-favorite language: L'Etat c'est moi (I am the state).

His approval of a program to eavesdrop without warrants: "As I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program is legal," he certified.

His refusal to release photos of him with Abramoff: "They're not relevant to the investigation."

His view on congressional anti-torture legislation: "Conducting war is a responsibility in the executive branch, not the legislative branch."

His refusal to provide Congress with testimony about the federal response to Hurricane Katrina: "That's just the way it works."

Midway through this Bourbonic performance, the Los Angeles Times's James Gerstenzang offered an observation on Bush's surveillance policy: "This seems to sound like something President Nixon once said, which was: 'When the president does it, then that means that it's not illegal.' " Whispered "oohs" could be heard in the room. Bush gave a look indicating he wished the dangling camera had fallen on Gerstenzang.

DOJ_NMG_0012328

"Most presidents believe that during a time of war that we can use our authorities under the Constitution to make decisions necessary to protect us," he answered, then offered his reading of legislation passed after the 2001 terrorist attacks: "Go ahead and conduct the war. We're not going to tell you how to do it."

Bush seemed distracted even before the camera dislodged. "I do want to give you some thoughts about what I'm thinking about," he began.

The Hamas news may have been weighing on his mind. But he spoke as though the terrorist group's landslide had been a balloting triumph. "So the Palestinians had an election yesterday, the results of which remind me about the power of democracy," he said, later adding: "I like the competition of ideas."

When CBS's John Roberts steered questioning toward the National Security Agency's surveillance, Bush dismissed the notion of a law that legitimized it. "My concern has always been that, in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," he said. "If the attempt to write a law is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Even the Washington Times pressed Bush to answer charges that he has abused his power. But the president declined to be drawn into constitutional nuance. "I'm going to leave that to the lawyers," he said. "I believe I've been hired by the people to do my job, and that's to protect the people."

Another questioner wondered what it was about the 1978 law governing domestic wiretapping "that you feel you have to circumvent it."

The president's lip curled upward. He held up his hand, then leaned on the lectern and pointed his finger. "It's like saying, 'You know, you're breaking the law.' I'm not," he protested. Still, Bush explained why he disregarded the 1978 law. "I said, 'Look, is it possible to conduct this program under the old law?' And people said, 'It doesn't work.' "

The questions about the Abramoff photos heightened Bush's irritation. "Having my picture taken with someone doesn't mean that I'm a friend with him or know him very well," he replied to one questioner. "I've had my picture taken with you."

A few questions later, Bush made the distance between Abramoff and himself even longer. "I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy," he declared. "I don't know him."

Still, the president seemed to realize the questions about the photos were not going away. CBS Radio's Mark Knoller tried another approach. "Never mind about the photographs, but can you say whether . . . "

Bush cut him off. "Easy," he noted, "for a radio guy to say."

Bush To Resist Wiretap Legislation (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, January 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush suggested he will resist any congressional attempts to modify the administration's practice of conducting warrantless wiretaps, saying the program is already legal and would lose effectiveness if subjected to a protracted public debate.

In his first news conference of the year, Mr. Bush said yesterday that while he will consider congressional suggestions to modify the program, he won't support public debate that divulges how it works -- even if lawmakers' intent is to preserve the program.

Asking, "why tell the enemy what we're doing if the program is necessary to protect us from the enemy?" Mr. Bush said if congressional debate should expose "the nature of the program, I'll resist it."

Some recent national polls have shown the issue isn't hurting the president politically.

Critics, including some Republicans, say the program, which is conducted by the National Security Agency under authorization by the president, tramples the Constitution and represents an overreach of executive authority. The Bush administration says the program is legal and that some lawmakers have been briefed regularly on it since it was initiated shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0012329

It is uncertain how far the administration will go to cut off debate on the issue, even if there is a drive to give the White House authority to continue the practice. Congress has scheduled a Feb. 6 hearing on the program.

President Bush holds a press conference2 to answer questions about the Hamas Islamist party, the economy and the domestic-surveillance program, among other topics. • Read the transcript of the news briefing3.

What Mr. Bush hasn't resisted are opportunities to discuss the program himself, which he has been doing since its existence was revealed last month. In an interview with The Wall Street Journal on Wednesday, Mr. Bush said that while he was "sorry" the program was revealed, he now believed it necessary to explain its importance to the public. "We have to be able to describe to the people the principles of the program without giving to the enemy what's happening," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Bush's news conference included a variety of subjects but concentrated on the NSA program, the White House's contacts with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the surprise sweep of the extremist Hamas organization in Wednesday's parliamentary elections in the Palestinian territories.

Mr. Abramoff, who pleaded guilty earlier this year to federal charges related to his lobbying activities, had visited the White House and contributed to Mr. Bush's campaign. Recently a handful of pictures surfaced showing Mr. Bush and Mr. Abramoff at various events.

Reporters have pressed the White House to release the photographs of the president and Mr. Abramoff but have been rebuffed. The administration also has refused to say whether Mr. Abramoff ever met with Mr. Bush's senior staff. Yesterday, Mr. Bush declined to disclose whether Mr. Abramoff had ever met with his senior advisers, saying the matter remained under federal investigation and that he would cooperate with that probe if asked. He also declined to release the photographs, saying they were "grip and grin" shots that would be used for "pure political purposes" if made public.

"I've had my picture taken with a lot of people," Mr. Bush said, adding that he had no relationship with Mr. Abramoff. "I don't know him," Mr. Bush said.

The president reiterated his vow not to deal with Hamas. Mr. Bush urged the current Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to stay on so Washington can maintain a diplomatic channel with the territorial government. The landslide for Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, is all but certain to bog down the U.S.-backed peace process in the region. But Mr. Bush said he remains optimistic. "Peace is never dead, because people want peace," he said.

Bush Resists Changing Law On Spying (REU-Y2)

By Tabassum Zakaria

Reuters, January 27, 2006

President George W. Bush on Thursday insisted his decision to allow spying on Americans' international telephone calls was legal and said he would resist changing laws governing such action if it meant revealing secrets to an enemy.

Democrats and some Republicans question the legality of Bush's decision, taken after the September 11 attacks, to authorize eavesdropping without court approval if one of the parties on the call was suspected of links to terrorism.

Former Vice President Al Gore, the Democrat who lost the 2000 presidential election to Bush, has called for a special counsel to investigate whether the president broke the law, and Congress is to hold hearings on the issue.

The 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act makes it illegal to spy on U.S. citizens inside the United States without approval from the special FISA court.

Bush said he acted to allow the National Security Agency to move more quickly in monitoring suspect communications to head off possible further attacks.

He said a measure passed by Congress after the September 11 attacks gave him authority to use whatever force was necessary against the enemy in his declared "war against terrorism."

Bush dismissed critics who say he should have worked with Congress to change the 1978 law, passed to halt intrusive domestic spying under President Richard Nixon.

"My concern has always been that, in an attempt to try to pass a law on something that's already legal, we'll show the enemy what we're doing," Bush said at a press conference.

DOJ_NMG_0012330

He said the spying program was "so sensitive and so important" that if information was revealed about how it operated, it would help the enemy.

SECRET PROGRAM

"And so, of course, we'll listen to ideas. But I want to make sure that people understand that if the attempt to write law makes this program -- is likely to expose the nature of the program, I'll resist it," Bush said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), a California Democrat, said: "I have been deeply troubled by the fact that the administration, if it believed it needed additional authorities related to domestic electronic surveillance, did not seek legislation granting them that authority."

The White House has been on a public campaign to reassure Americans that this is a limited program and the government is not engaged in a mass spying operation.

In that effort, the White House says the program should not be referred to as "domestic spying" because one end of the link being monitored is overseas. The White House is calling it "the terrorist surveillance program."

Bush said Gen. Michael Hayden, the former director of the National Security Agency, came forward with the program as a tool for fighting terrorism after the September 11 attack.

"It wasn't designed in the White House. It was designed where you expect it to be designed, in the NSA," Bush said.

Government lawyers looked at the program before it was implemented and there were safeguards to make sure it focused on calls in which someone suspected of links to al Qaeda was involved, Bush said.

"And so, as I stand here right now, I can tell the American people the program's legal, it's designed to protect civil liberties and it's necessary," he said.

Bush, who visited the NSA on Wednesday, said he takes the threats from al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden seriously. In an audiotape aired last week bin Laden said al Qaeda was preparing attacks inside the United States.

Varied Rationales Muddle Issue Of NSA Eavesdropping (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that he didn't seek congressional approval for a warrantless domestic eavesdropping program for one simple reason: He didn't need it.

"We believe there's a constitutional power granted to presidents as well as, this case, a statutory power," Bush said. "And I'm intending to use that power."

It is one of several explanations on the topic from Bush and his aides, who have provided at least two separate rationales for why they did not ask for statutory authority for the program. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the administration had considered seeking legislation but determined it would be impossible to get, adding later in the same news conference that authorities did not want to expose the program's existence. White House spokesman Scott McClellan has echoed the latter point, saying the administration feared that details of the classified program would be exposed publicly.

The subject is one of several elements in the NSA spying debate that have been clouded by apparent contradictions and mixed messages from the government since the program was revealed last month. The confusion has cleared up little in recent days, as the White House has embarked on a multi-pronged campaign to defend the legality of the controversial program.

Gonzales and other officials, for example, have repeatedly said that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), which governs secret surveillance in the United States, is too cumbersome to be applied to the NSA eavesdropping program. Yet the Justice Department raised concerns about a 2002 bill to loosen FISA requirements.

Before the program's existence was revealed, several administration officials also emphasized in testimony and public statements that the NSA was prohibited from engaging in domestic surveillance -- even as the agency was clearly doing so under the authority of Bush's secret order that established the program.

Many Democratic lawmakers and legal experts have seized on these and other issues in recent days to argue that the Bush administration has been misleading in its explanations of the NSA program.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said that the "after-the-fact spin we're hearing now is worthless." Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) issued a statement yesterday criticizing the administration for claiming that Congress had been fully briefed on the NSA program and for opposing the 2002 measure to loosen FISA standards.

The latter issue attracted particular criticism yesterday, as lawmakers and national security experts opposed to the program cast doubts on the administration's current legal rationale.

An amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have lowered the standard to be met for authorizing surveillance of non-U.S. citizens, from "probable cause" to "reasonable suspicion" that the target was an agent of a terrorist group. The Justice Department did not offer support for DeWine's amendment because of "significant legal and practical issues," according to department statements.

Confusion over the issue deepened further yesterday after officials discovered two versions of a Justice statement on the legislation. One, which was posted on the Federation of American Scientists Web site and quoted in media reports, noted possible constitutional concerns. The other, held by the Senate intelligence committee, did not include that issue. Officials could not explain the disparity.

A Justice spokeswoman said this week that the previous opinion did not conflict with current legal justifications for the NSA spying because "probable cause" required under FISA is "essentially the same" as the standard used in the NSA program: "a reasonable basis to believe" that a target is linked to al Qaeda or an affiliate.

But Timothy H. Edgar, a national security lawyer at the American Civil Liberties Union, also said the NSA program clearly operates under a lower legal standard allowed only in limited circumstances, such as when police to frisk suspicious people on the street.

"That's never been considered acceptable for searching someone or listening to their telephone," Edgar said.

Bush and his top aides have repeatedly stressed that "Congress" had been briefed on the program over the past four years, but have often neglected to mention that the briefings were limited to the "Gang of Eight": the speaker and minority leader of the House; the majority and minority leaders of the Senate; and the chairmen and ranking Democrats on the two intelligence committees. And they were barred from taking notes or discussing what they heard with other lawmakers or their staffs.

Sen. John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), who as vice chairman of the Senate intelligence panel was briefed in 2003, took the unusual step of sending Vice President Cheney a classified letter voicing his concerns about the program and the lack of oversight on how it was being carried out. Several other prominent Democrats have also questioned the program's legality since it was made public, including Reid, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), ranking minority member of the House intelligence committee.

Yet Dan Bartlett, counselor to Bush and White House communications director, said Monday that the lawmakers who had been briefed "believed we are doing the right thing" and that Democratic leaders "briefed on these programs would be screaming from the mountaintops" if they thought the program was illegally eavesdropping on Americans.

Some critics, including a group of relatives of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, have also focused on previous statements by Gen. Michael V. Hayden -- the deputy intelligence director who formerly headed the NSA -- that now appear to be, at best, incomplete.

For example, Hayden and other NSA staff members told the House-Senate inquiry into the attacks that "they do not want to be perceived as focusing NSA capabilities against U.S. persons in the United States," said the panel's report. "The Director and his staff were unanimous that lessons NSA learned as a result of Congressional investigations during the 1970's should not be forgotten."

Hayden suggested similar limitations in an appearance before the House intelligence committee in October 2002, telling Porter J. Goss, then the committee chairman, that the NSA "would have no authorities" to pursue Osama bin Laden if he entered the United States. The NSA program was at least a year old by that time, and Goss -- now the CIA director -- was one of the few members of Congress briefed on it. Experts also say Hayden was wrong to suggest that bin Laden would enjoy the same legal protections as U.S. citizens or residents.

Staff writers Carol D. Leonnig and Dafna Linzer and researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0012332

New Poll Finds Mixed Support For Wiretaps (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Janet Elder

The New York Times, January 27, 2006

Americans are willing to tolerate eavesdropping without warrants to fight terrorism, but are concerned that the aggressive antiterrorism programs championed by the Bush administration are encroaching on civil liberties, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

In a sign that public opinion about the trade-offs between national security and individual rights is nuanced and remains highly unresolved, responses to questions about the administration's eavesdropping program varied significantly depending on how the questions were worded, underlining the importance of the effort by the White House this week to define the issue on its terms.

The poll, conducted as President Bush defended his surveillance program in the face of criticism from Democrats and some Republicans that it is illegal, found that Americans were willing to give the administration some latitude for its surveillance program if they believed it was intended to protect them. Fifty-three percent of the respondents said they supported eavesdropping without warrants "in order to reduce the threat of terrorism."

The results suggest that Americans' view of the program depends in large part on whether they perceive it as a bulwark in the fight against terrorism, as Mr. Bush has sought to cast it, or as an unnecessary and unwarranted infringement on civil liberties, as critics have said.

In one striking finding, respondents overwhelmingly supported e-mail and telephone monitoring directed at "Americans that the government is suspicious of;" they overwhelmingly opposed the same kind of surveillance if it was aimed at "ordinary Americans."

Mr. Bush, at a White House press conference yesterday, twice used the phrase "terrorist surveillance program" to describe an operation in which the administration has eavesdropped on telephone calls and other communications like e-mail that it says could involve operatives of Al Qaeda overseas talking to Americans. Critics say the administration could conduct such surveillance while still getting prior court approval, as spelled out in a 1978 law intended to guard against governmental abuses.

The findings came in a poll conducted as Mr. Bush prepares to deliver his fifth State of the Union address on Tuesday. It found that Mr. Bush will face a nation that has grown sour on Washington and skeptical that he will be able to achieve significant progress in health care, the economy, the Iraq war and the cost of prescription drugs for older patients before he leaves office in three years.

The poll also signaled concern for Republicans as they prepare to defend their control of the House and the Senate in midterm elections this November. Investigations into Congressional corruption are taking a toll as the elections approach: 61 percent of Americans now hold an unfavorable view of Congress, the highest in 10 years.

This finding holds particular peril for Republicans as the party that has been in charge. More than half of the respondents said they believed that most members of Congress would exchange votes for money or favors.

Republicans were seen as more likely to be unduly influenced by lobbyists. And the Republican Party is now viewed unfavorably by 51 percent of the nation, its worst rating since Mr. Bush took office. By contrast, 53 percent said they held a favorable view of Democrats.

The telephone poll was conducted with 1,229 adults, starting Friday and ending Wednesday. Its margin of sampling error was plus or minus three percentage points.

The poll found that Americans were to a large extent perplexed as they weighed conflicting forces: the need presented by Mr. Bush to take extraordinary action to fight terrorism, and a historical aversion to an overly intrusive government.

The poll found that 53 percent of Americans approved of Mr. Bush's authorizing eavesdropping without prior court approval "in order to reduce the threat of terrorism"; 46 percent disapproved. When the question was asked stripped of any mention of terrorism, 46 percent of those respondents approved, and 50 percent said they disapproved.

At the same time, 64 percent said they were very or somewhat concerned about losing civil liberties as a result of antiterrorism measures put in place by Mr. Bush since the attacks of Sept. 11. And respondents were more likely to be concerned that the government would enact strong antiterrorism laws that excessively restrict civil liberties than they were that the government would fail to enact antiterrorism laws.

The poll was conducted just as the White House commenced an elaborate campaign to defend the surveillance program, and thus may have been too early to offer a full measure of that campaign's effectiveness. There were no measurable changes in the poll findings from one day to the next.

The findings, and follow-up interviews with some participants, clearly suggest that Mr. Bush has an opportunity to make the dispute over the program play to his political advantage. He has been pointing to the threat of another terrorist attack to justify the eavesdropping program and is trying, for the third election in a row, to suggest that he and his party are more aggressive about protecting the nation than are Democrats.

"Say they're targeting someone in Al Qaeda outside the country, and that person then calls someone in the United States about a plot or something really bad: I don't have a problem with that phone being monitored," Debbie Viebranz, 51, a Republican from Ohio, said in a follow-up interview. "But I don't think they should do it for no reason."

Donnis Wells, 69, a Republican from Florence, Miss., said: "I don't think civil liberties are the more important thing we need to handle right now. I think we need to protect our people."

Still, interviews reflected clear apprehension about the program. "If there is a warrant and done by the courts, I would agree," said Robert Ray, 54, an independent from Kentucky. "But they're trying to do it without using the courts. I just don't trust them."

In the poll, 70 percent of respondents said they would not be willing to support governmental monitoring of the communications of "ordinary Americans"; 68 percent said they would be willing to support such monitoring of "Americans the government is suspicious of."

Beyond surveillance, the poll found that Americans hold unfavorable views of the president and the Republican-controlled Congress as Mr. Bush prepares to give his State of the Union speech. Americans, while declaring themselves generally optimistic about the next three years under Mr. Bush, do not expect him to accomplish very much in that time.

When Mr. Bush leaves office, respondents said, the deficit will be larger than it is today, the elderly will be being paying more for prescription drugs, and the economy and the health care system will be the same as today, or worse.

Mr. Bush is viewed favorably by 42 percent of the respondents, statistically the same as in the last Times/CBS News poll, in early December, a lackluster rating that could hamper his ability to rally public opinion behind his agenda and push legislation through a divided Congress. Beyond that, nearly two-thirds of the country thinks the nation is on the wrong track, a level that has historically proved to be a matter of concern for a party in power.

A majority said they were dissatisfied with the way Mr. Bush was managing the economy and the war in Iraq. Public approval for his handling of the campaign against terrorism, once one of his greatest political strengths, has rebounded somewhat from last fall, but remains well below where it was for the first two years after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Most strikingly, the poll found abundant evidence of public unhappiness with Congress. While it is risky to draw conclusions about Congressional elections from national measurements of discontent — for example, more than half of all Americans said they were satisfied with the job their member of Congress was doing — the findings underscored the tough electoral environment that has led some analysts to predict significant Republican losses this fall.

The corruption investigations appear to account for a lot of the dissatisfaction. Nearly 80 percent of respondents said that the kind of influence-peddling revelations that have emerged in the investigation of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff reflected the "way things work in Congress" and were not isolated incidents. More than 50 percent said most members of Congress "accept bribes or gifts that affect their votes."

"It seems like the integrity of Congress members in the last few years has just gone to pot," said Donald Pertuis, 54, an independent voter from Hot Springs, Ark. Mr. Pertuis added: "In the last 20 years, greed has accelerated. People expect more, I suppose, and want to work less."

A Discredit To The GOP (WP)

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0012334

THE BUSH administration's distortion, for political purposes, of the Democratic position on warrantless surveillance is loathsome. Despite the best efforts of Karl Rove, the White House deputy chief of staff, and Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Committee chairman, to make it seem otherwise, Democrats are not opposed to vigorous, effective surveillance that could uncover terrorist activity. Nor are the concerns that they are expressing unique to their party. Republican Sens. John McCain (Ariz.), Arlen Specter (Pa.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.), Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) and Sam Brownback (Kan.) have expressed legal doubts about the surveillance program. Do they, too, have a "pre-9/11 worldview," as Mr. Rove said of the Democrats?

Believing there should be constraints on unchecked executive power is not the same as being weak-kneed about the war against terrorism. Critics are suggesting that President Bush should have gone through normal procedures for conducting such surveillance or asked Congress to provide clear legal authority for the National Security Agency activity. They are not contending that such surveillance shouldn't be conducted at all. No leading Democrat has argued for barring this kind of potentially useful technique.

But you wouldn't know that to listen to the GOP spin. "Let me be as clear as I can be -- President Bush believes if al Qaeda is calling somebody in America, it is in our national security interest to know who they're calling and why," Mr. Rove said at the Republican National Committee winter meeting last week. "Some important Democrats clearly disagree." Mr. Mehlman named names. "Do Nancy Pelosi and Howard Dean really think that when the NSA is listening in on terrorists planning attacks on America, they need to hang up when those terrorists dial their sleeper cells inside the United States?" he asked.

Maybe, as a matter of crass political calculation, Mr. Rove and Mr. Mehlman are correct that Democrats criticizing warrantless wiretaps will pay a price in the November elections. We don't pretend to know. What we do know is that the country is in the midst of an important debate about the reach of presidential power and the scope of civil liberties in wartime. For Rove & Co. to try to turn this into just another partisan political skewer discredits their administration and their party.

Using Our Fear (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

Once upon a time we had a great wartime president who told Americans they had nothing to fear but fear itself. Now we have George W. Bush, who uses fear as a tool of executive power and as a political weapon against his opponents.

Franklin D. Roosevelt tried his best to allay his nation's fears in the midst of an epic struggle against fascism. Bush, as he leads the country in a war whose nature he is constantly redefining, keeps fear alive because it has been so useful. His political grand vizier, Karl Rove, was perfectly transparent the other day when he emerged from wherever he's been hiding the past few months -- consulting omens, reading entrails -- and gave the Republican National Committee its positioning statement for the fall elections: Vote for us or die.

Democrats "have a pre-9/11 worldview" of national security that is "deeply and profoundly and consistently wrong," Rove said. The clear subtext was that Americans would court mortal danger by electing Democrats. Go forth and scare the bejesus out of them, Rove was telling his party, because the more frightened they are, the better our chances.

To cultivate fear for partisan gain is never a political tactic to be proud of, but Rove's prescription of naked fearmongering is just plain reprehensible when the nation faces a shifting array of genuine, serious threats. This is a moment for ethical politicians -- and, yes, these days that seems like an oxymoron -- to speak honestly about what dangers have receded, what new dangers have emerged, and how the imperatives of liberty and security can be balanced.

From the likes of Rove, I guess, we shouldn't expect anything more noble than win-at-all-costs. But we do have the right to expect more from the president of the United States, and while Bush gives off none of Rove's Sith-lord menace, he has made the cultivation of fear a hallmark of his governance.

At his news conference yesterday, Bush was asked again about the domestic surveillance he has ordered the National Security Agency to conduct without seeking warrants -- a program that seems to violate the law. In his meandering answer, the president kept throwing in the phrase "to protect the American people." I suspect that's a line that tests well in focus groups, but it doesn't really say anything. The fact that we expect any president to protect us does not obviate the fact that we expect any president to obey the law.

DOJ_NMG_0012335

Bush mentioned the new tape from Osama bin Laden that surfaced the other day, calling it a reminder that we face "an enemy that wants to hit us again." That's certainly true, but the warning would carry more gravitas if Bush and his administration didn't brag so much about how thoroughly al Qaeda has been routed and decimated. Is anybody keeping track of how many "No. 3" or "No. 4" al Qaeda lieutenants U.S. forces claim to have eliminated?

And Americans would be better able to measure the threat from bin Laden if Bush and the rest of his administration didn't argue -- when it gives them an edge -- that Iraq is the "central front in the war on terrorism." If Iraq is the main event, then bin Laden, huddled in some cave in northern Pakistan, must be just a sideshow, right? But of course he's not a sideshow, he's the author of the Sept. 11 attacks, so what does that make Iraq? The answer seems to depend on whether, at any given time, Bush believes that cultivating fear of bin Laden or stoking fear of a terrorist spawning ground in Iraq would better help his administration achieve its ends.

The thing is, fear works. The administration successfully invoked the fear of "mushroom clouds" to win support, or at least acquiescence, for the invasion of Iraq. By the time it was clear there were no weapons of mass destruction, the fear of losing to terrorists on the "central front" had been given primacy. We stopped hearing the name bin Laden so often -- no need to bring attention to the fact that he remained at large -- until reports emerged of secret CIA prisons, torture and domestic spying.

Bin Laden does remain a threat. He would hit the United States again if he could. We do expect the president to protect us. But a great wartime leader rallies his citizens by informing them and inspiring them. He certainly doesn't use threats to our national security for political gain. He doesn't just point at a map and say "Boo."

Beware The Tipping Point (ERG)

Eugene (OR) Register-Guard, January 26, 2006

A tipping point is defined as the critical point in an evolving situation that leads to a new and irreversible development.

Based on a powder-keg footnote in a recent memo by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the United States may be nearing a tipping point on civil liberties in its amorphous, open-ended "war against terror."

Gonzales' 42-page memo argues unconvincingly that Congress gave President Bush the power to investigate terror suspects using any tactics he chooses when it authorized him to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against al-Qaeda one week after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

The memo, and Gonzales' underlying contention that the president has nearly unlimited powers in wartime, are affronts to America's system of checks and balances and the Constitution that protects the privacy of its citizens. The memo also runs starkly counter to the recent findings of the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, which cast serious doubt on the legality of the president's decision to order the domestic eavesdropping program.

As Congress prepares to open hearings on the program next month, lawmakers must not overlook a footnote in Gonzales' memo suggesting that the administration does not need Congress to extend the USA Patriot Act in order to keep using the law's investigative powers against al-Qaeda terror suspects.

Using the same argument that Congress already has given Bush the authority to take whatever steps he deems necessary to pursue terrorists, the footnote suggests that Bush was authorized to employ the Patriot Act's sweeping surveillance powers before the law was even approved for the first time. By extension, this presumptuous logic suggests that Bush now doesn't need Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act in order to continue wielding the same powers.

Notwithstanding subsequent qualifications by the Justice Department, that footnote, as well as Gonzales' entire memo, should clear the collective sinuses of lawmakers as they prepare to open their investigation into the eavesdropping program.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of Gonzales' audacious treatise is the suggestion that wartime presidents are essentially free to ignore laws put in place by Congress.

It's one thing to argue, as have a number of Bush's predecessors, that the Constitution authorizes presidents to order warrantless searches. It's quite another to imply that Bush, as a wartime president, can blithely ignore the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which outlines detailed requirements for domestic surveillance.

DOJ_NMG_0012336

Now, the administration seems to be suggesting that it doesn't matter whether Congress reauthorizes the Patriot Act's full array of investigative powers because the president already has authority to wield those powers even if lawmakers let the law expire.

Since 9/11, lawmakers have cowered in the face of an overbearing and overreaching executive branch. Now, Congress must exercise its constitutionally mandated oversight role, and protect the checks and balances and civil liberties that make us a free and democratic nation. If it fails to do so, the tipping point may be at hand.

Presidential Power: Without Warrant (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 27, 2006

President Bush, Karl Rove and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales have tackled a big job. They are trying to scare people into believing the administration has the authority to spy on Americans' telecommunications.

This is one of the administration's patented media blitzes. The repetition of themes of terror, fear and security may once again swing opinion.

Throughout its handling of the National Security Agency's programs since Sept. 11, 2001, the administration has had options. It could ask a special court for permission to intercept communications involving Americans. It could invoke its powers to act first and then seek court approval. As Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said on Fox News over the weekend, the administration could and should go to Congress to change the 1978 law if it thinks the law is too confining.

Even now, the administration has offered no explanation of why it can't or won't make use of the options already available. It's hard to imagine a more flexible law than the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The administration argues that a congressional authorization to use force against terrorists means it's OK to conduct warrantless wiretaps. Court precedents suggest the vague authorization can't be stretched to overwrite existing law. Just saying the White House respects the Constitution's limits on searches doesn't mean the Fourth Amendment is actually being upheld. But maybe Rove can whip up gratitude for the president's defiance of accepted notions of law, privacy and a constitutionally limited executive. That's scary.

FBI Chief Cites Worldwide Intel (WP)

By Edith M. Lederer

The Washington Post, January 27, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland -- FBI director Robert Mueller said Thursday the United States now acts on intelligence from any place in the world to fight terrorism but has not sacrificed individuals' rights to privacy in that effort.

However, during an interview with The Associated Press, Mueller would not discuss renditions, the practice of covertly moving imprisoned terrorist suspects between countries outside normal legal processes.

He also would not elaborate on the National Security Agency's listening without a warrant to telephone calls in the United States that Bush administration officials believe involve al-Qaida terrorists.

Lawmakers from both parties have questioned whether it is legal for the government to listen to conversations in the United States without a warrant that the administration could get through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

But Mueller said the goal of gathering intelligence in the war against terrorism was to prevent attacks and not just prosecute cases.

"For us, it is not just having a terrorist event happening and then gathering the evidence to put it in a courtroom to convict somebody after we're able to identify him, detain him and extradite him," Mueller said.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, the FBI chief said, U.S. officials have recognized the importance of using all information to determine "who intends to hurt the United States or the United States' interests around the world."

"We are doing a much better job at integrating that intelligence and acting on that intelligence any place in the world," he said.

The FBI is now working closely with the CIA and exchanging information with the National Security Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency and counterparts in other countries.

"For us, it's taking the information domestically, integrating it with what we know from the other intelligence agencies in the U.S., and integrating it with intelligence from our counterparts from overseas to get a fuller picture of what the enemy intends, in this case al-Qaida," he said.

Mueller vehemently denied that the United States was giving up the right to privacy in exchange for security.

"In no way, shape, or form do I think we've given up our rights," he said. "But I do think there's an appropriate balance with the threat that we have."

While not mentioning renditions or electronic eavesdropping, the FBI chief said "there are a number of programs _ I'm not going to talk about specific programs _ that have been helpful to securing the United States."

Four leading Democratic senators sent President Bush a letter Wednesday saying the NSA program is an "apparent violation of federal law" _ namely getting a warrant from the surveillance court to eavesdrop domestically.

